The petitioner and the Louisville Bridge Company occupy precisely the same position and character—they both charge tolls for the use of their bridges. They differ in the manner of doing business in this: that petitioner, in addition to its bridge tolls, collects, in certain cases, for the services performed in making transfers of cars, a switching charge, which the Louisville Bridge does not make against the railroads using its bridge. Neither of them are, in law or in fact, common carriers of interstate traffic within the scope and meaning of the first section of the Act to Regulate Commerce, and neither can invoke the provisions of that Law to compel railroad companies to transact business with or through them. Between such a bridge company as petitioner and railroad carriers of the country, the Law establishes no such reciprocal relations, duties and obligations, as require the latter to form business connections with the former. We accordingly rule this third proposition against the petitioner.

The fourth point presented in this case—which is whether petitioner's connection with respondent's road at Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue in Louisville is a proper, suitable, and convenient place for the interchange of traffic between them and the railroads using petitioner's track, and whether respondent's refusal to interchange at said point is an unreasonable and unjust discrimination against petitioner and the carriers using its track—involves questions both of fact and law. We think it clear that petitioner cannot, either in its own behalf or in behalf of railroads using its bridge, assert any valid right to an interchange of business with respondent at said point, under the eighteenth section of the latter's charter, which authorizes other railroads to make connections with its line of road. It is settled by the cases of the Shelbyville R. Co. v. Louisville, O. & L. R. Co. 82 Ky. 541, and Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 681 [28 L. ed. 296], that the connection thus authorized is a physical, and not a business, connection requiring an interchange of traffic at the point of junction. Petitioner's claim must, therefore, be founded, if it has any existence in law, upon some provision or requirement of the Act to Regulate Commerce. Counsel for petitioner, accordingly, rely upon the second clause of the third section, in connection with the seventh section of said Act, as sustaining petitioner's right to demand and require an interchange of traffic with respondent at said junction. The seventh section of the Law makes it unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of the Act, "to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, expressed or implied, to prevent by change of time schedule, carriage in different cars, or by other means or devices, the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination; and no break of bulk, stoppage, or interruption, made by such common carriers, shall prevent the carriage of freights from being, and being treated, as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such break, stoppage, or interruption, was made in good faith, for some necessary purpose, and without any intent to avoid, or unnecessarily interrupt, such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of this Act." The facts show no violation of this provision of the Law on the part of the respondent. The contracts which it had with several railroads when the Act to Regulate Commerce went into operation, and which still continue in force, are in no wise inconsistent with the things forbidden by this section, and there is no pretext for saying that defendant has, since the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act, entered into any combination, contract, or agreement "to prevent by change of time schedules, carriage in different cars," or by other means or devices, the carriage of freight from being continuous. It has made no change in its method of doing business, indicating the slightest intention of violating the provisions of said section, and petitioner cannot, and does not in its petition, assert any such claim. Its right of interchange must, therefore, rest alone upon the second clause of the third section of the Act, which provides that "Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this Act shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding and delivering of passengers and property to and from their several lines, and those connecting therewith, and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines; but this shall not be construed as requiring any such common carrier to give the use of its tracks or terminal facilities to another carrier engaged in like business."

Neither this nor any other provision of the Law requires of the common carrier of interstate commerce the duty of either forming new connections or of establishing new stations for the reception and delivery of freights. The Act to Regulate Commerce deals with such common carriers as it finds them, and leaves to them full discretion as to what extensions they will make of their lines—the connections they may form, and the yards and depots they may choose to establish. When railroad companies, in compliance with their charter obligations, have provided themselves with convenient, suitable, and ample stations and depots, for the accommodation of their business, the Law imposes upon them no duty, either to the public or other railroad lines, of making new stations, yards, or depots, even though such additional constructions might be for the convenience of the public, or of other carriers. Congress has certainly not undertaken, even if it possessed the power, to deal with such matters.

Now, it clearly appears, from the foregoing statement of facts, that respondent has already established, and has in use in the City of Louisville, four suitable, ample, and conveniently located and fully equipped yards and depots, at one or the other of which it receives and delivers all freights arriving at, or departing from, Louisville, and makes all its interchanges of freights with other lines, furnishing to the latter, at said places, "all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities," not only for such interchange of traffic, but also "for receiving, forwarding, and delivering, of passengers and property to and from its line or lines, and those connecting therewith," and does this without discrimination in its rates and charges, as between such connecting lines. At petitioner's Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue connection neither respondent nor petitioner has any yard, station, or depot; neither owns any ground there, except respondent's right of way 66 feet in width, on which its double main tracks are located; neither has any buildings, sheds, or platforms there for the reception and accommodation of freights to be handled and exchanged at that point; nor has either of them any clerks or employes stationed there for the inspection of cars, receipting for freights, etc. Without such accommodations, and without the employment of such clerical force located there, an interchange of traffic at said point cannot be made in a proper and convenient way to either party. No authority is conferred upon the Commission, or upon this court, to compel respondent to provide at that connection the same or equal facilities which it had provided at its regular established yards and depots in Louisville, in order to effect an interchange with petitioner and the railroads using its bridge. Respondent neither receives nor delivers Louisville freights, whether local or through, at that point. In some instances it receives and delivers its own cars on, and from, certain private sidings in Louisville, and at local Louisville rates—said private sidings being constructed and used under special contracts with the owners, and subject to respondent's right to remove or sever its connection with them at any time. Under said contracts such private sidings constitute, for the time being, portions of respondent's Louisville lines. The interchange sought by petitioner is entirely different. Louisville shippers or consignees, of either local or interstate freight, could not require respondent to receive or deliver their traffic at said Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue connection, and in refusing to accept from or to deliver interstate traffic to private shippers or consignees at said point, it could not be claimed that respondent was denying to them the same proper, reasonable and equal facilities which it afforded to other shippers or consignees, who delivered and accepted their through freight, at its Ninth and Broadway yard and depot.

If we assume that petitioner is a common carrier within the meaning of the Law, can it, or the railroads using its track in the manner heretofore stated, properly demand or require of respondent to concede to it, or them, rights and facilities which respondent is under no obligation or duty to grant or provide for the owners and shippers of interstate commerce? This would be conferring upon common carriers, engaged in transporting interstate traffic, rights and privileges superior to those intended for the benefit of such commerce itself. The Law was not designed to advance the interests of or to benefit the carriers, but was intended for the benefit and advantage of the commerce they transported, and the provisions of the Act all look to that as its object and purpose. With no facilities at said Seventh Street and Magnolia connection, for the interchange of traffic, or for the receiving, forwarding and delivering of property there, and being under no legal duty or obligation to provide such facilities at said point, upon what principle can it be successfully asserted that in declining to transact such business at such place respondent is refusing or denying to petitioner, and the roads using its track, "all proper, reasonable, and equal facilities" for the interchange of traffic, or for receiving, forwarding, and delivering of property, such as it has provided and affords to other connecting lines at its Ninth and Broadway yard and depot? Can it be properly said that such refusal involves any discrimination against petitioner and the railroads using its track, and seeking a connection at that point with respondent—or against the traffic it or they may handle? In refusing to transact business with petitioner at Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue junction, while interchanging with other connecting lines at Ninth and Broadway Station, is respondent making or giving "any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" to the latter companies or the traffic they transport?

An affirmative answer cannot be made to these questions, unless the third section of the Commerce Act is construed to mean that whatever facilities a railroad company engaged in interstate traffic may furnish or provide for the interchange of business with connecting lines at any one place, such as its regular established and properly equipped depot, it is bound to provide for any, and all other railroads, at such other and different points as they may select in making their connection. The section does not admit of this construction. It obviously means that where a railroad subject to the provisions of the Act has provided and established at any given place its facilities in the shape of yards, stations, and depots, for the interchange of traffic, or for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers and property, and there affords such facilities to some of its connecting lines, it shall not deny to other connecting lines, at that point, the same proper, reasonable, and equal facilities, for such interchange, or for receiving, forwarding and delivering of property, to and from such other connecting line. The question, therefore, as to what constitutes reasonable, proper, and equal facilities, necessarily involves a consideration of the place, accommodations, terms, and conditions at and under which facilities for interchange are sought, as compared with those where such interchange is conceded or afforded. It by no means follows, because certain facilities for the interchange of freight are furnished by a railroad to another connecting line, or lines, at one point, upon certain terms, conditions, and considerations, and where ample accommodations for the transaction of such business are provided and maintained, at the joint expense of the companies using them, that another company, making a physical connection with the road furnishing such facilities, at another different and distant place, is entitled to demand at said different point of connection the same or equal facilities.

The company making the physical connection, at a point other than that at which the established road has already provided its facilities and conducts its interchange with other connecting lines, cannot demand or require an interchange of freight at such point of physical connection without first furnishing at such point reasonable and proper facilities for the interchange sought. It cannot rely upon the terminal facilities at another point of the road with which it has formed the physical connection; nor can it compel the road with which the connection is made to join with it in the expense of providing at that point the facilities necessary and proper for the interchange. In saying that petitioner, or other road in its position, could not properly require an interchange at the new point of physical connection, before it had first provided reasonable facilities there for transacting the business incident to an interchange of traffic, we do not mean to be understood as holding that after providing such facilities at the point of connection it could then lawfully require respondent to interchange traffic with it and the railroads using its tracks at that place. We do not pass upon that question now, as it is not involved in the present controversy.

It is perfectly manifest from the location of the said Seventh Street and Magnolia connection, and from the lack of all suitable and proper accommodations there, for conducting the business involved in the interchange of freights, and from the manner in which such freight, whether in car load or broken lots, would have to be handled by respondent, that if respondent is required to furnish at that point all proper, reasonable, and equal facilities, or, as required by the order of the Commission, "the same equal facilities," which it furnishes and affords to the lines connecting with it at Ninth and Broadway yard, petitioner will, thereby, secure benefits and advantages superior to those conferred upon any other connecting line or lines, and largely, if not entirely, at respondent's expense. The order of the Commission imposes no terms and conditions under which the interchange at said connection shall be made. Petitioner is not required to pay respondent anything for switching services, which it will be compelled to perform in interchanging, or any rental for the use of its terminal facilities at Ninth and Broadway, where the freights, both in car loads and broken or mixed lots, have to be transferred, and put into proper trains. Neither is petitioner required to bear any portion of the expense of handling the traffic at said yard; and in seeking the aid of this court to compel obedience to said order, or to enforce its rights, petitioner makes no offer to compensate respondent for such services and expenditures. The Commission did not, perhaps, have the authority to impose such terms and conditions upon the petitioner; nor has this court either the right, or the necessary data, to settle and adjust those matters, which are the subject of private contract and arrangements between the parties. But without the imposition of such terms and conditions, it is clear that petitioner, and the railroads using its tracks and seeking an interchange at said connection, will secure, without cost to themselves or compensation to respondent, services, and the benefit of facilities, and of employes, for which other connecting lines interchanging at other places, make respondent compensation, and bear their proportion of the terminal expense. The Law never contemplated such results. No provision of the Interstate Commerce Act confers equal facilities to connecting lines, under dissimilar circumstances and conditions. On the contrary, even as to interstate commerce itself, the distinction is recognized throughout the Law, between discriminations and preferences which are just and reasonable and those which are unjust and unreasonable, according as they are made, or given, under similar or dissimilar circumstances and conditions. All discriminations and preferences are not forbidden or made unlawful, but only such as are unjust, or undue, or unreasonable, are prohibited. In each and every case, therefore, the question whether a discrimination is unjust, or a preference is undue or unreasonable, either as to the common carrier, or the commerce it may transport, involves a consideration of the circumstances and conditions under which such discrimination or preference is made or given.

Our conclusion upon this fourth proposition is, that said Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue connection is not a proper, suitable, and convenient point for the interchange of freights between respondent, and petitioner, and railroads using its tracks; and that in declining to deliver and receive freight at that point, to and from petitioner, respondent is neither discriminating improperly against petitioner, and the carriers using its tracks, nor giving the roads with which it does interchange traffic at the Ninth and Broadway yard any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage.

Upon the fifth question presented, viz.: Does the Law impose upon respondent the duty of making an interchange with petitioner at said connection, if such interchange or traffic involves the use, by petitioner and the roads using its bridge, of the tracks and terminal facilities of respondent, or subjects respondent to expense over and above what it incurs in interchanging traffic with other railroads at its regular and established yards in Louisville?—little need be said. An interchange at that connection in its present situation, with no buildings, sheds, platforms or any facilities whatever for the proper care, protection, and handling of freight, and with no clerks, or employes stationed there, to look after and attend to the business, cannot possibly be carried on without requiring respondent either to concede the use of its tracks and terminal facilities to petitioner and the roads using its tracks, or without imposing upon respondent the trouble, inconvenience, and expense, of handling such traffic, both that received and delivered, in the manner above stated; that is, transferring it to said Ninth and Broadway Depot, and then rehandling, reloading or placing it into proper trains. Petitioner's superintendent, A. J. Porter, properly states that it is a physical impossibility to carry on an interchange of traffic, at that point, between the parties, without using each other's tracks. It does not admit of any question that neither the Commission nor this court has any authority to require respondent to concede the use of its tracks and terminal facilities in order to accomplish the desired interchange. Nor can this court or the Commission impose upon respondent the duty of making such interchange at its own expense, over its own tracks, with its own engines, at its own yard, and with its own employes. Other railroads connecting with respondent, and interchanging traffic with it at its regular yards, contribute their proportion of the expense incident to such interchanges, and compensate respondent for its services in handling their freight in a less inconvenient way, and for a shorter distance, than respondent would be necessarily compelled to handle the traffic received from or to be delivered to petitioner. The terms under which other railroads, connecting and interchanging with respondent at said Ninth and Broadway yard, are allowed to use its tracks and terminal facilities, and have their freights handled and transferred, are arranged by mutual agreements, which secure to respondent compensation for services, and for use of its improvements, and provides for "prorating" the expense incident to such interchanges. Is it either legal or equitable to require respondent to handle traffic for petitioner upon terms less favorable? And, if the parties cannot themselves agree upon such terms, can this court make an agreement or contract for them in the matter? We think this is beyond the province of any court or commission, under existing law, and under circumstances such as exist in this case.

An interchange on the main line or tracks of a railroad is essentially different from such an interchange at its regular yard, where such business is usually transacted and where suitable conveniences and facilities are provided. If respondent is required "to allow and afford" to petitioner at said Seventh Street and Magnolia connection, "the same equal facilities" which it affords to railroads connecting with it at its established yards, without prescribing the terms, conditions, and considerations under or upon which such facilities shall be afforded, it is manifest that petitioner will secure not equal, but exceptional, advantages over all other connecting lines—and it is furthermore clear, from the foregoing statement of facts, that such exceptional advantages will involve either the use of respondent's tracks and terminal facilities by petitioner, or will impose upon respondent expenses and inconveniences and the performance of services without compensation, such as it does not perform or incur in effecting its interchanges with the carriers connecting with it at the Ninth and Broadway yard.

If, under such circumstances, an interchange can be demanded and enforced at a physical connection with respondent's main track, one mile and seventeen one hundredths of a mile from its regular depot, at what distance from such depot may such an interchange be properly refused? If the principle involved in the requirement of the Commission, or asserted in the claim of petitioner, is correct, as applied to the present case, where shall the line be drawn in respect to the distance from its regular yards, at which respondent can be compelled to allow and afford to other roads intersecting, or joining its main track, "the same equal facilities," which it affords to other connecting lines, which reach, and interchange business at, such established yards? The Law furnishes no answer to those questions, and if the right herein asserted is well founded, this court could not fix the limitation, upon its application to any distance.

The sixth inquiry suggested above is, "Does the Interstate Commerce Law, rightly construed, require respondent not only to interchange traffic, at said point of connection (Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue), with petitioner, and the railroads using its tracks, but also to afford and concede to them, on such interchange of business, the same through routing, and upon the same joint through rates, which respondent has, by contract, arranged and agreed upon with certain railroads entering Louisville from the north side of the Ohio River? In other words, does said Act require that if respondent has entered into traffic arrangements with one or more railroads, connecting with it over the Louisville Bridge, for the joint through routing of business, at and upon joint through rates, to be apportioned between them, it shall concede to, or make with, any and all other roads engaged in interstate commerce, and connecting with it, at other and different points, and running in different directions, the same or similar arrangements for through traffic, and upon the same joint through rates? And if this is required by the Law, is such requirement valid, and within the constitutional power and authority of Congress to regulate commerce among the States?"

Aside from the place at which the interchange of traffic is sought, the present controversy clearly involves the question as to whether such interchange shall be effected at local Louisville through rates, or at such through joint rates as respondent has arranged with the roads connecting and interchanging with it over the Louisville Bridge. Respondent is now, and has always been, willing to interchange freights with petitioner and the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, when such freights are tendered at its proper yards, and it is allowed to charge for the transportation thereof its local Louisville rates to destination. The petitioner and the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, since the latter's abandonment of the Louisville Bridge, and its contractual relations with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, have not been willing to concede to respondent the right of charging local Louisville rates on the freight they sought to have interchanged. Duncan, the general freight agent of the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, states that his company could not interchange traffic with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company on these terms, which would leave the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company in position where it could decline "to pay any of our charges on freight that we offered them at Louisville rates." The agents and officers of petitioner also state that they expected respondent to accept and carry at through joint rates the freight as to which interchange was sought. Petitioner claimed before the Commission, for itself and the railroads using its tracks, that it was entitled, at its said connection, to an interchange of freight, upon the same terms, as to through routing and through joint rates, which respondent made with other railroads using the Louisville Bridge; and that respondent in refusing such routing and rating was discriminating against it. If, therefore, the question of rates was not passed upon by the Commission, or covered by its report and order, one of the real points in controversy between the parties was not disposed of. To leave it open, as suggested by counsel for petitioner, will only be to invite, and necessitate, further litigation between the parties; for if this court were to issue its mandate requiring respondent to obey the award of the Commission, expressed in the general and indefinite terms of "ceasing its refusal to receive traffic offered at said connection, and of allowing and affording to petitioner at said point 'the same equal facilities' which respondent affords to other common carriers at the points of connection with their lines respectively," the question would come back to the court at once, as to whether "the same equal facilities" included through routing, and through joint rates, such as respondent makes with other carriers connecting with it, or is satisfied with Louisville routing, and local Louisville rates, to destination of freight offered for interchange.

Or if the court should be in error in its conclusions that said Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue connection is not a proper, suitable, and convenient point for the interchange of traffic between the parties, and that such an interchange at that connection could not be effected without either the use, by petitioner, of respondent's track and terminal facilities, or the imposition, upon respondent, of expenses and burdens such as it is not required to incur in conducting its interchanges of business with other railroads, reaching its Ninth and Broadway yard, then the question of through routing, and through joint rating, is a necessary and material matter for determination in the present controversy.

The first section of the Act to Regulate Commerce, provides that "all charges" for services rendered by common carriers subject to the provisions of the Law, "shall be reasonable and just," and prohibits, and declares unlawful, "any unjust and unreasonable charge." This is the sole requirement of the Law, upon the subject of rates, which common carriers subject to the provisions of the Law, may demand for the transportation of interstate traffic. The second section of the Act clearly defines what shall constitute the "unjust discrimination" which is prohibited. The third section prevents the making, or giving of any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any firm, company, person, corporation, locality, or traffic, or the subjecting of any person, company, firm, corporation, locality, or description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice, or disadvantage; and by its second clause, requires common carriers to afford all reasonable, and proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers and property between their lines and those connecting therewith, and prevents them from discriminating in their rates and charges, between such connecting lines; but without requiring any such common carrier "to give the use of its tracks and terminal facilities to another carrier engaged in like business."

Now, under this last limitation upon, or qualification of, the duty of affording all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange, or for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering, of traffic, to and from, and between, connecting lines, it is clearly left open to any common carrier to contract, or enter into arrangements, for the use of its tracks and terminal facilities, with one or more connecting lines without subjecting itself to the charge of giving an undue, or unreasonable, preference, or advantage, to such lines, or of discriminating against other carriers, who are not parties to, or included in, such arrangements. No common carrier can, therefore, justly complain of another, that it is not allowed the use of that other's tracks and terminal facilities, upon the same, or like terms and conditions, which, under private contract or agreement, are conceded to other lines.

agreements for the establishment and operation of through routes, at or upon joint through rates. Copies of such contracts and agreements have to be filed with the Commission. "And in case where passengers and freight pass over continuous lines, or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates, or fares, or charges, for such continuous lines or routes, copies of such joint tariffs shall also, in like manner, be filed with said Commission." Such joint rates, fares or charges on such continuous lines are to be made public when directed by the Commission, and the failure of any common carrier to comply with such requirements will authorize this court, upon the application of said Commission, to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States, etc.

If, in the exercise of the right, thus impliedly if not expressly recognized, a common carrier, by private arrangement, forms a through route, and establishes joint through rates, fares, or charges, with certain connecting lines, is it compelled to concede to all other connecting railroads, the same or equal through rates, on traffic which the latter may offer for transportation? It is settled by the case of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 682 [28 L. ed. 297], that neither at common law nor under the Constitution of Colorado (section 6)—providing that all individuals, associations and corporations shall have equal rights to have persons and property transported on any railroad in this State, and no undue or unreasonable discrimination shall be made in charges or facilities for transportation of freight or passengers within the State—does the refusal of a common carrier to make through traffic arrangements, at or upon joint through rates, with one connecting railroad company, such as it makes or enters into with another connecting line, constitute any undue or unreasonable discrimination in charges or facilities. That decision is conclusive of the present question, unless some provision of the Act to Regulate Commerce has expressly, or by clear implication, provided otherwise. It is insisted for petitioner that such is the case, and the second clause of section 8 of that Act is relied on, in connection with section 5258, Revised Statutes of the U. S. (embracing the Act of June 15, 1866), as establishing a different rule and regulation, from that announced in the above decision. We think it is very manifest that section 5258, Revised Statutes, which imposes no duty, but merely permits or authorizes the carriage of traffic from one State to another, and to that end, the formation of continuous lines, evidently by mutual agreement, does not sustain petitioner's proposition. That section was in full force when the cases of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. supra, and Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. v. Richmond, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 584 [22 L. ed. 178], were decided, and was not considered by the supreme court as conferring any right to a through route and a joint through rating. Is it a public duty imposed by the Act to Regulate Commerce, that every common carrier subject to the provisions of that Law, shall concede, or afford through routing and through rates, to all connecting lines, whenever and so long as it voluntarily makes or enters into such arrangements with any connecting lines?

After a careful examination of the Act, and the arguments of counsel, and authorities cited, we fail to discover any such requirements. In the report of the Commission in the case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (1 Inters. Com. Rep. 94, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 380), it is well and properly said, in reference to through tickets, that "Such tickets very evidently are a great convenience to travelers, and perhaps to connecting roads; but they are a part of the voluntary arrangements for business purposes, like joint tariffs, interchange of cars, and common use of depots. It being, therefore, under our statute, matter of mutual agreement, whether coupon or through tickets shall be sold by a railroad company, over roads of other companies, it follows that the form of such tickets, and the manner of their sale, are also matters of agreement by the companies interested. If companies can agree upon their tariffs, the form of their tickets, and how they shall be sold, they have the right to do so, and by such agreement, become interstate carriers; but if they cannot agree, the Act does not undertake to coerce them to do business together upon terms that may be justly objectionable or injurious."

It will hardly be insisted that a different rule applies in respect to through freight traffic, and joint through rates or charges, the arrangement for which, as well as the forms of the bills of lading, and the apportionment to be made of such joint tariff rates, and of losses or damage to freights in course of transit, are all matters of private agreement. Such arrangements, which usually include the reciprocal interchange of cars, and the use of each other's tracks and terminal facilities, are prompted by considerations, varied and complex, as shown in the above statement of facts. In some instances, and between some companies, they may be mutually desirable and beneficial, while in other cases, and with other connecting lines, they might be prejudicial, and injurious to the interest of one or both. Can companies in the latter situation properly claim as matter of right what the former have acquired under and by virtue of private contract and arrangement?

No provision of the Law, rightly construed, sanctions or supports such a proposition. The statute does not undertake to create between connecting lines such an agency, or quasi partnership relation as is necessarily involved in agreements, or arrangements, for the establishment of through routes and the making of through rates. As such arrangements exist by contract, express or implied, the fact that a common carrier enters into them, with one or more connecting lines, does not impose upon such carrier the duty, or obligation, to make the same, or like contracts, with all other lines. The Law possesses no such elastic or expansive quality, as to reach, or bring within its operation, in favor of all common carriers subject to its provision, every varying right and privilege which any other carrier may acquire, or concede by private contract, not in conflict with the Act. No authority is conferred upon common carriers of interstate commerce, to issue through tickets to passengers, or through bills of lading for property, at through rates, over connecting lines, in the absence of such arrangements between the companies. Neither is the Commission invested with authority to establish through routes, or to fix through rates, between connecting lines. The English Act of 1878,* amendatory of the Act of 1854, did confer such authority, in providing that "The said facilities to be afforded are hereby declared to, and shall, include the due and reasonable receiving, forwarding, and delivering, by any railway company and canal company, at the request of any other such company, of through traffic to, and from, the railway or canal of any other such company, at through rates, tolls, or fares;" but, in the apportionment of such through rates, said Act required the commissioners "to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, including any special expense incurred in respect of the construction, maintenance, or making of the route, or any part of the route, as well as any special charges, which any company may have been entitled to make, in respect thereof."

Our Act to Regulate Commerce contains no such provision, and confers no such authority. The English cases, under the Act of 1873, cited by counsel, cannot, therefore, have any bearing upon the present case, and need not be referred to.

Looking at this question from another standpoint, we find that the Law was intended, primarily, for the benefit of the interstate traffic, rather than for the advantage of the designated common carriers engaged in its transportation; and the latter, as the instrumentalities and agencies of commerce, can hardly assert rights and privileges, under the statute, which could not be properly or lawfully claimed by such commerce itself. Let us, then, by way of illustration, and to bring out more distinctly the question under consideration, take the case of a shipper or consignor at Nashville, Tenn., wishing to have his goods transported to Cincinnati, Ohio. Could he legally require the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, not only to accept such shipment, but to route it over, or via, the petitioner's bridge and the Ohio & Mississippi Railway, and at the same through rates, from Louisville to Cincinnati, as respondent's own pro rata charge between said points would be, if it carried the goods direct from Nashville to Cincinnati? Or could such shipper require respondent to route his goods, in the way stated, at the same, or equivalent, through rates, which respondent has established with connecting roads leading north from Louisville to Indianapolis, St. Louis, or Chicago? The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company could not decline to accept and carry such goods to Louisville at its regular rates, between Nashville and Louisville, but could it not properly decline the demand to route and rate them beyond Louisville to Cincinnati, on the ground that it had a direct line of its own to Cincinnati, over which the property could be carried by itself—that it had no arrangement or agreement with the Kentucky and Indiana Bridge Company and the Ohio & Missis-

*See 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 848. [Rep.]

Mississippi Railway Company for such through routing and through joint rating—and that between Louisville and Cincinnati it was a competing, and not a connecting, line with the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company? Could the Nashville shipper successfully urge, in support of his demand for such through routing and rating, that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company had existing arrangements with lines (other than the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company) crossing the Louisville Bridge, under which interstate traffic was carried at through rates between certain points? There can be but one answer to these questions. The Law confers no such right upon the shipper, and imposes no such duty upon the common carrier. If Cincinnati is made the point of shipment, and the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company is taken as the initial carrier, it is equally clear that, in the absence of any through traffic arrangement between the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, a shipper at Cincinnati could not lawfully require the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company to accept his goods, and issue a through bill of lading therefor to Columbia, Tennessee, via the Kentucky and Indiana Bridge, and via the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, at the same through rates from Louisville to Columbia, which the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company would charge from Louisville to Columbia, under its through rate from Cincinnati to Columbia. What the shipper of interstate commerce may not lawfully demand, the common carrier engaged in transporting such commerce may not lawfully require of connecting lines.

In the absence of traffic arrangements between respondent and petitioner, and the railroads using its tracks, the former has a right to treat freights tendered it at Louisville, as local Louisville business, and charge for the transportation thereof, its Louisville rates to destination, and in doing this no discrimination is made against said parties, or the traffic they carry; nor does respondent make, or give, any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to other lines, or the traffic they handle, with whom it has agreements for through routing, and at through joint rates, which may be lower than its Louisville rates to the same points. The service in the two cases is not the same, or identical, as was settled in the case of the Union Pac. R. Co. v. U. S. 117 U. S. 355 [29 L. ed. 920], where the supreme court held that "The service rendered by a railway company in transporting a local passenger from one point on its line to another is not identical with the service rendered in transporting a through passenger over the same rails." There is nothing in the Commerce Act of Congress to change this rule. The effect of a through traffic arrangement between different companies is to extend a railroad's line, during the existence of such arrangement, to the point or points agreed upon; and over such extended routes it may charge, as a through rate, less than for transporting local traffic from one point to another on its own line, provided that in so doing the fourth section of the Act is not violated.

extend its line across the petitioner's bridge to New Albany; and if it was, petitioner has, by its contract of September 29, 1886, with the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, shut itself off from affording to respondent the same or equal facilities in the use of said bridge, by having given the locomotives, cars, and trains of the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company a preference over those of a similar class of other railroad companies that may use said bridge. So that it is not in a position, while that contract is in force, to grant, or concede, such traffic arrangements as it demands for itself, and the railroads using its bridge.

While the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company is not an actual party to this controversy, which this court is required "to hear and determine as a court of equity," it is, however, perfectly manifest that this proceeding, as well as that before the Commission, is intended for the private benefit, not merely of petitioner, but of the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company; and its object is to relieve the latter from the contract of June 5, 1872, in order that petitioner may secure from it the rental stipulated to be paid for the use of its bridge—the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company not being bound by the contract of September 29, 1886, to pay petitioner "any tolls" thereunder, until its liability for tolls, charges, or rentals, under the contract of June 5, 1872, with the Louisville Bridge Company, is removed. Now the contract of June 5, 1872, which the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company entered into with the Louisville Bridge Company and other railroad companies, including respondent, and in the maintenance and enforcement of which respondent has a direct business and pecuniary interest, was neither abrogated nor annulled by the Act to Regulate Commerce. The provisions of that contract are not in conflict, but in strict conformity, with both the letter and spirit of the Act of Congress.

Under the terms and operation of that contract, which is still in full force as against the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, and all parties thereto, the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company had and enjoyed all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities with any and every other railroad company entering Louisville from the north side of the Ohio River, and interchanging traffic with respondent. It voluntarily abandoned these facilities in 1888, changed its business to the petitioner's bridge, not in the interest of the public or of the interstate commerce it handled, but for its private benefit and advantage; and petitioner now seeks to secure for it, as well as for itself, the same terms and facilities which existed under the contract of June 5, 1872, and without subjecting either to the obligation of compensating respondent, or sharing in the expense of an interchange, as provided in the contracts of May 22, 1873, and May 16, 1888. The Act to Regulate Commerce, no more than the Act of June 15, 1866 (section 5258, Rev. Stat. U. S.), was never intended to invade the domain of private contracts between common carriers, which were valid when made, and are not in conflict with the provisions of the law. In Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. v. Richmond, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 590 [23 L. ed. 176], the supreme court says of such contracts "that the observance of good faith between the parties and the upholding of private contracts, and enforcing their obligations, are matters of higher moment and importance to the public welfare, and far more reaching in their consequences, than the public policy sought to be established in the facilitation of commercial intercourse among the States, which the Act of June 15, 1866, aimed to promote."

Under such circumstances as surround the parties, neither the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company, nor the petitioner, who, for private advantage, is co operating with the Ohio & Mississippi Railway Company in trying to escape from the obligations of said contract of June 5, 1872, are in a position to commend themselves to the favorable consideration of a court of equity; and no strained construction of the Law should be made, in order to afford them, or either of them, the relief they seek at the hands of the court. The Law should be as liberally construed in favor of commerce among the States, as its language will permit; but when complaint is made, or relief is sought, solely, or mainly, in the interest of the common carriers engaged in the transportation of such commerce, the act complained of, or the right asserted, should not rest upon any doubtful construction, but should clearly appear to have been forbidden or conferred. But under no construction, which can properly be placed upon the present case, can it be maintained that a public duty is imposed upon respondent of interchanging traffic with petitioner, and the railroads using its tracks, upon the same terms as to through routing and through joint rates which it has, by private agreement, established with other connecting roads using the Louisville Bridge.

Having reached the conclusion that the Act to Regulate Commerce, rightly construed, does not sanction nor support the affirmative of the proposition presented, it is not deemed necessary to go into any discussion as to the power of Congress over the subject of rates, which common carriers may charge on interstate commerce, or whether Congress, under the power conferred by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States, could require all connecting lines engaged in transporting such commerce, to establish through routes, and make through joint rates, which should be equal between all such companies. No court has attempted to define the extent, limit, or scope of the power, conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, to regulate commerce among the States. The power is undoubtedly sovereign and exclusive. Prior to the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act this power and exclusive authority over the subject was only exercised—with the exception of regulations for the protection of passengers upon navigable waters, and the transportation of livestock by railroads—through the judicial department of the general government in the way of restraining or annulling state legislation or action, which undertook to interfere with, obstruct, or impose burdens or restrictions upon, interstate commerce. But the power is manifestly not confined or limited to this negative form of action upon the States. It clearly admits of affirmative exercise on the part of Congress, as much as any other power granted by the Constitution. R. A.

stitution to the federal government. Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1 [6 L. ed. 23], gave this comprehensive definition of this power: "It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its Constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."

Possessing such sovereign and exclusive power over the subject of commerce among the States, it is difficult to understand why Congress may not legislate, in respect thereto, to the same extent both as to rates and all other matters of regulation, as the States may do in respect to purely local or internal commerce. But we are not called upon in the present case to say what would or would not come within this regulating power, for the existing Law does not undertake to prescribe anything more, upon the subject of rates, than that they shall be reasonable and just. It does not undertake to require a common carrier, subject to its provisions, to establish through routes and through rates with all connecting lines, if it does so with one or more lines, and does not, as we construe its provisions, entitle petitioner to the relief which it seeks in this proceeding.

For the foregoing reasons our conclusions upon the whole case are that the order of the Commission was not a lawful requirement, such as respondent is bound to obey, and that petitioner is not entitled to the relief which it seeks in this court. It is accordingly ordered and decreed that petitioner's bill or petition be dismissed at its costs, to be taxed, including in such costs an allowance of $600 to the referee, as compensation for his services in taking proof and making report herein.

Barr, D. J.:

I agree with so much of His Honor's—Judge Jackson's—opinion as decides the Interstate Commerce Act constitutional, and that this court has original jurisdiction in this cause.

I also concur with him in the opinion that the complainant is not a common carrier of interstate traffic, within the meaning of the Interstate Commerce Act, and that there are not proper and suitable facilities for the interchange of traffic at the intersection of Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue; but I do not concur in so much of his opinion as seems to indicate that complainant, or the railroads using its bridge, must bring their freight for interchange to one of the established depots of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company.

On the contrary, I think the intersection of Seventh Street and Magnolia Avenue is a proper place for the interchange of traffic, if suitable platforms and other structures were erected. These necessary facilities should be furnished by the complainants or those demanding the interchange of traffic at that point, as they have no right to use either the track or terminal facilities of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company without its consent.

Having concurred in the opinion that the complainant cannot obtain an interchange of traffic with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and that the petition must be dismissed, I do not wish to give an opinion as to the rates which should be charged as between common carriers in the interchange of traffic under and by virtue of the Interstate Commerce Act, until a case arises which requires a decision.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

A. L. DRUCKER & Bro., Piffs. in Err.,

WELLHOUSE & Sons.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. Though a firm or partnership is not a person, it is a legal entity, and for some purposes is recognized as a quasi person, having powers and functions exercisable by one of the partners severally or all of them jointly. It may be a debtor or a creditor, within the meaning of a statutory enactment.

*2. Statutes which relate to voluntary assignments by "insolvent debtors" for the benefit of creditors, and require sworn schedules of assets and creditors to be prepared and attached to the deed or instrument of assignment by "the person, firm or corporation" making such assignment, and provide that "in case of assignments by firms" the required oaths may be made by any member of the firm, assume the right of insolvent firms to assign the partnership property for the benefit of their creditors, though the partners themselves, as individuals, may be solvent. It follows that the individual property of the partners, respectively, need not be assigned in order to render the assignment valid.

*Head notes by the COURT.

NOTE.—Partnership; assignment for benefit of creditors. Although the personal property of a partnership may be assigned by the joint act of all the partners, yet an individual partner cannot lawfully step aside from the ordinary course of business and assign the partnership effects to a trustee, even for the payment of the partnership debts, giving preference. Havens v. Hussey, 5 Paigc, 30; Kirby v. Ingersoll, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 477; Fisher v. Murray, 1 E. D. Smith, 341; Mabbett v. White, 12 N. Y. 480; Loeschick v. Addison, 8 Robt. 343, 19 Abb. Pr. 182; Moir v. Brown, 14 Barb. 47. See Stevens v. Brown, 9 Up. Can. L. J. Ch. 110. Such an assignment is void (Pettee v. Orser, 18 How. Pr. 451, 6 Bosw. 136; unless made with the assent or concurrence of all the co-partners. Wetter v. Schleper, 6 Abb. Pr. 125; Anderson v. Tompkins, 1 Brock. 456; Fleher v. Murray, 1 E. D. Smith, 341; Kemp v. Carnley, 3 Duer, 1; Haggerty v. Granger, 15 How. Pr. 243; Dana v. Lull, 17 Vt. 390. One partner cannot, against the wishes of his copartner, assign the partnership effects to trustees for the benefit of creditors making preferences between them. Deming v. Wood, 3 Paigc, 517. There may, therefore, be some doubt as to the right of the general partner to make any assignment of all the partnership effects to a trustee, for any purpose, without the express or implied assent of the special partner; unless provision is made for such an assignment, in case of insolvency, in the articles of copartnership. Miller v. Arnall, 6 Paigc, 582; Hayes v. Heyer, 4 Sandf. Ch. 485; Hughes v. Ellison, 5 Mo. 463; Druke v. Rogers, 6 Mo. 317; Laeb v. Pierpoint, 58 Iowa, 469. *3. Where the schedules required by statute are in fact attached to the deed of assignment, and there is no reason to conclude or even suspect that they were not attached at the time the assignment was executed, failure of the writings to declare expressly on their face that they were then attached is of no consequence.

*4. That one of the preferred debts was a due-note payable to the attorney who drafted the assignment, and was given to him by the firm "for services rendered in drawing this deed of assignment, and for advice and counsel in reference thereto, and services to be rendered hereafter for the purpose of protecting and upholding this assignment," does not render the assignment void per se. If there was actual fraud, the fraud is matter for proof alunde; and if no fraud was intended, but the amount of the note is more than the services rendered and to be rendered are worth, or if the assignee should not accept the attorney as his counsel in behalf of the creditors, or should not need his services, a proper deduction from the amount can be made, and the note be left to stand good against the assets for the balance only.

assent of all has been inferred; and hence even these cases do not present an exception to the rule that, to make a general assignment valid, the same must have been executed with the assent of all the partners. *Osborne v. Contract; validity; conflict of laws. The rule that contracts made out of the State, which contravene the policy of the State, will be held void, does not make an assignment void, because it does not have annexed to it the schedule required in such cases by the laws of that State, as such schedules are not parts of the contract. Birdseye v. Baker (Ga.) ante, 59; Bacon v. Horne, (Pa.) post, —. But omissions from the schedules or inaccuracies in the inventories, if caused by an innocent mistake of assignors, do not invalidate the assignment. Smith v. Bowen, 61 Wis. 538; Batten v. Smith, 62 Wis. 92. So, of a mere mistake in computation. Jarroldhet v. Fisch, 63 Cal. 462. Under a Statute of South Carolina, declaring that an assignment for creditors shall be absolutely null and void if any preference or priority is given thereby, an assignment executed in New York, preferring employes conveying property in South Carolina, will be held void there although valid by the Laws of New York. the plaintiffs below on a bill to set aside an assignment. Reversed.

The firm of A. L. Drucker & Bro. made an assignment, as such firm, of all said firm's property, for the benefit of the creditors of the firm, to Malcolm Johnston as assignee. The assignment was attacked by Wellhouse & Sons, creditors, who charge:

1. That defendants are seeking "how to wrong and injure orators: first, because they left out of the assignment the individual property of the members of the firm; second, because in providing that the fee of $150, for which they preferred their attorney, J. C. Jenkins, should cover any future services rendered by him in upholding and protecting the assignment, they thereby reserved a benefit to themselves.

2. That the assignment is fraudulent and void: first, because the affidavits attached to the schedules do not recite that such schedules were annexed at the time of the execution of the deed; second, because the schedules are not sufficiently identified.

The foregoing embraces the whole of the charges in the bill.

Defendants filed a general demurrer to the bill—that it was without equity and that the allegations therein do not set forth any sufficient ground in law or equity why the assignment should be interfered with by the court.

Complainants put in evidence the deed of assignment and an affidavit of Wellhouse that he saw the defendants have on their persons watches and diamond pins.

The court passed an order appointing a receiver and directing him, not only to take possession of the firm assets in the hands of the assignee, but also of all the individual property of the defendants, A. L. Drucker and S. L. Drucker.

The judge announced that his decision was rendered solely on the ground that the deed of assignment was void because the assignors had not included in the deed the individual property of the members of the firm in addition to the copartnership property. Whereupon, defendants excepted.

A firm is a quasi person; it is a legal unit. Our law abounds in instances in which it can act in its collective capacity as a person—it can hold and convey property as a firm, can sue and be sued, judgment can be rendered against it, attachment can issue against it, etc. But nowhere is this unity or personality more clearly recognized than in the Acts of 1880-81 and 1884-85 above referred to, respecting assignments by insolvent debtors.

When a copartnership and the individual members unite in making an assignment, the firm property must first be applied to the pay-

Blockley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Partners are called, collectively, a firm. "Merchants and lawyers have different notions respecting the nature of a firm. Commercial men and accountants are apt to look upon a firm in the light in which lawyers look upon a corporation, i. e., as a body distinct from the members composing it, and having rights and obligations distinct from those of its members; hence, in keeping partnership accounts, the firm is made debtor to each partner for what he brings into the common stock, and each partner is made debtor to the firm for all that he takes out of that stock. In the mercantile view, partners are never indebted to each other in respect of partnership transactions, but are always either debtors to or creditors of the firm.

"Owing to this impersonification of the firm, there is a tendency to regard its rights and obligations as unaffected by the introduction of a new partner, or by the death or retirement of an old one. Notwithstanding such changes among its members, the firm is considered as continuing the same; and the rights and obligations of the old firm are regarded as continuing in favor of or against the new firm as if no changes had occurred. The partners are the agents and sureties of the firm; its agents for the transaction of its business; its sureties for the liquidation of its liabilities, so far as the assets of the firm are insufficient to meet them. The liabilities of the firm are regarded as the liabilities of the partners only in case they cannot be met by the firm and discharged out of its assets.

"But this is not the legal notion of a firm. The firm is not recognized by lawyers as in any way distinct from the members composing it. In taking partnership accounts, and in administering partnership assets, courts have to some extent adopted the mercantile view; and actions may now be brought by or against partners in the name of their firms; but, speaking generally, the firm has no such legal recognition. The law, ignoring the firm, looks to the partners composing it. Any change among them destroys the identity of the firm. What is called the 'property of the firm' is their property, and what are called the 'debts and liabilities of the firm' are their debts and their liabilities.

"In point of law, a partner may be the debtor or the creditor of his copartners, but he cannot be either debtor or creditor of the firm of which he is himself a member. A member of an ordinary partnership is at law, as in commerce, the agent of the firm for the purpose of transacting its business; but he is not the surety of the firm. Every member of an ordinary partnership, however numerous the partners may be, is liable to have his property seized for a partnership debt, whether the firm has assets to pay it or not; and not only so, but the property of the firm is liable to be seized for the private debts of any of the members composing it. This nonrecognition of the 'firm,' in the mercantile sense of the word, is one of the most marked differences between partnerships and incorporated companies." 1 Lindley, Partn. *163, 4th ed. 207; Dicey, Parties (by Truman), 169, 188.

"Upon the same principle—namely, that the firm is not distinguishable from its members, and that the name of the firm is only a conventional name for those members—if a firm is appointed by its mercantile name to any office, e. g., the office of trustee, guardian or executor, the partners in the house at the time of its appointment to the office are the persons who, in point of law, are considered as filling it." 1 Lindley, Partn. *166; De Mazar v. Pybus, and Knudson v. Pybus, 4 Vea. Jr. 644.

The firm, as such, cannot hold an office, nor can rights, personal to the members of a given firm, be exercised by new members who may be introduced into it. See Barron v. Fitzgerald, 6 Bing. N. C. 201, 87 E. C. L. 846; Stevens v. Benning, 1 Kay & J. 168; 1 Collyer, Partn. 6th ed. Wood's Notes, 288, note.

"Partnership is but a relation. It is not a person—it is not a legal being. The real owners of partnership property are the partners." Harris v. Vischer, 57 Ga. 229.

"It is not a being distinct from the members which compose it." Chambers v. Sloan, 19 Ga. 84.

"As among partners, the extent of the partnership is determined by the contract and their several interests. As to third persons, all are liable, not only to the extent of their interest in the partnership property, but also to the whole extent of their separate property." Code, § 1888.

The foregoing quotations are more than ample to show that in contemplation of law there is no merger or fusion of the several persons composing a partnership into a common or comprehensive person including them all. A firm adds nothing to population, and in this respect is unlike a corporation, which augments population in the legal, though not in the natural, world. Still the law does take note, on a wide scale, of partnership as a legal entity, and regards it as a unit both of rights and obligations. Judgment may be entered and execution issue for or against it. Code, §§ 1899, 3576.

Attachment may issue against it as nonresident (Chambers v. Sloan, 19 Ga. 84; De Leon v. Heller, 77 Ga. 740; or as absconding. Hines v. Kimball, 47 Ga. 587.

It may be served with process. Peel v. Bryson, 72 Ga. 332.

It may be taxed; Savannah v. Hines, 53 Ga. 616; and see many provisions in the Session Laws imposing taxes. It may be insolvent. Code, § 1918; Bennett v. Woolfolk, 15 Ga. 213; Daniel v. Townsend, 21 Ga. 155; Pullen v. Whitfield, 55 Ga. 174; Anderson v. Pollard, 62 Ga. 51.

It may assign its property to pay its creditors; but whether by general law a single partner can make for it a general assignment seems open to question. Burrill, Assignments, § 67 et seq.; Story, Partn. §§ 101, 310; Parsons, Partn. 165, 166, 400.

As to restrictions on limited partnerships in the matter of assignments, see Code, §§ 1939, 1940.

According to Parsons (Partn. 449), there is a "general tendency of the law at this day to complete its recognition of a partnership as a body of itself, with its own means appropriated to its own debts." In view of this tendency, which is everywhere traceable and no less in our own local system than elsewhere, we may safely hold that, though a firm or partnership is impersonal or nonpersonal, it is, for some purposes, in contemplation of law, a quasi person, having powers and functions exercisable by one of the partners severally, or all of them jointly. That it may be a debtor or a creditor within the meaning of modern statutory enactments, we have no question.

2. In September of the present year (1888), A. L. Drucker & Bro., the plaintiffs in error, executed a deed of assignment to Malcolm Johnson, for the benefit of their creditors. The deed was executed in the firm name, and was also signed by the partners, each in his own name. The schedules annexed were sworn to by both partners. A bill was filed by Wellhouse & Sons, creditors of the firm, attacking the instrument for not embracing the individual assets or property of each of the partners as well as the assets of the partnership. The material question in the case is whether the assignment was valid, although it conveyed the partnership assets only.

Two statutes are applicable to the subject: first, the Act of 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 174; Code, Addenda, §§ 1953 d, 1953 e), which declares that "In all cases of voluntary assignment by insolvent debtors for the benefit of creditors, it shall be the duty of the person, firm or corporation making such assignment to prepare and attach to the deed or instrument by which the assignment is made, at the time of executing the same, a full and complete inventory and schedule of all the assets of every kind, held, claimed or owned by such insolvent person, firm or corporation at the time of the execution of such deed, or other instrument of assignment, which inventory or schedule shall be sworn to by the person making the assignment; and, in case of assignments by firms, the oath may be made by any member of such firm, or, in cases of assignments by corporations, by the chief officer of the corporation, and no deed or other instrument of assignment by insolvent persons, firms or corporations shall be valid unless accompanied by the sworn schedule required."

The other Act is that of 1885 (Acts 1884-85, p. 100), which provides that "In all cases where voluntary assignments are made by failing or insolvent debtors for the benefit of creditors, it shall be the duty of the person, firm or corporation making such assignment to prepare and attach to the deed or instrument by which such assignment is made, at the time of executing the same, a full and complete inventory and schedule of all indebtedness of every kind of such insolvent person, firm or corporation at the time of the execution of such instrument or deed of assignment, which inventory or schedule shall set forth in detail the names of, the amounts due to, and the residence of, each of the creditors of such assignor, and which such inventory or schedule shall be sworn to by the person making the assignment; and, in case of assignments by firms, the oath may be made by any member of such firm, or, in cases of assignment by corporations, by the chief officer of the corporation. No deed or other instrument of assignment, by insolvent persons, firms or corporations, shall be valid unless accompanied by the sworn schedule required . . . No creditor of a person, firm, or corporation, making an assignment for the benefit of creditors, shall be required first to reduce his debts to judgment before he shall be entitled to ask the remedial aid of a court of equity."

We think each of these statutes plainly recognizes the right and power of a firm or partnership to make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors; that, in an assignment so made, the firm is the assignor, and the creditors spoken of are its creditors. Certain it is that only the assets and the creditors of the assignor are to be embraced in the schedules. The partners, as individuals, not being the assignors, neither their separate property nor their separate creditors are required to be set forth. The provision enabling any one of the partners to make the requisite oath to the schedules, respectively, effectively negatives the theory that anything more than firm assets and creditors was in legislative contemplation. The law could not rationally trust a single partner to make a disclosure of the individual means and liabilities of his copartners. The chancellor manifestly erred in holding that the assignment was vitiated by reason of the schedule of assets not being sufficiently comprehensive, and in appointing a receiver preparatory to breaking up the assignment on that account. Although the partners as individuals may be perfectly solvent, the firm, as such, may be insolvent; and, as our law now stands, every insolvent general partnership (as to special and limited partnerships we rule nothing) can make a voluntary assignment for the benefit of its creditors.

In Auley v. Osterman, 65 Wis. 118, it was ruled that an assignment by a firm, of all the partnership property, for the benefit of the creditors of the firm, is not invalid merely because the individual property of the partners was not also assigned. The opinion in that case makes reference to a Statute of Wisconsin, but we are not informed as to the terms and provisions of the statute. Ex parte Hopkins, 1 West. Rep. 208, 104 Ind. 157, was also cited to us in the argument, as ruling to the same effect; but the case was not produced, and we have had no access to it in preparing this opinion.

3. Two other grounds of attack are embraced in the bill, upon neither of which was any ruling made, or necessary to be made, by the chancellor, inasmuch as he regarded the assignment void for a reason which he supposed was decisive of all rights claimed under it. As these grounds, however, are involved in the litigation, and were thoroughly argued before us, and as we have attentively considered them, we will, although we might decline to do so, express our opinion touching their merits. One of them is that, taking the writings all together—the assignment, the schedules, and the affidavits thereto—it does not appear expressly and affirmatively on their face that the schedules were attached to the deed of assignment at the time the deed was executed. Inasmuch as the schedules were in fact attached at some time, and no circumstance appears out of which could arise the conclusion, or even a suspicion, that they were not duly attached at the time appointed by the statute, to wit: at the execution of the deed, there is, as we think, no weight to be given to the mere possibility that they may not have been attached until afterwards. As the documents appear in the record, there is every indication of regularity, and none whatever of irregularity.

4. The other ground taken and discussed is that one of the preferred debts is a due-note, payable to the attorney who drafted the assignment, and was given to him by the firm for services rendered in drawing the assignment, and counsel in reference thereto, and services hereafter to be rendered, for the purpose of protecting and upholding the instrument. The precise description of this liability is quoted in the head note. Whether this debt in full will be a charge upon the assets must depend upon facts extrinsic to the assignment. That it is fraudulent does not follow, as matter of inference, from anything which we observe in the record before us. If no actual fraud was intended, but the amount of the note is more than the services rendered and to be rendered are worth, or if the assignee should not choose to employ the attorney as his counsel in behalf of creditors, or should not need professional services at all in their behalf, a proper deduction from the amount of the note can be made and no injustice follow, either to the attorney or the other creditors. We do not recognize the right of the assignor to dictate to the assignee, either as to the attorney whom he shall employ or the amount of compensation; but, even if an attempt to do so has been made, it may have been an innocent mistake on the part of all concerned in it, and in that event it should not operate, and could not operate, to defeat the assignment per se. We were referred, on the one hand, to Mattison v. Judd, 59 Miss. 99, and, on the other, to Hill v. Agnew, 12 Fed. Rep. 230, neither of which cases is exactly in point.

Pardee, J., delivered the following opinion:

The petitioner, J. C. Chapman, enlisted in the United States Army at Atlanta, Georgia, in 1886, when he was a minor of the age of twenty years and eight months. At the time he had a father living entitled to his custody and control, who did not consent to the enlistment. It does not appear whether Chapman represented himself at the time of enlistment as a major, or as a minor without parents or guardian; but the inference is that he did one or the other, as he says he signed all the papers presented to him, and it is difficult to believe, in the absence of evidence to that effect, that the recruiting officer would enlist an admitted minor without inquiry as to his parents or guardian.

Soon after enlistment, about two months, Chapman deserted. The desertion continued until December last, when he was arrested in Atlanta. He is now about twenty-three years of age, and himself sues out the writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that his enlistment was illegal and void because without the consent of his father, and that therefore he cannot be held in custody as a deserter.

The Statutes of the United States governing the question of Chapman's enlistment are found in section 1117 of the Revised Statutes, to wit:

"No person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted or mustered into the military service of the United States without the written consent of his parents or guardians; Provided, That such minor has such parents or guardians entitled to his custody and control;" and in the third Article of War, found in sec. 1842, Revised Statutes: "Every officer who knowingly enlists or musters into the military service any minor over the age of sixteen years, without the written consent of his parents or guardians, or any minor under the age of sixteen years, or any insane or intoxicated persons, or any deserter from the military or naval service of the United States, or any person who has been convicted of any infamous criminal offense, shall, upon conviction, be dismissed from the service, or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

By these statutes it appears that the enlistment of a minor into the Army of the United States without the written consent of parents or guardians, if he have any entitled to his control, is not only prohibited, but when knowingly done by an officer, is an offense punishable with a heavy penalty.

In the many adjudicated cases where the effect of a minor's enlistment into the army or navy without the consent of the parents or guardians has been considered, there is unanimity in holding that where the statute requires such consent, the enlistment without is illegal and invalid; but there has been some diversity of opinion as to whether the minor himself, so enlisted, could claim his release, either before or after becoming of age—some going to the extent that the enlistment, although illegal, was not absolutely void, but could be validated by ratification, either by the minor's continuing in the service, receiving pay and rations after he became of age, or by the consent of the parents or guardian, given after the enlistment. See State v. Dimick, 12 N. H. 194; Com. v. Cushing, 11 Mass. 67; Com. v. Harrison, Id. 63; Com. v. Fox, 7 Pa. 386; Com. v. Downes, 24

Pick. 227; Re McNulty, 2 Low. 270; Shorner's Case, 1 Car. L. R. 55; Re Davison, 21 Fed. Rep. 618; 4 Ops. Atty-Gen. 350; 5 Ops. Atty-Gen. 318; Com. v. Camac, 1 Serg. & R. 87; Seavey v. Seymour, 3 Cliff. 439.

In the case in hand there is no question of ratification; for the minor deserted before majority, and the father did not consent, but actively opposed enlistment; and the question rather is whether Chapman himself can now take advantage of the illegality.

The District Judge in deciding the case followed the reasoning of the circuit court in the Case of Davison, supra, in which Judge Wallace, Circuit Judge, takes the position that in contracts of enlistment the minor over sixteen years is competent to contract, and that the provision in section 1117, requiring the written consent of parents or guardians, was not for the benefit of the minor, but rather for the benefit of the parents or guardian entitled to the custody and control of the minor; and the learned Judge proceeds to say: "The provision should not be extended to protect a party competent to contract against the consequences of his deliberate agreement, or of his own misrepresentations, unless the language plainly requires such a construction. The language is satisfied by a construction which permits the parents or guardians who are entitled to the services and custody of the minor, to intervene and assert their rights, if their consent to his enlistment has not been obtained. Several adjudications are to the effect that under section 1117, or former laws of Congress of similar purport, the contract of enlistment should be held invalid on the application of the parents or guardian of the minor. Com. v. Blake, 8 Phila. 523; U. S. v. Wright, 5 Phila. 296; U. S. v. Wright, Id. 299; Seavey v. Seymour, 3 Cliff. 439.

"None, however, are cited by the counsel, or have met the attention of the court, in which it has been decided that the minor, if over sixteen years of age, can assert the invalidity of his contract. The case of Commonwealth v. Camac, 1 Serg. & R. 87, arising under the Act of March 16, 1802, is directly in point. The statute in that case was similar in its provisions to section 1117, and the court held the minor bound by his contract—that the parent alone could assert its validity—and therefore refused to discharge the minor, upon habeas corpus, at his own application."

In 4 Atty-Gen. Opinions, supra, Mr. Nelson, in responding to a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, says: "An infant is not bound by the contract of enlistment after he attains his full age. He may repudiate it. The contract with regard to him is voidable, and may or may not be carried into full execution at his election. When made he had no will in legal contemplation. It was made, moreover, with the consent of his guardian, who had a right to enter into it for his benefit; but such authority ceased with the expiration of his minority, and he was then fully competent to affirm or disaffirm the contract made on his behalf."

In 5 Atty-Gen. Opinions, supra, Mr. Crittenden, in response to inquiries from the Secretary of War with regard to the Secretary's duty in discharging minors enlisted without the consent of the parent or guardian, says: "That the enlistment of the soldier was without the consent of his parents or guardians is the cause stated in the statute for the discharge of the minor. The parents or guardian must make application and furnish the proof as to the age of the soldier at the time of the enlistment. If the person who was a minor at the time of enlistment has since attained his full age of twenty-one years, then he is capable to choose and act for himself—to apply for his discharge upon evidence that his enlistment was during his minority, and upon the allegation that such enlistment was without the consent of his parent or guardian, he proving the affirmative of infancy at the time of enlistment; and that his father was then living, or that he then had a guardian, would thereby put the burden of proof that the parent or guardian had consented to such enlistment upon the government."

In Re McNulty, supra, Judge Lowell held that the minor himself during minority might claim the invalidity of the contract. The case of Commonwealth v. Camac, supra, relied upon by Judge Wallace as a case in point, turned upon the question whether the parent's ratification, five or six days after, validated the enlistment.

In giving his opinion, Chief Justice Tilghman, in speaking of the required consent, says: "Before such consent given, the minor or parent may demand his discharge, and the law forbids holding him."

I have examined all the cases cited, and considered the reasoning of those judges holding that the enlistment binds the minor before and after attaining majority, and am unable to agree thereto. It is a well settled doctrine of every system of jurisprudence that whatever is done in contravention of prohibitory law is null and void. I think that in accordance with this principle the enlistment of a minor without the written consent of his parent or guardian, if he has one entitled to his services and control, is invalid and of no legal effect, and, on principle and authority, that the invalidity may be claimed by the minor himself before or after attaining majority, or by any person entitled to his control or services.

A judgment will be entered in this case, reversing the judgment of the District Court, and adjudging the writ of habeas corpus absolute, and directing the petitioner's discharge from custody, and the cancellation of the bonds given for his appearance pending the appeal; costs to follow judgment.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT

David A. BARRY et al., Appts.,

v.

Alexander E. GUILD, Jr.

(....III....)

1. Where one who has made a deed with covenants, intending that an undivided part of the land should be held merely as security, obtains from a subsequent grantee a deed of such undivided part made, at his request, to a stranger to the former deed, the latter deed has the same legal effect as if made by the original grantor himself, and the vendee therein is not entitled to the benefit of any covenants contained in the original deed by the grantor.
2. A vendee can claim the benefit of no covenants contained in the deed to his vendor except such as attach to and run with the land; namely, for quiet enjoyment and warranty.
3. To constitute a breach of a covenant for quiet enjoyment (or warranty, which is in fact equivalent), there must be a union of acts of disturbance and lawful title.
4. Testimony of a person that he "saw evidence of the possession of the third party in the shape of a derrick and tool house situated on the land operated by a stone company," where it does not show whether the stone company had, or claimed possession of, one acre or twenty, or that it claimed to hold under lawful title; and testimony of the vendee's agent "that he never could get possession," without stating what efforts were made, where it does not appear that any of the land is occupied, except by the derrick and tool house—is not sufficient to show a breach of covenant or quiet enjoyment of a tract of twenty acres of land.
5. A solicitor's fee, on the foreclosure of a mortgage containing a provision for such fee, may be claimed by a party who signed the bill of complaint pro se, where it is not shown that he was not in fact represented by other solicitors.

(November 15, 1888.)

A PPEAL by defendants, from a decree of the Appellate Court, Second District, affirming a decree of the Du Page County Circuit Court in favor of the complainant in a suit to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. S. Chasbrough for appellants.

Mr. James Lloyd for appellee.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To a bill to foreclose a purchase money mortgage filed by appellee, appellants set up in defense failure of title to a portion of the land conveyed. On a hearing in the Circuit Court of Du Page County, the Honorable C. W. Upton, Judge, presiding, a decree was rendered in favor of appellee for the full balance of unpaid purchase money, and $100 solicitor's fee, which was also claimed in the bill.

Appellants appealed first to the Appellate Court of the Second District, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, and then to this court.

But two questions are presented by the record: first, on the facts, should appellants be allowed a reduction on the purchase price on account of failure of title?—and second, did the court below err in allowing the solicitor's fee? Formerly Martin Sauber and Charles Frieauf owned lot No. 2 in Witt's Subdivision of the W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 14, containing 48 acres, and the fraction in S.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 15, containing 26 acres, more or less, all in township 87 N., range 11 E., Du Page County, Ill. In August, 1868, they conveyed twenty acres of the ninety-six acre tract to Charles Fitzsimmons. On the 29th of the following March they executed and delivered to John Atkinson a warranty deed containing a description of the whole of both tracts; but following that of the ninety-six acres is the language, "excepting twenty-five acres heretofore conveyed by Sauber and Frieauf." June 25, 1884, Atkinson conveyed by and with full covenants the undivided half of both tracts (making no reservation) to appellee, who on the 30th of January following conveyed the same to George E.

Cott, 44 N. Y. 322; Home L. Ins. Co. v. Sherman, 40 N. Y. 370; Upton v. Townsend, 17 C. B. 80. But voluntary surrender of possession by the vendee is not equivalent to an eviction by title paramount. Smoot v. Coffin (D. C.) 2 Cent. Rep. 682, 4 Mackey, 40.

Gindele, by special warranty against his own acts only.

The last two deeds were intended to divest Atkinson of an individual one fourth interest only in the land, the other three fourths being conveyed as mere security, the equitable title to remain in Atkinson, who continued in possession. This undivided three fourths he sold to appellant Barry; and Gindele, at his request, on the 6th day of May, 1886, conveyed the same. This deed from Gindele to Barry contains only covenants against the acts of the grantor. Barry at the same time executed his four promissory notes for $1,000 each, payable to Atkinson, secured by the mortgage in suit, which is in the form of a trust deed, appellee being named therein as trustee. Atkinson has since assigned all of said notes to appellee. Barry conveyed the land to his codefendant below, Rudolph Nunnemacher.

In this proceeding, any defense which could have been made against Atkinson is available against appellee, to whom he assigned the notes. The rights of Nunnemacher and Barry are identical. It is well settled that the defense of failure of title against suit for the purchase money is founded on the covenants in the deed of conveyance. Therefore, if the deed be but a quitclaim, or contain only covenants against the acts of the grantor, the defense is unavailing. 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1501, and cases cited in note; Sandford v. Travers, 40 N. Y. 140; Niles v. Harmon, 80 Ill. 896.

The answer of appellants does not set up the deed upon which they rely to maintain their defense, and for that reason is defective. It is clear, however, that the deed from Gindele to Barry contains no covenants upon which the defense can rest. Says Justice Nelson in Patton v. Taylor, 48 U. S. 7 How. 159 [12 L. ed. 637]: "If there is no fraud, and no covenants to secure the title, the vendee is without remedy, as the vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title beyond the extent of his covenants in the deed."

Rawle on Covenants, 567, says: "It is one of the most settled principles of this branch of the law that a purchaser who has received no covenants which cover the defect or incumbrance can neither detain the purchase money, nor recover it back if already paid. Unless there has been fraud, accident or mistake, he is absolutely without relief against his vendor, either at law or in equity." See also Noonan v. Lee, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 499 [17 L. ed. 278]; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 60 [25 L. ed. 92]; Hill v. Butler, 6 Ohio St. 207.

The argument of counsel for the appellant is based upon the theory that "When Atkinson procured Gindele to execute the deed to Barry, he thereby, in legal effect, himself conveyed and warranted with all the covenants with which he had originally conveyed to Guild."

It must be borne in mind that in this case there is neither allegation nor proof of fraud, accident or mistake. There is nothing whatever in the answer, nor is there a pretense of proof, that, when Atkinson sold to Barry, and procured Gindele to make him a deed of special warranty against the acts of Gindele only, and Barry accepted such a deed, the real, full and complete intent of the parties was not carried out. Then why say the legal effect is the same as though Atkinson had conveyed with full covenants? On the contrary, under the allegations and evidence, or, rather, in the absence of allegation and proof to the contrary, the deed from Gindele must have the same legal effect as if it had been made by Atkinson himself.

Had Gindele reconveyed to Atkinson, and the latter made this special warranty deed, no one would pretend, in the light of the authorities above cited, that this defense could be maintained. The same purpose was accomplished by Atkinson procuring Gindele to convey directly to his vendee, and, so far as this record shows, giving Barry just such a title as he sold him. It is not the province of courts to make contracts for parties, but to give effect to and enforce them as made.

In this view of the case, the right of appellants, as subsequent grantees of Atkinson, to avail themselves of his covenants to Guild, does not arise. They could, however, under no cir-is an outstanding title to an easement in the premises conveyed, which materially impairs the value of the premises and interferes with the use and possession of some portion thereof, the covenant is broken, although there is not a technical physical ouster from the actual possession of any portion thereof. 1 Bouv. L. Dict. 448; Rea v. Minkler, 6 Iowa, 196; Adams v. Conover, 57 N. Y. 422; Clark v. Conroe's Estate, 38 Vt. 439; Russ v. Steele, 40 Vt. 310; Lamb v. Danforth, 59 Maine, 322; Scriven v. Smith, 1 Cent. Rep. 768, 100 N. Y. 471. The fact that the vendee at the time of his purchase knew of the insufficiency or invalidity of complainant's title is not an available defense to the action on the covenants, either at law or in equity. Van Wagner v. Van Nostrand, 19 Iowa, 422; Barlow v. McKinley, 24 Iowa, 70; Harlow v. Thomas, 15 Pick. 63; Suydam v. Jones, 10 Wend. 180-185; Hubbard v. Norton, 10 Conn. 423-431; Sparrow v. Smith, 5 West. Rep. 765, 81 Mich. 206.

Covenant running with the land. The vendor, selling in good faith, is not responsible for the goodness of his title beyond the extent of the covenants in his deed. Patton v. Taylor, 48 U. S. 7 How. 159 [12 L. ed. 637]; Smoot v. Coffin (D. C.) 2 Cent. Rep. 632, 4 Mackey, 407. The covenant to warrant and to defend is a covenant running with the land and is assignable. Wilder v. Davenport's Estate, 2 New Eng. Rep. 811, 58 Vt. 642. So the statutory covenant of seisin contained in the words "grant, bargain and sell," is a covenant running with the land. Chambers v. Smith, 23 Mo. 174; Wyatt v. Dunn, 6 West. Rep. 665, 96 Mo. 459; Magwire v. Higgin, 44 Mo. 512; Dickson v. Desire, 23 Mo. 161. The defense of the Statute of Limitations does not avail as to the breach of such covenant. Wilder v. Davenport's Estate, 2 New Eng. Rep. 811, 58 Vt. 642. A covenant of warranty is to be construed with reference to the estate and interest which is described as conveyed, and which the habendum clause declares and limits. Second Universalist Society v. Dugan, 3 Cent. Rep. 875, 65 Md. 490. A general warranty of title in a deed against the claims "of all persons whatever" covers defects in the title, although known to the purchaser at the time of taking the deed. Nor can an intention to except defects known to the vendee be shown by parol. Miller v. Deaverge, 75 Ga. 407.

After acquired title inures to benefit of grantee. If a man conveys, with full covenants of warranty, land to which he has no title, or an imperfect title, and if he afterwards acquires a good title, his after acquired title inures to the benefit of his grantee in the prior deed. This rule rests upon the ground that a man shall not be permitted to allege a fact to be different from what he has expressly asserted it to be in his own deed. Somes v. Skinner, 3 Pick. 52; White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324; Russ v. Alpaugh, 118 Mass. 369; Knight v. Thayer, 125 Mass. 25; Huzey v. Heffernan, 3 New Eng. Rep. 327, 148 Mass. 232.

circumstances, claim the benefit of any of those covenants, except such as attach to and run with the land, viz.: for quiet enjoyment and warranty. To do so the burden is on them to prove a breach of such covenants, and consequent damage. The breach can only be shown by proof of an eviction. It is true, an actual eviction is no longer required, and there has been considerable discussion, and perhaps some conflict in the decisions of courts, as to what facts must be proved in order to show an eviction or its equivalent; but the rule deducible from all the authorities is that there must be a union of acts of disturbance and lawful title to constitute a breach of this covenant for quiet enjoyment (or warranty, which is in fact equivalent).

We have looked in vain for proof in this record that Fitzsimmons, or anyone claiming under him, has at any time been in the actual possession of the twenty acres to which it is claimed he has title. The only approach to it is the testimony of Gindele, who swears that he is agent of appellant Nunnemacher, and that he "saw evidence of the possession of a third party in the shape of a derrick and tool house situated on the land operated by a stone company." Whether this stone company had possession, or claimed possession, of one acre or twenty, does not appear, nor is it shown that it claims to hold under the title of Fitzsimmons. For aught that appears in proof it is a mere trespasser. He also swears that he never had possession of this tract, "either as owner or agent for Nunnemacher; that he never could get possession." What, if any, effort he made to do so is not stated. It is not even shown that any of the land is inclosed. For anything shown by the evidence it is all vacant and unoccupied, except by the derrick and tool house mentioned by Gindele.

There is no reason to suppose from this record that Barry or his grantees may not peaceably take possession of at least the greater part of the twenty acres at pleasure. Therefore the proof is insufficient to make out the defense, even if the covenants in the Atkinson deed to Guild could be availed of in this proceeding. The decree of the circuit court disallowing the defense of failure of title was right in any view of the case.

The answer is silent as to the allegation in the bill claiming a solicitor's fee. The mortgage contains a provision for a solicitor's fee of $100. Appellants offered no evidence whatever as to the right of appellee to recover it. The only point now made against its allowance is that appellee appeared in the court below as his own solicitor, and therefore no fee can be legally allowed him. It is true that he signs the bill pro se, but there is no proof that in the litigation which followed he was not represented by other solicitors. On the contrary, there is evidence proving that he was. On the allegations and proofs there was no error in allowing the solicitor's fee.

The decree must be affirmed.

Baker, J., took no part in the decision of the case in this court, he having participated in the decision made therein in the appellate court.

1. It is not the duty of a broker, who is entitled to have a margin supplied by his principal on the sale of corn, to buy in the corn within a reasonable time after the principal's refusal to supply the margin, where such refusal is not absolute, but accompanied by a promise to pay the losses when differences were settled, and not before.
2. Under the rules of the Chicago Board of Trade, where a broker sells for future delivery under authority from his principal, the latter is under an implied contract to furnish margins when demanded; and if he fails to do so the broker is authorized, without waiting for the maturity of the contract, to buy produce to fill his contracts.
3. The sum paid by a broker for corn purchased by him to fill a contract, in conformity with rules and usages of the board of trade, whereby the principal is under an implied obligation to indemnify him, is a debt recoverable upon common money counts as money advanced to defendant's use.
4. Interest is recoverable, under section 2 of the Illinois Statute concerning interest, upon advances made by a broker for which his principal is under an implied obligation to repay him.
5. Error in instructions is immaterial as against the defendant, where there is no pretense of any defense except under the general issue requiring plaintiff to prove his case, and this is done by undisputed testimony showing a right to recovery.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, First District, brought by the defendant to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court in favor of the plaintiff in an action in assumpsit. Affirmed.

Statement by Baker, J.:

This is a writ of error to the Appellate Court of the First District. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion (25 Ill. App. 465) which was filed in that court, and which is as follows:

"McALLISTER, J.: This was an action upon the common counts in assumpsit brought by Parker, a commission merchant of Chicago doing business on the Board of Trade, against Perin, a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, to recover for money advanced by the former to the latter and commissions earned in the course of execution by Parker of the employment of him as such merchant by Perin, December 30, 1882, to sell for the latter upon the Chicago Board of Trade 50,000 bushels of corn, of which 25,000 bushels were to be delivered in January, and the same quantity in May, then next. Upon trial by jury, the plaintiff below had a verdict and judgment for $6,114.28, and the defendant brings error to this court, assigning various errors, under which the most vital questions arise, upon the points made by counsel for plaintiff in error:

"(1) That, as respects the alleged advances of money the plaintiff below failed to make out a cause of action by his evidence.

"(2) That what plaintiff below claimed as advances of money for the defendant, at his implied request, were not such in legal contemplation; and, if any recovery could be had for what plaintiff below was compelled to pay out in taking care of the said contracts of sale for defendant, such recovery could only be upon a special, and not upon the common, counts.

"(3) That interest on the money so paid was not allowable.

"Other points for reversal were made which will be noticed as we proceed.

"The first question, then, is as to whether the plaintiff below established by his evidence a cause of action as respects the money so expended. It clearly appears from the evidence that, at the time Perin employed Parker to sell for him on the Chicago Board of Trade the corn in question, the former was well acquainted with the usages, customs and methods of doing business on that board; that no margins were asked for by Parker, or furnished by Perin; and it is not pretended that anything was said or done which could be construed into a waiver of Parker's right to have Perin furnish margins if the exigencies of the business made it expedient to do so. It appears that Parker made sale of the corn for future delivery immediately upon receiving the order of Perin, and in strict compliance therewith, and informed the latter that he had done so; that Parker did not have any of the corn at the time; and that from the usages of the business, with which Perin was familiar, it was to be presumed to have been within the contemplation of the parties that Parker should go upon the Board of Trade and buy on Perin's account the corn requisite to a delivery when the contracts of sale were closed up.

"It appears that from the time such sales were made the price of corn continually advanced in the market, so that by January 18, 1888, the deal was against Perin in the sum of $3,000 and upward. Parker then demanded of Perin that he supply a margin in the sum of $3,500. The latter refused, saying that he would pay losses when differences were settled or determined, and not before. He put such refusal solely upon the ground that Parker had been ordered, January 4, 1888, to buy in the corn for January delivery, and had violated his duty in that respect. That claim was shown to have been entirely without foundation.

"January 15 Parker made another demand on Perin for $4,000 margins, by draft, which the latter refused to accept. Then Parker went to Cincinnati, and January 16 had two personal interviews with him, and there asked him again for margins, and Perin peremptorily refused, assigning for a reason the said baseless claim that Parker had violated his duty in failing to buy in the corn for January delivery. Then January 18, Parker, by telegraph from Chicago, demanded $6,000 to be sent by telegram by 12:30 o'clock of that day, and gave him notice that, if this demand was not complied with, he should buy in the corn for Perin's account.

"That telegram was not received by Perin until 12.15, and then it was impracticable for him to comply. He did not, and he does not pretend that he would if it had been received in time. On the contrary, the evidence tends to show that he, at no time afterwards, intended to retract the notice he gave Parker, January 18, that he should pay no losses until differences were settled or determined.

When this case was before us upon a former writ of error (Perin v. Parker, 17 Ill. App. 169) we held that, upon the undisputed facts, the notice and demand of January 18 were not reasonable; that such being the case, it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether or not Parker, by his acts and words had waived his rights upon his previous demands for margins, and whether or not Perin had, before said last demand, retracted his notice to Parker that he would not supply any. The judgment in Parker's favor was reversed, and the cause went back for a second trial.

"Upon this last trial those questions were specifically submitted to the jury—as to the waiver, by requests to find specially; as to the retraction, by instruction asked on behalf of defendant. The jury found, by their special verdict, that there was no waiver; and, by their general verdict, that there was no retraction of said notice of refusal to put up margins. It is contended by counsel for Perin that the special finding of the jury that there was no waiver by Parker of any of the demands for margins made by him prior to that of January 18 is unsupported by the evidence; that they were respectively insufficient, if not waived.

"A waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right; and there must be both knowledge of the existence of the right, and an intention to relinquish it. Hoxie v. Home Ins. Co. 32 Conn. 40; Lewis v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Conn. 72; West v. Platt, 127 Mass. 372.

"A subsequent demand is not necessarily a waiver of a prior one. Hill v. Hobart, 16 Maine, 164.

"The fact that each successive demand made by Parker was for an amount larger than that of the next preceding one cannot be considered as of controlling effect, because such increase of amount was properly due to the fact that the market price of corn was advancing from day to day. In view of that circumstance, the successive demands were not so inconsistent as to require the jury to find, or this court to adjudge, that the last was a waiver of all the previous demands.

"But counsel for Perin now insist that the several notices or demands were not sufficiently definite, and that some of them were for a larger amount than he was entitled to ask for. Even if that were so, having decided that he would furnish no margins until differences were settled or determined, and having so notified Parker, he was precluded from taking advantage of such objections at the trial.

"It is also urged by counsel that it was the duty of Parker to buy in the corn within a reasonable time after receiving the notice of refusal by Perin, January 18, and thus prevent the subsequent increase of loss. We are inclined to the opinion that, if the notice had been absolute and unconditional, it would, upon settled principles of the law of principal and agent, have been the duty of Parker to use due dili-igence to prevent such increase of loss to himself and his principal; but the notice, as given, cannot be so regarded.

"The next question is whether the money paid by Parker in buying the corn in question can be regarded as money advanced upon the implied request of Perin, and so become a debt recoverable under the common money counts. The rule applicable to such a case as this is the rule which pervades the whole law of principal and agent, viz.: that the principal is bound to indemnify the agent against the consequences of all acts done by him in pursuance of the authority conferred upon him. Taylor v. Stray, 2 C. B. N. S. 195; Leake, Cont. 55.

"It is said by that excellent author, on the same page: 'Where a person has paid money under an indemnity from another person, it is, in general, equivalent to a payment made at his request, the indemnity operating as a request.' Brittain v. Lloyd, 14 Mees. & W. 762; Lewis v. Campbell, 8 C. B. 541; Moule v. Garrett, L. R. 5 Exch. 132, L. R. 7 Exch. 101, 39 L. J. N. S. Exch. 69.

"Leake (p. 56) further says: 'The employment of a broker to buy and sell shares operates as a request to make all payments required by the rules of the stock exchange, or other share market, in the course of the execution of the employment, with a promise of repayment.' In that statement the author is supported by the following cases: Bayley v. Wilkins, 7 C. B. 886; Westropp v. Solomon, 8 C. B. 345; Taylor v. Stray, supra; Smith v. Lindo, 5 C. B. N. S. 587.

"It surely needs no argument to prove that the same rules above adverted to are applicable to a case where a person employs a commission merchant to deal for him either in buying or selling grain or other products upon the Chicago Board of Trade. The case shows that the plaintiff below acted in buying the corn, under the circumstances shown, entirely in conformity with the rules and usages of said Board of Trade, with which the defendant was familiar when he employed him. What the plaintiff was compelled to pay out in doing so was, therefore, in consequence of the employment, in contemplation of the parties, and must be considered as in pursuance of the authority conferred by such employment, for which payment the defendant had impliedly promised to indemnify the plaintiff. The sums so paid out by the plaintiff, therefore, became a debt recoverable against the defendant upon the common money counts, as money advanced by the plaintiff to the use of the defendant at his request; and, that being so, the plaintiff was entitled to interest upon it, under section 2 of the statute concerning interest.

"Counsel for defendant below complain of error in the instructions to the jury. We do not deem it our duty to enter upon a discussion of the points specified by counsel; for in this case the plaintiff clearly established his right to recover the full amount which he did recover, not only by competent evidence, but by evidence which was wholly uncontradicted. The defendant made no pretense of any defense but that of standing upon the general issue, and requiring the plaintiff to prove his case. That was done by undisputed testimony, showing a right of recovery under settled rules of law. 2 L. R. A.

In such a case we think error in the instructions becomes entirely immaterial.

"We have considered the exception taken to the action of the court in sending the jury back to supplement what they had omitted in the verdict as first returned. Under the circumstances, as shown by the bill of exceptions, we think there was no error in such action of the court. The judgment should be affirmed."

Messrs. Dexter, Herrick & Allen and Horace H. Martin for plaintiff in error.

Mr. H. S. Monroe for defendant in error.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are entirely satisfied with the conclusion reached by the appellate court, and concur in and adopt the opinion filed in that court. In view, however, of the criticisms made upon that opinion in the additional brief and argument presented to this court, we will further notice some of the questions of law involved in the case.

The right of Parker to recover under the common counts for money paid and advanced is strenuously denied. It is evident that if Parker had carried the contracts until their maturity, he would then have been obliged to deliver the corn called for by them, and that then there would have been an implied request from Perin to him to settle the deals, and an implied promise to pay him. It is claimed, however, that Parker being under no legal obligation to buy corn and perform the contracts before they matured, no request by Perin to him to pay out money can be implied in law, and, consequently, there can be no implied promise by Perin to repay it, and an action for money paid will not lie.

Parker, as agent for Perin, and acting under his orders, sold the corn for Perin, and, under the rules of the Board of Trade and the custom of the Chicago market, he was personally bound to the purchasers on these contracts of sale. Parker and Perin were dealing with reference to such rules and such custom, with which they were both perfectly familiar. The rules of the Board of Trade provided that on time contracts purchasers should have the right to require of sellers 10 per cent margins, based upon the contract price of the property bought, and further security from time to time to the extent of any advance in the market value above said price. The price of corn had been rapidly advancing since the date of the sales. Parker either had deposited margins upon the contracts, or was liable to be called on for the 10 per cent and the additional margins by the persons to whom he had sold the corn. The evidence does not seem to disclose whether or not the purchasers had either received or called for margins. Even if they had not, yet there was an existing legal right in them to call on Parker for margins, and a legal liability upon the latter, within the next banking hour thereafter, to deposit the margins called for, and also, within that time, deposit with the secretary of the board, or the parties calling for such deposits, duplicate certificates of deposit signed by the treasurer of the board or an authorized bank.

We must assume the facts to be as found by the jury in the trial court, and by the appellate court, that defendant in error had made proper demands for margins, which had never been waived, and that plaintiff in error had failed and refused to comply with these demands. After the failure of the principal to put up margins when called for, and his absolute refusal so to do, and the return, unpaid and protested, of the draft drawn therefor, it became the duty of the commission merchant to use diligence in order to prevent increase of loss to himself and his principal.

It is clear that the agent was not bound himself to bear the burden and the risk of the contracts made by the express order of his defaulting principal through the whole of the options, without power to relieve himself from the personal liability imposed upon him by the contracts. In view of the relation of principal and agent existing between the parties, the personal liability assumed by the agent upon the contracts made, the duty of the principal to indemnify his agent, and the rules of the Board of Trade, and the usage and the custom of the market in which they were dealing, we must hold that when Perin ordered his agent to make the contracts he not only impliedly agreed to furnish margins when demanded, but also impliedly agreed that if he failed and refused to put up margins when called for, then the agent should be authorized, without waiting for the maturity of the contracts, to buy corn for the purpose of filling such contracts. If there was such implied authority, then that authority, followed by the refusal of the principal to advance margins, was equivalent to a request to his agent to purchase immediately, or within a reasonable time, at the market price, the corn called for by the contracts, and necessarily implied a promise to pay the agent the difference in price between the corn sold and that purchased. This difference in price would properly be regarded as money paid by the agent for the use of the principal, and at his request.

This case is clearly distinguishable from Lightfoot v. Creed, 8 Taunt. 268. There the parties were the vendor and vendee of stock, which was not transferred in conformity with the contract. The point ruled was that the vendee had no implied authority from the vendor to purchase other stock to the same amount, and hold him for the difference as money paid to his use, and that the plaintiff should have declared specially on the contract. Here the parties were principal and agent, and the dealings were with reference to the custom and usage of a particular market; and the employment and the subsequent conduct of the principal had the effect of a request to the agent to make the purchases when he did, with a promise to pay him the difference in prices. The claim here recovered by defendant in error was within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the employment to make the contracts of sale.

We have carefully examined the record in respect to the rulings of the court upon the instructions, and will briefly state the result of such examination.

The court refused to give the third instruction asked by plaintiff in error, but the ground was substantially covered by the seventh instruction which was given.

The refusal of the court to give the sixth instruction was justified by the fact that the legal principle involved in it was given to the jury in the fourth and fifth instructions; and also by the further fact that it, by necessary implication, excluded from the consideration of the jury, in considering the reasonableness of the demands for the margins made by defendant in error, his right to demand 10 per cent margins based upon the contract prices, and expressly limited his right to margins predicated upon the difference between contract price and market price.

The substance of the eleventh instruction submitted to the court had already been given in both the seventh and ninth instructions.

In the thirteenth instruction the court was asked to instruct the jury, as matter of law, that any statement by Parker in any letter or telegram to Perin, in evidence, that he (Parker) would draw a draft on Perin, was not a reasonable demand for margins, and was not a reasonable notice to him to put up margins. It was a question of fact for the jury to determine from such statements and their context, and from a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances, whether or not the demands were reasonable. It was not error to refuse the instruction.

The fourteenth and seventeenth instructions were properly refused, and for the reason that, under the statute, defendant in error was entitled to receive interest on the moneys he had advanced for the use of plaintiff in error.

Complaint is also made of the fourth and fifth instructions for defendant in error. It is objected that while there was evidence of waiver sufficient to go to the jury, yet said fourth instruction, in stating the hypothetical case of the plaintiff below, contained no qualification on the subject of waiver, and thereby took the question of waiver from the jury. The jury was not only very fully instructed on this question of waiver in numerous other instructions of the court, but they, in their answers to the special questions submitted to them, returned into court a special finding against plaintiff in error upon this question of waiver. The fact that they made this special finding renders it absolutely certain that they were not misled by the omission under consideration. The other objections urged to this fourth instruction are technical, and do not require particular notice.

The fifth instruction for defendant in error in order to have been entirely accurate should have contained the additional words: "And if the jury further believe from the evidence that Parker did sell the corn;" but the plain implication from the instruction, as given, was that the jury must believe that Parker sold the corn, and the undisputed evidence was that he did sell it. It is manifest, therefore, that the jury were not and could not have been misled by the instruction.

The eighth instruction for plaintiff in error was modified by the court before it was given. No complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing to give it in the form in which it was asked. Objection, however, is urged to the modification made by the court. This modification was clearly inaccurate, and was probably made through inadvertence. The inaccuracy was fully cured by the fourth, seventh and ninth instructions given for plaintiff in error. In fact, these latter instructions rendered the modification wholly immaterial, as they excluded from the jury any right of recovery based upon the telegram of January 18, as a reasonable demand.

Our conclusion is that there was no manifest error in the rulings of the trial court upon the instructions, and that the jury was very fully and fairly instructed on behalf of plaintiff in error.

In our opinion the Appellate Court properly affirmed the judgments of the Circuit Court.

Bailey, J., having heard this case in the appellate court, took no part in this decision.

Shope, J.: I do not concur in this opinion or conclusion reached.

PEOPLE of the State OF ILLINOIS, Appts.,
v.
PEOPLE'S INSURANCE EXCHANGE.

(...III....)

1. A verdict may be directed by the court, when the evidence given, with all the inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is so insufficient that a verdict based thereon must be set aside.

2. Under Illinois Act 1869, § 22, making it unlawful for any agent or agents, or any other person, in any manner to aid any insurance company not incorporated in the State in transacting insurance business within the State, without complying with certain prescribed conditions, a person or corporation, is liable for aiding such foreign insurance company in the transaction of insurance business in any manner, although not the agent of such company in the ordinary sense of the term, and although acting under a contract with the insured expressly stating that such person or corporation is his agent only.

3. It is a question of fact for the jury, whether a corporation acting under a contract which declares it to be the agent of the insured only in obtaining insurance from a foreign corporation, in any manner aids the foreign company in transacting its insurance business within the prohibition of the Illinois Act of 1869.

APPEAL by plaintiffs, from a judgment of the Superior Court of Cook County (Altgeld, J.), entered on a verdict for the defendant, directed by the court. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. B. Sherman, with Mr. George Hunt, Atty-Gen., for appellants:

The court erred in instructing the jury to find for the defendant. Defendant was, beyond doubt, the agent of the insurance companies if not require a reversal. Walker v. Yale Royal Mfg. Co. 75 Ga. 20. Before a verdict can be properly directed for a defendant, all the testimony in favor of the plaintiff, bearing upon the issues, given by him and his witnesses, and all making for him, given on the part of the defendant, if accepted as true, must fail to make out a prima facie case, after the most favorable construction which can be given to such testimony for the plaintiff. Gibbons v. Farwell, 6 West. Rep. 120, 63 Mich. 344. While it is usual for the defendant, in moving for a peremptory instruction, to do so upon the plaintiff's evidence alone, yet the court may, after all the evi-it was not acting in good faith as agent for the insured, but was in fact acting on behalf of the insurance companies; and this was a question of fact peculiarly within the province of the jury to determine.

Pierce v. People, 106 Ill. 11; Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 78, § 22; Ford v. Buckeye State Ins. Co., 6 Bush, 133; Lamb v. Lamb, 8 Biss. 420; List v. Com. 10 Cent. Rep. 586, 118 Pa. 323; Phania Ins. Co. v. Burdett, 11 West. Rep. 289, 112 Ind. 204; Moses v. State (Miss.) 3 So. Rep. 140.

Mr. E. H. Gary for appellee.

Craig, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of debt, brought in the name of the People against the People's Insurance Exchange, to recover penalties provided by section 22 of the Act of March 11, 1869, entitled "An Act to Incorporate and to Govern Fire, Marine and Inland Navigation Insurance Companies." After the evidence had all been introduced, the court instructed the jury that under the evidence their verdict must be for the defendant; and the giving of this instruction is assigned as error.

It is conceded that in a proper case the jury may be instructed to find for the defendant; but in this case it is contended that there was evidence introduced which tended to prove plaintiff's cause of action, and that it was the duty of the court to allow the jury to pass upon the evidence, under proper instructions from the court.

In Simmons v. Chicago Railroad Company, 110 Ill. 344, where the court excluded all of plaintiff's evidence, and directed the jury to find for the defendant, it is said: "There may be decisions to be found which hold that if there is any evidence, even a scintilla, tending to support the plaintiff's case, it must be submitted to the jury. But we think the more reasonable rule, which has now come to be established by the better authority, is that, when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is so insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff that such a verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant."

In Fraser v. Howe, 106 Ill. 573, in speaking with reference to the practice of withdrawing the evidence from the jury, or directing the jury to find for the defendant, it is said: "If there is no evidence before the jury on a material issue in favor of the party holding the affirmative of that issue, on which the jury should be submitted (Marcott v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 47 Mich. 1); so if different minds could draw from the evidence different conclusions. Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99; Stout or authority why it may not be made after evidence is heard on behalf of the defendant. Birtalott v. International Bank, 8 West. Rep. 330, 119 Ill. 250.

When the judge is clear of doubt that a verdict ought to be rendered either for plaintiff or defendant, and that it would be his duty to set a contrary one aside, he ought to instruct the jury so to find. Such a direction cannot properly be given to the jury unless the evidence is such as to leave no room for doubt that it is the duty of the jury to find accordingly. Finney v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 3 Dak. 270. Upon the review of a case in which a binding instruction was given by the court to find for the plaintiff, the sole question to be considered is whether there was any evidence in the case from which the issue might fairly have been found for defendant. Cudding v. Wood, 2 Cent. Rep. 333, 112 Pa. 371. A motion by defendant for a verdict on plaintiff's evidence admits the truth of plaintiff's testimony; but the court is not required to make a special finding of the facts before a verdict may be directed. Griffin v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 623. Where there is evidence on the part of a plaintiff, sufficient to submit to the jury, it is not error to refuse binding instructions for the defendant. Doyle v. Mays (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 185. It is error for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, when the testimony, if believed, can warrant a verdict for plaintiff. Abraham v. Mitchell, 2 Cent. Rep. 784, 112 Pa. 230. Where the undisputed evidence shows a right of recovery by plaintiff, the court may properly direct the jury to return a verdict for him. Poor v. Merrill, 68 Iowa, 436. Where there is evidence tending to support the petition, on account of which the court overrules a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant, and the defendant stands upon the motion, the court may properly direct a verdict for the plaintiff. Harris v. McCord, 70 Iowa, 46. When the controlling facts are admitted, or are not controverted in any essential respect, it is not error for the court to instruct the jury as to what their verdict should be. Carver v. Carver, 97 Ind. 497; Wabash R. Co. v. Williamson, 2 West. Rep. 224, 104 Ind. 154. When plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, although the defendant may introduce evidence which entirely overthrows and disproves plaintiff's prima facie case, the trial court cannot say, as matter of law, that it is so overthrown, and direct a verdict for defendant. Boone v. Wabash etc. R. Co. 2 West. Rep. 525, 20 Mo. App. 27. Where, in an action on the case, the opening statement of counsel presents to the jury but an outline of his case, leaving the details to be supplied by the testimony, it is error to direct a verdict for the defendant. Jones v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (D. C.) 3 Cent. Rep. 235, 5 Mackey, 8.

relates rather to the mode of viewing the evidence than to the time or mode of interposing such motion. Birtalott v. International Bank, 8 West. Rep. 330, 119 Ill. 250. A general charge in favor of the defendant should never be given, except when the plaintiff has failed to make out a prima facie case, or where, on the admitted facts, he is not entitled to recover; and where there is any conflict, however slight, in the testimony as to any fact material to the defense, such charge is properly refused. Hall v. Posey, 79 Ala. 81; Tait v. Murphy, 80 Ala. 44; Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Mobile Mut. Ins. Co. 81 Ala. 329. It would be proper, and, where the motion can rightly be sustained, convenient, to present it at the close of plaintiff's evidence, so as at once to terminate the trial; but there is no reason could, in the eye of the law, reasonably find in his favor, the court may exclude the evidence, or direct the jury to find against the party so holding the affirmative; but when there is such evidence before the jury it must be left to them to determine its weight and effect."

Under the rule announced in the cases cited, if the evidence introduced on the trial reasonably tended to prove the plaintiff's cause of action, the instruction was erroneous. We are not here called upon to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover, or the weight to be given to the evidence; but we will look to the evidence for the purpose of determining whether it fairly tended to establish plaintiff's cause of action, and, if it did, then the court erred in taking it from the jury by the instruction.

Section 22 of the Act of 1869 provides: "It shall not be lawful for any insurance company . . . organized under the laws of any other State of the United States, or any foreign government, for any of the purposes specified in this Act, directly or indirectly to take risks or transact any business of insurance in this State, unless possessed of the amount of actual capital required of similar companies formed under the provisions of this Act; and any such company desiring to transact any such business as aforesaid, by any agent or agents, in this State, shall first appoint an attorney in this State on whom process of law can be served, and file in the office of the auditor of public accounts a written instrument, duly signed and sealed, certifying such appointment," etc.

"Nor shall it be lawful for any agent or agents to act for any company or companies referred to in this section, directly or indirectly, in taking risks or transacting the business of fire or inland navigation insurance in this State, without procuring from the auditor of public accounts a certificate of authority, stating that such company has complied with all the requirements of this Act which apply to such companies, and the name of the attorney appointed to act for the company. . . . Any violation of any of the provisions of this Act shall subject the party violating the same to a penalty of $500 for each violation. . . . The term 'agent or agents,' used in this section, shall include an acknowledged agent, surveyor, broker, or any other person or persons who shall in any manner aid in transacting the insurance business of any insurance company not incorporated by the laws of this State."

The appellee, the People's Insurance Exchange, is a corporation organized under the general law in relation to corporations, approved April 18, 1872. The objects of the corporation, as stated in the articles of association, are "To afford the public an 'exchange,' where the most reliable information can always be had on all matters relating to insurance of every kind—life, fire, marine, inland, accident or otherwise—and a responsible agency for parties seeking insurance or skill and experience necessary in the proper adjustment of losses, preparation of claims, or prosecution of suits at law in insurance cases."

The evidence shows that defendant had an office in the City of Chicago, and was engaged in soliciting and procuring insurance, delivering the policies, and collecting the premiums; 2 L. R. A.

that it secured insurance for James Turner in five different insurance companies organized in other States, which were not authorized to do business in the State of Illinois. The defendant also, as appeared from the evidence, procured insurance for various other parties in insurance companies doing business in other States, which were not allowed to transact the business of insurance in this State. But it is claimed as a defense to the action that the defendant corporation, in procuring the insurance, collecting the premiums, and delivering the policies, was acting as agent of the insured, and not as agent of the insurance companies, and that it is not liable for the penalties named in the statute, although the insurance companies issuing policies of insurance were not authorized to transact business in this State; and in support of this position attention is called to the fact that at the beginning of business with any one of the foreign insurance companies a circular was sent to such company as follows:

Dear Sir: The laws of the State are considered quite stringent, and provide pains and penalties quite severe for anyone acting directly or indirectly as agent for any insurance company not duly authorized to do business in this State. There is no question about the right of any individual to procure his own insurance where he pleases, and no law can be enacted by any State abridging that right; so in all cases where we send you application for insurance on property in Illinois, we wish to have it distinctly understood by you, as we have it understood by the assured, that we are the agents and representatives of the assured only, and we would request that in all cases you forward your bills for premiums to us, made out in the name of the assured, with the commission deducted by way of rebate to assured, namely: "John Jones, Dr., To—Insurance Company, of ——. Policy number, ——. Property ——. For ——. Premium, ——. Less Rebate, ——. Net balance due, ——" This will make the matter right at both ends of the line, and will clearly establish the fact between all parties concerned that we are acting only for the assured, as their agent and attorney in the matter.

Very Respectfully,
W. L. Caldwell, Treasurer and Secretary.

In addition to the above, before procuring a policy of insurance, the defendant corporation required the insured to execute a power of attorney as follows: "Know all Men, by these presents, That the People's Insurance Exchange, of Chicago, Illinois, is hereby appointed our agent and attorney to procure for us insurance as follows, viz: $— on —, as per forms approved and authorized by us. And it is agreed that for all such insurance placed in companies duly authorized to do business in the State of Illinois, when the policies are accepted by us, premium at the rate of — per cent shall be paid; for all insurance placed in companies not duly authorized to do business in the State of Illinois, when policy is accepted by us, a premium at the rate of — per cent shall be paid. It is further agreed that all difference in premium by reduction of the above rate, or any rebate, brokerage or commission that said People's Insurance Exchange may be able to secure for us, shall be paid to them; and the same shall be in full for all compensation as services rendered as agents aforesaid. Witness our hands and seals," etc.

In the argument much importance is attached to these documents by counsel for appellee. He says: "The evidence in this case clearly shows that every act done by the appellee was under specific and definite authority, and instruction by written power of attorney to act for and in behalf of the assured."

If the decision of the question involved rested solely upon the two documents referred to, there might be much force in the argument, but such is not the case. The various acts of the defendant corporation in the procuring of the insurance were proper matters for the consideration of the jury, in connection with the power of attorney, for the purpose of determining whether the corporation was acting in good faith, as agent of the insured, solely under the power of attorney, or whether the execution of that paper was obtained as a mere cover to conceal the true relation in which the corporation was acting. It appears from the evidence that the insurance was solicited by the defendant corporation. The policies were issued upon the representation of its officers; the insurance companies relying solely upon their statements as to the condition and situation of the property to be insured. The policies were sent by mail to the defendant. It took charge of them, and delivered them to the insured, collected the premium, and remitted the same to the insurance companies, deducting commissions. In certain cases policies were sent to the defendant corporation, and its officers submitted them to the insured, for their examination and acceptance, or rejection. If they should be accepted, the amount of insurance would be paid over to the defendant; if rejected, defendant returned the policies to the insurance companies. Were all these acts done as agent for the persons who desired insurance, or were they done in a different capacity? We think the question was one for the jury, upon due consideration of all the evidence.

In order to make out a case, the plaintiff was not required to establish the fact that the defendant was the agent for the foreign insurance companies, in the sense the term "agent" is ordinarily used, as seems to be supposed by counsel for appellee in his argument. The Act under which the action was instituted has an important bearing on this question. It says: "The term 'agent or agents,' used in this section, shall include an acknowledged agent, surveyor, broker, or any other person or persons who shall in any manner aid in transacting the insurance business of any insurance company not incorporated by the laws of this State."

Suppose the defendant corporation was not the agent of the foreign insurance companies, in the ordinary sense of that term, still, if in any manner aided these companies in the transaction of the business, it will, within the meaning of the Act, be liable. Pierce v. People, 106 Ill. 18.

Whether, therefore, the defendant corporation had in any manner aided in transacting the insurance business in which the foreign insurance companies were engaged, was a question for the jury, under all the evidence, and that question of fact should not have been taken from the jury by the instruction of the court.

The judgment of the Superior Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Messrs. Richard Price and Austin Blair for defendants, appellees.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought in the Circuit Court for the County of Jackson, on the common counts in assumpsit, to recover for goods sold and delivered to the defendants, doing business at Jackson as Peter Ferguson & Co.

The defendants are husband and wife, and the plaintiffs sought to show that, after their marriage, they formed a copartnership, and carried on the retail carpet business in the City of Jackson under the firm name of Peter Ferguson & Co., and that during such time the goods involved in this suit were sold to them; that Margaret W. Ferguson was, at the time of the formation of such copartnership, possessed of property in her own right, of the value of $20,000, and furnished the entire capital for the business, and provided a place to carry on such business; that Peter Ferguson had no means, and was to and did manage the business; that the copartnership continued until after the last item of goods mentioned in the bill of particulars was sold.

This evidence was objected to by defendants' counsel, on the ground that it was not competent for husband and wife to enter into a copartnership with each other. The circuit court sustained the objection, and directed a verdict for defendants. Plaintiffs bring the case to this court by writ of error.

The only question arising is whether the husband and wife can enter into a contract of partnership between themselves, and thus render themselves jointly liable for the contracts of the firm thus established. At the common law married women were incapable of forming a partnership, since they were disabled, generally, to contract or to engage in trade; and the husband and wife were wholly incapacitated to contract with each other. Whatever rights or powers the husband and wife have to contract with each other, or that the wife may have to enter into a copartnership to carry on trade or business, must be conferred by our Constitution and statutes.

There was never any impediment to the acquisition of property through purchase by a married woman. The difficulty was that at the common law the ownership passed immediately to the husband by virtue of the marriage relation. Our statute has not removed all the common law disabilities of a married woman. It has not conferred upon her the power of a feme sole, except in certain directions. It has only provided that her real and personal estate acquired before marriage, and all property real and personal to which she may afterwards become entitled, in any manner, shall be and remain her estate, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, and engagements of her husband, and may be contracted, sold, transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, and bequeathed by her as if she were unmarried; and she may sue and be sued in relation to her sole property as if she were unmarried. How. Stat. §§ 6295-6297.

In all other respects she is a feme covert, and subject to all the restraints and disabilities consequent upon that relation.

A partnership is a contract of two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor and skill, or some one or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, and to divide the profits and bear the loss in certain proportions. That a married woman may, when she has her separate estate, be a copartner with a person other than her husband, is held in many States tingly, 7 West. Rep. 912, 110 Ind. 197; Rosa v. Prather, 1 West. Rep. 267, 103 Ind. 191; Arnold v. Engleman, 1 West. Rep. 483, 103 Ind. 512. A married woman has the same power to make executory contracts, and is as much bound thereby, as if she was unmarried, except that she cannot, without her husband joining her, enter into any executory contract to sell or convey or mortgage her real estate; nor can she convey or mortgage the same (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5117); nor can she enter into any contract of suretyship, whether as indorser, guarantor, or in any other manner (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5119). McLead v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 5 West. Rep. 633, 107 Ind. 594; Ward v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 6 West. Rep. 596, 108 Ind. 801; Jones v. Ewing, 5 West. Rep. 542, 107 Ind. 318. Where statutes give a married woman power to sell and contract as to her separate property and to carry on business, she may invest it in a partnership. Her separate property is still hers, and does not become liable for her husband's debts. Plumer v. Lord, 5 Allen, 460; Abbott v. Jackson, 43 Ark. 212; Dupuy v. Shuck, 57 Iowa, 361; Silveus v. Porter, 74 Pa. 448; Newman v. Morris, 52 Miss. 402. And see Edwards v. Thomas, 66 Mo. 468, 481; 1 Bates, Partn. §§ 137, 138. But where the statutes give her no power, or only a limited power, to become a partner, the rule of the common law prevails and she cannot enter a firm. Bradstreet v. Baer, 41 Md. 19; Frank v. Anderson, 13 Lea, 695; Carey v. Burruss, 20 W. Va. 571; Brown v. Jewett, 18 N. H. 230; Todd v. Clapp, 118 Mass. 496; and dicta in Haas v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 384; Brown v. Chancellor, 61 Tex. 437, 445; Miller v. Marx, 65 Tex. 131; Howard v. Stephens, 52 Miss. 239. Nevertheless the question was raised whether a married woman could become liable as a partner by so holding herself out, in Rittenhouse v. Leigh, 57 Miss. 697. Where the statute allows her to carry on a trade separately from her husband, the employment of their husbands by a firm of wives is carrying on business separately from the husbands, since they are agents, and not owners. Kutcher v. Williams, 2 Cent. Rep. 178, 40 N. J. Eq. 436. When a married woman carries on a business under the assumed name of a partnership, she may be sued in the partnership name, and cannot plead her coverture in defense of the action. Le Grand v. Eufaula Nat. Bank, 51 Ala. 123. Her copartners cannot deny her capacity to sue alone for an accounting and dissolution. Bitter v. Rathman, 61 N. Y. 512. A married executrix of the estate of a deceased partner, the firm being continued by wife, is not a partner, for she receives profits as executrix and not from her own estate. Brasfield v. French, 59 Miss. 632.

under the Married Woman's Statutes. But where the statute gives her no power, or only a limited power, to become a partner, the rule of the common law provides that she cannot enter a firm. It has been held by a great preponderance of authorities, even under the broadest statutes, that a married woman has no capacity to contract a partnership with her husband, or, in other words, to become a member of a firm in which her husband is a partner, even in those States in which she may embark in another partnership; and though she holds herself out as such partner, and her means give credit to the firm, she is held not liable for the debts, as she cannot, by acts or declarations, remove her own disabilities. Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127; Rowker v. Bradford, 1 New Eng. Rep. 457, 140 Mass. 521; Hans v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 884; Payne v. Thompson, 3 West. Rep. 158, 44 Ohio St. 104; Kaufman v. Schoeffel, 87 Hun, 140; Cor v. Miller, 54 Tex. 16; Mayer v. Soyser, 30 Md. 402.

In this State a married woman was subject to the common-law disabilities of coverture until the passage of the Married Woman's Act of 1855, How. Stat. §§ 6295-6299.

This Act does not touch a wife's interests in her husband's property; and these remain under the restrictions of the common law, unless they are removed by some other statute. The wife's common-law disabilities are only partially removed by the Act, and one who relies on a wife's contract must show the facts in order that it may appear whether she had capacity to make it. Edwards v. McEnhill, 51 Mich. 161.

Under our statutes a wife has no power to contract except in regard to her separate property. The Constitution and statutes are clear against her right to make a mere personal obligation unconnected with property, and not charging it, so that she cannot become personally bound jointly with her husband, nor as a surety, by mere personal promise. De Vries v. Conklin, 23 Mich. 255; West v. Laraway, 28 Mich. 464; Emery v. Lord, 26 Mich. 481.

In Jenn v. Marble, 87 Mich. 825, Mr. Justice Campbell, speaking in reference to a lease, said: "The language of the statute is no broader than the equitable rules concerning separate property, laid down in the same words in most of the old decisions. The disabilities of testimony are entirely inconsistent with the idea that husband and wife may deal with each other as third persons can. This is impossible, if they cannot testify concerning these contracts; and when the law recognizes, as it always has done, the peculiar power of substantial coercion possessed by husbands over wives, it would not be proper to infer any legal intent to remove protection against such influence from any vague provisions which no one supposes were ever actually designed to reach such a result, and which can only be made to do it by an extended construction. Anyone can readily see the mischiefs of allowing persons thus related to put themselves habitually in business antagonism; and legislation which can be construed as permitting it is so radically opposed to the system which is found embodied in our statutes generally that it should be plain enough to admit of no other meaning.

It is the purpose of these statutes to secure to a married woman the right to acquire and hold property separate from her husband, and free from his influence and control; and if she might enter into a business partnership with her husband it would subject her property to his control in a manner wholly inconsistent with the separation which it is the purpose of the statute to secure, and might subject her to an indefinite liability for his engagements. A contract of partnership with her husband is not included within the power granted by our statute to married women.

This doctrine was laid down in Bassett v. Shepardon, 52 Mich. 8, and we see no reason for departing from it. The important and sacred relations between man and wife, which lie at the very foundation of civilized society, are not to be disturbed and destroyed by contentions which may arise from such a community of property and a joint power of disposal and a mutual liability for the contracts and obligations of each other.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County (Speed, J.), brought by defendants, to review a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action for work, labor and material. Reversed.

The facts, and question presented, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Hawley for defendants, appellants.

Mr. John Ward, for plaintiffs, appellees:

Howell's Statutes, § 6295, providing that all property, real and personal, which a woman may acquire before or after marriage, shall be and remain the property of such female, and section 6297, providing that actions may be brought by and against a married woman in relation to her sole property in the same manner as if she was unmarried, have been construed liberally in the direction of conferring on married women the right to acquire and hold property and to contract regarding it.

Tillman v. Shackleton, 15 Mich. 447; De Vries v. Conklin, 23 Mich. 256; West v. Laraway, 28 Mich. 464.

Real and personal estate mentioned in section 6295, and sole property in section 6297, are coextensive and equivalent to property rights, and contracts pertaining to such rights are valid.

Reed v. Buys, 44 Mich. 80.

The wife had an entirety in the property, a right to occupy it during the joint lives of the defendants, and to the sole ownership of it if she should be the survivor of them.

Fisher v. Provin, 25 Mich. 347; Jacobs v. Miller, 50 Mich. 120.

Such a right is one regarding which, under the statute, she might contract.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne, to recover for work and labor and material furnished by plaintiffs in the erection of a building on premises owned jointly by defendants, who are husband and wife. Plaintiffs had verdict and judgment in the court below for $297.67. Defendants bring error.

On the trial plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that between the 22d day of October and the 7th day of December, 1883, they made a contract with the defendants jointly for furnishing the material and doing the work in building and repairing a dwelling-house and saloon upon premises owned jointly by the defendants in the City of Detroit; that the contract price was $306, and the extra work done $12.50. At the time the contract was first talked over the defendants were together, and agreed to let the plaintiffs know the next day whether they should go on with the job. The next day Mrs. Opfer called upon the plaintiffs and said they should go forward with the work. When the work was about half completed, plaintiffs called upon Mrs. Opfer for money, when she told them she had it in the bank, and the next day would pay them $100. No part has ever been paid.

A married woman cannot execute any valid release of her dower in the real estate of her husband in any other way than by joining with him in a conveyance to a third person. Tompkins v. Fonda, 4 Paige, 448; Malony v. Horan, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 295. The joining with the husband in his conveyance is but a release by the wife of a contingent future right, and operates against her but by way of estoppel. Malloney v. Horan, 49 N. Y. 118, 10 Am. Rep. 339. At common law the promise of a feme covert could not be enforced against her, unless she had a separate estate. No personal decree could be made against her, but her contract operated as an appointment out of her separate estate. Authorities cited in Condon v. Barr, 4 Cent. Rep. 559, 49 N. J. L. 53. The contract of a married woman, unless for the benefit of herself or her separate estate, cannot be enforced against her estate. Stowell v. Grider, 46 Ark. 220. A verbal prom-

Rep. 157. Where it distinctly appears that the cop-

The claim on the part of defendants is that the work was not done in accordance with the terms of the contract, but was so bad as to be practically worthless. Evidence was then given by plaintiffs that the work was done in accordance with the contract. The defendant, John Opfer, also testified that the contract was made with himself alone, and that his wife was not a party to it.

It was shown on the trial, and not disputed, that the defendants were husband and wife, and that the premises on which the work was done had been deeded to them jointly, as husband and wife, about three months before the making of the contract, and that they occupied the premises at the time of the making of the contract, and had continued to occupy them ever since. But while the repairs were going on the defendants did not occupy exclusively the portion of the building undergoing repairs. The building was a saloon and dwelling-house together.

At the close of the testimony the counsel for defendants requested the court to instruct the jury: (1) that in this case no verdict can be rendered against Mrs. Opfer; (2) that, under the pleadings and evidence, the plaintiffs cannot recover. These instructions the court refused to give, but submitted the questions to the jury upon the claims made by the respective parties under the contract, directing the jury that, if the contract was made with the two defendants and the work was done in substantial compliance with the contract, their verdict must be for the plaintiffs; if not so done, then the jury should allow what the work was reasonably worth. If, however, the contract was made with John Opfer alone and not with the two jointly, then the plaintiffs could not recover.

Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to give defendants' requests in charge to the jury, and upon the charge of the court directing the jury that if they found the work was not in substantial compliance with the contract, yet, if they found there had been an acceptance of the work—that is, if the defendants had the benefit of it, availed themselves of it—then the plaintiff should recover what the reasonable value of the work was, irrespective of the contract. Under this charge the jury found that the contract was a joint one between the husband and wife, but made some deductions by reason of the work not having been done in accordance with the contract, and undoubtedly undertook to allow what the work was worth.

The real point in controversy here is, however, whether the wife can be held liable upon a joint contract with her husband for improvements made upon real property owned by them jointly. By the rules of the common law, a married woman has no power to bind herself by contract, or to acquire to herself and for her exclusive benefit any right by a contract made with her. A married woman could not be

In the management and control of her separate property, when acting by agents, a feme covert is answerable for the frauds of her agent while acting within the scope of the agency, although the fraud may be without her knowledge or assent. Baum v. Mul-len, 47 N. Y. 577; Bodine v. Killeen, 53 N. Y. 93. She will not be estopped by a recital in the mortgage, if in fact the loan was to her husband, where the facts are known to the lender. Orr v. White, 4 West. Rep. 432, 108 Ind. 341. The mere signing of the paper and receiving and passing over the money to her husband does not give it even the semblance of a loan to the wife. The debt is her husband's notwithstanding. Veal v. Hurt, 63 Ga. 723; Way v. Peck, 47 Conn. 23; Atthol Mach. Co. v. Fuller, 107 Mass. 437. A wife's common-law disability to make a contract for the purchase of real estate exists as fully as it did before the enactment of the Married Woman's Act of March 23, 1875. McFerran v. Kinney, 5 West. Rep. 44, 22 Mo. App. 554.

Estoppel, doctrine applies to married women. The tendency of modern authority is strongly towards the enforcement of the estoppel against married women as against persons sui juris, with little or no limitation on account of their disability. And where by fraud, misrepresentation or concealment she leads another into contracting with her, she will not be permitted to gainsay representations which may have induced another to act, who in good faith relied on them. Cupp v. Campbell, 1 West. Rep. 233, 108 Ind. 713; Oglesby Coal Co. v. Pasco, 79 Ill. 164; Powell's App., 98 Pa. 403; Bigelow, Estop. 513; Cooley, Tort. 117. Wherever statutes have gone further and enabled married women to enter into contracts as though single, there is, of course, no reason why the doctrine of estoppel should not apply to them without any limitation (see 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 373, citing Dingens v. Clancey, 67 Barb. 568; Fryer v. Rishell, 84 Pa. 331; Towles v. Fisher, 77 N. C. 437; *Godfrey v. sued upon a mere personal contract made during coverture, although joined with her husband, as she had no general power to contract. Whatever power the wife has to contract is conferred by the Constitution and statutes. Our statute has not removed all the common law disabilities of married women. It has not conferred upon her the powers of a feme sole, except in certain directions. She has no power to contract except in regard to her separate property. How. Stat. §§ 6295-6297; Jenne v. Marble, 87 Mich. 319.

In this case the property to be improved and benefited was held by husband and wife jointly, and not as the separate property of the wife. Only at the death of the husband could the wife claim it as her separate property. During the lives of both neither has an absolute inheritable interest; neither can be said to hold an undivided half. They take by entirety. And at the death of the wife the whole passes at once to the husband. Manwaring v. Powell, 40 Mich. 871; Allen v. Allen, 47 Mich. 71; Etna Ins. Co. v. Lesh, 40 Mich. 241.

Neither has such a separate interest that he or she can sell, incumber or devise, or which his or her heir could inherit. Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559; Kisher v. Provin, 25 Mich. 347.

It is an entirety in which both take the same and inseparable interest. Neither can affect the other's rights by a separate transfer, and whatever will defeat the interest of one will defeat the other's. Vinton v. Beamer, supra. This is not such separate property of the wife as the statute gives her power to make contracts in relation to. She can neither sell, incumber nor control it while living, nor devise it at her death. It is not like property which she inherits, which she may dispose of at will.

These common-law disabilities of a married woman being only partially removed by our statutes, one who relies upon a wife's contract must show that it relates to her separate property. The wife is liable to be sued upon contracts or engagements made by her in cases where her husband is not in law liable.

In Bassett v. Shepardon, 52 Mich. 8, this court held that the wife could not become a partner in business with her husband. This ruling is followed in Artman v. Ferguson, ante, 343 (decided at the present term of this court). In Russel v. People's Sav. Bank, 39 Mich. 671, Mr. Justice Cooley, in speaking of a case in which a married woman had indorsed the note of a corporation, says: "Such a contract is therefore not within the words of the statute. Neither is it within the spirit of the statute, for that had in view the relieving of the wife of disabilities which operated unfairly and oppressively, and which hampered her in the control and disposition of her property for the benefit of herself and her family. It was not its purpose to give her a general power to

So where the husband has taken title to property in his own name, with his wife's knowledge, and she has permitted him for years to represent the property to be his, equity will not protect the property from the husband's creditors, even if the design to create a trust in favor of the wife were clearly established by the evidence. *Budd v. render herself personally responsible upon engagements for any and every consideration which would support a promise at the common law . . . The test of competency is to be found in this: that it does or does not deal with the individual estate. Possible incidental benefits cannot support it."

There is no conflict of authority upon this question, that the contract of a married woman, to be enforced, must have relation to her separate estate. In the present case, the property being held by husband and wife jointly, by entireties, it cannot be treated as her separate property so that she becomes liable under the contract, even if one was made as claimed by the plaintiffs. The action cannot be maintained against the defendants jointly. As this must dispose of the case, we need not discuss the other questions raised.

CORLIES, Chapman & Drake, Appts.

"A lease of a building contained a provision that if at any time during the term the demise premises "should be rendered partially untenable by fire or the elements," but the business of the lessee could still be conducted therein while the same were being repaired, then the lessor should repair the same as soon as practicable, the occupancy of the lessee to continue during such repairs, and for such occupancy he should pay the fair value until the repairs were completed, and thereafter the rent stipulated in the lease, as if no such disturbance had occurred. During the time the basement of the building became so wet and unhealthy as to be untenable by reason of springs of water percolating and oozing through and under the basement walls.

Held, that the basement was not rendered untenable "by the elements," within the meaning of the lease. That it refers only to some sudden, unusual or unexpected action of the elements, as floods, tornadoes and the like, occurring during the term, and not to the natural and ordinary results of an efficient cause existing at the time of the demise, such as the manner of construction of the building or the nature of the soil upon which it was erected.

A PPEAL by defendant, a corporation, from a judgment of the District Court of Ramsey County (Wilkin, J.), in favor of the plaintiffs in an action for rent. Affirmed.

The facts, and question presented, are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Young & Lightner for appellants.

Messrs. Warner & Lawrence for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant leased from the plaintiff, for a term of years, the first story and basement of a brick building in the City of St. Paul. The lease contained the following provision, to wit: "If at any time during said term the demise premises shall be rendered partially untenable by fire or the elements, but so that the business then being done therein can be successfully conducted therein while the same are being repaired, then said party of the first part

(the lessor) shall properly repair the same as soon as practicable, after notice thereof in writing, and occupancy and use thereof shall be continued during said repairs, and for such occupancy and use the fair value thereof shall be paid instead of said rent, until such repairs shall have been completed; whereupon, and thereafter rent under and according to this lease shall be thereafter paid as if no such disturbance had occurred."

The court below found that during the term "The said basement became so damp and wet and unhealthy as to be untenable and unfit for use by the defendant in its business; that said premises were so rendered untenable by springs of water percolating and oozing through and under the walls of said basement from the exterior of said building."

The sole question is whether upon these facts the basement was rendered untenable "by the elements," within the meaning of the lease.

The terms "the elements" and "damages by the elements" are somewhat uncertain and indefinite expressions; and very little aid will be derived from resorting to any technical or scientific discussion of the meaning of the word elements. We should rather look to see whether the word has received any fixed and accepted meaning in the language of leases, and take the contract by its four corners and try to ascertain how such an expression would be ordinarily understood by conveyancers and business men. The expression "by fire or the elements" occurs twice elsewhere in this lease. Immediately preceding the provision quoted is one to the effect that if the premises shall at any time during the term be rendered wholly untenable "by fire or the elements," and the injured premises can be rebuilt or repaired within three months; then the lessor is to rebuild or repair, if the lessee shall so request, "within ten days after such occurrences;" otherwise such occurrences shall operate to terminate the lease.

It is apparent that the expression "by fire or the elements" is used in the same sense in both instances.

The lease also contains a covenant on part of the lessee to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in as good condition as the same were in when occupation under the lease began, usual wear and tear of reasonable and careful use thereof "and destruction thereof or injury thereto by fire or the elements excepted." We think, with the defendant, that the expression is here used also in the same sense.

The lease contains no covenant on part of the lessor to make repairs except those above quoted, and hence he was not bound to do so, much less to make improvements or betterments; the policy of the law being to require the tenant, before he takes a lease, to examine the premises and elect, once for all, whether they will suit his purpose.

While the finding is silent upon the subject, it is fair to assume that the percolation of water into the basement was not the result of any extraordinary or unusual occurrence, such as a flood or freshet, or of any cause originating subsequent to the demise, but was the natural result of a cause fully existing at and prior to the date of the lease, such as the wet or springy character of the soil on which the building is erected or that adjacent, or some inherent defect in the plan of its structure, as the lack of proper drains to carry off the water of the oozing springs.

In such a case although the existence of the cause or its effects may not have developed until subsequently during a wetter season of the year, yet the efficient cause existed at the date of the demise, and the results were but the natural and ordinary operations of the laws of nature. To remedy such a defect would not in any proper sense be repairs, but a betterment—putting the building in better condition than it in fact was when demised. It can hardly be said that the parties intended by these clauses of the lease literally to include every case of untenantableness or partial untenantableness “by the elements.” Every case of damage to or destruction of human structures, not caused by animal force, may, in one sense, be said to be caused by the elements, as, for example, ordinary gradual decay. But it would hardly be claimed that such a case would be within the meaning of the provisions of the lease. Or suppose because of the manner of its construction it should have proved, when winter arrived, that the basement was untenantable because of the cold, it would scarcely be urged that this came within the terms of the lease. We think that the language of the lease refers only to some sudden, unusual or unexpected action of the elements occurring during the term, such as floods, tornadoes or the like, extraordinary disasters not anticipated by either party, the efficient cause of which originated after the term began, and which either destroyed the building or left it in a materially and essentially worse condition than it was in when leased. We think this is substantially the sense in which such expressions in leases have always been used and in which they would now be ordinarily understood by business men in executing such contracts.

Fire is one of the elements in the same sense as water and wind are such; but inasmuch as fires, not from lightning, are usually caused by the intervention of human agency, there might be a question whether such damages were caused “by the elements;” and hence the word fire was added to the phrase which has formed a part of the “surrender” and similar clauses in leases almost from time immemorial.

The effect of the intervention of human agency in producing the damage was the point upon which two courts differed in the cases of Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, and Van Wormer v. Crans, 51 Mich. 372—a question upon the discussion of which we have no occasion to enter.

Defendant attempts to support its contention by arguing that if the untenantableness of the basement was not caused “by the elements,” within the meaning of the provisions of the lease, then it is not an injury by the elements, within the meaning of the exception in the “surrender” clause; and consequently it would be bound to repair or remedy the defect, which it is claimed would be unreasonable. But to our minds the force of the illustration is directly against the defendant. Under this covenant the tenant is not required to make betterments or to surrender the premises in better condition than when he entered, or to remedy defects then existing, which he clearly would if he was compelled to change the building so as to prevent the percolation of water into the basement.

Our conclusion is in accordance with the views of the court below, viz.: that the damage occasioned by the percolation of water through the side walls was not caused “by the elements,” within the meaning of the lease.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

STATE, DARCY, Prosecutrix,

DARCY et al.

(....N. J. Law....)

*A mortgage owned by a resident of this State, although made upon land situate in another State, where a tax upon such land has been assessed and paid within the preceding twelve months, is taxable here.

*Head note by the COURT.

NOTE.—Taxation of mortgage, not double taxation. The Constitution does not prohibit a State from taxing one of its resident citizens for a debt held by him, due by a resident of another State, and evidenced by the bond of the debtor, secured by deed

ON certiorari to board of assessment and revision of taxes of the City of Newark. Tax affirmed.

This writ brings up an assessment for taxes made against Caroline M. Darcy, the prosecutrix, living in the City of Newark. It is an assessment for the amount of a mortgage for $1,300, made by James A. Chambers on lands and premises in Greenwood County, in the State of Kansas.

The cause was argued upon the following statement of facts, agreed upon by the respective counsel for the purpose of the argument.

of trust or mortgage upon real estate situated in the State in which the debtor resides. Kirland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491 (25 L. ed. 558); S. C. 42 Conn. 426; Nevada Bank v. Sedgwick, 104 U. S. 111 (26 L. ed. 708); Desty, Tarn. 62. Although the status of real estate, by which debts are secured, is within the State, the trust deeds are mere incidents—choices

(1) The prosecutrix is the owner of a mortgage on lands in Greenwood County, Kan., for $1,800, on which interest is payable semi-annually at 6 per centum per annum.

(2) She claims before the defendants (making under oath according to law a statement of her taxable property) that the same was not taxable, on the ground that the mortgagor had paid a tax on the full value of the land in the State of Kansas, and within one year from the date of this assessment, the said mortgagor claiming no deduction from the taxable value of said land on account of said mortgage.

(3) Prosecutrix's said claim was disallowed, and an assessment made on all her personal property, including the said mortgage, on June 1, 1888, by the defendants.

(4) No deduction from the taxable value of the land covered by the said mortgage was claimed by or allowed to the mortgagor, or anyone for him, but the tax on the full value thereof was actually assessed and paid within one year from this date, and the date of commencing the assessment in New Jersey; nor did the mortgagor make any claim for deduction on account of the debt evidenced by the bond and mortgage of the prosecutrix.

(5) The Laws of the State of Kansas, relating to the taxation of property in that State, may be shown and referred to as if herein set out and made a part of this state of the case.

Argued before Scudder and Reed, JJ.

Mr. Robert R. McCarter for prosecutrix.

Mr. Joseph Coult for defendants.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 61 of the General Act concerning taxes (Revision, 1150) provides that all real and personal estate within this State, whether owned by individuals or by corporations, shall be liable to taxation at the full and actual value thereof.

Section 63 of the same Act provides "That the term 'personal estate,' as used in this Act, shall be construed to include goods and chattels of every description, including steamboats and other vessels, money, debts due or owing from solvent debtors, whether on contract, note, bond, mortgage, or book account, public stocks and stocks in a corporation, whether said personal estate be within or without this State."

Section 64 provides that "Stocks and other personal estate owned by citizens of this State, situate and being out of this State, upon which taxes shall have been actually assessed and paid within twelve months next before the day prescribed by law for commencing the assessment, shall be exempt from taxation."

The counsel for the prosecutrix claims that this mortgage is within the exemption words of the 64th section. The insistence is that this mortgage represents property situated within the State of Kansas, which property has been there assessed and the taxes paid within the required period. The mortgage is treated as representing an estate or interest in land, and as having a situs in the jurisdiction where the land lies.

In the case of State, King, v. Reed, 48 N. J. L. 186, a question arose as to whether one of the assessors appointed to make a special assessment of damages was disqualified by reason of his ownership of property in the Town of Union and the Township of West Hoboken. The statute disqualified him if he was the owner of property within either of those places. It was urged that he was the owner of property within the towns, because it appeared that he held a mortgage upon lands lying therein. It was held that a mortgage is a personal chattel, and has no situs but the domicile of the owner, and that the fact that the land upon which it was an incumbrance happened to lie in the prescribed territory did not bring the assessor within the disqualifying clause of the statute. This case was affirmed in the court of errors in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Cent. Rep. 93.

In the case of Wade v. Miller, 82 N. J. L. 296, the Chief Justice remarked: "Except in questions arising between him and the mortgagor, or his assigns, the interest of the mortgagee appears to have lost every quality of an estate. Such an interest will not make the mortgagee a freeholder. If he enters and holds

v. wards. McCoppin v. McCartney, 60 Cal. 267; Cooley, Taxn. 178.

The mortgage is but a security for the debt, and the right of the creditor to proceed against the property mortgaged, and upon a given contingency to enforce, by its sale, payment of his demand, has no locality independent of the party in whom it resides, and it may undoubtedly be taxed by the State when held by a resident therein. Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 490 (25 L. ed. 508). Except between the immediate parties the mortgagor before foreclosure is owner of the property; his interest is real estate, to be conveyed, attached, taxed and inherited only as such, while the interest of the mortgagee is mere personal estate. Waterbury Sav. Bank v. Lawler, 48 Conn. 245; Lacoe v. Davenport, 18 Conn. 341; Punderson v. Brown, 1 Day, 98; Gunn v. Scovill, 4 Day, 242; Toby v. Reed, 9 Conn. 224. In Maryland mortgages may be taxed in the hands of the mortgagees, though the land is taxed also (Appeal Tax Court v. Rice, 50 Md. 502); so in Minnesota (State v. Jones, 34 Minn. 251); so in Alabama (Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Lott, 54 Ala. 499); so in Nevada. State v. Carson City Sav. Bank, 17 Nev. 148. In New Jersey the assessor is to deduct from the valuation of land a mortgage upon it, if the owner of the land claims the deduction. It is competent to make this provision even as to mortgages previously given (State v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98); but a mortgage which is not taxable is not to be deducted. State v. Trenton, 40 N. J. L. 89.

the property, he is obliged to account to the mortgagor, as owner, for rents and profits. If the money due on his bond is paid to him, his connection with the land is dissolved; for there is no necessity for a reconveyance, and at his death the mortgagee's interest passes to his representatives as personality. In these and in all other particulars the land seems to be a mere pledge in equity for the payment of the debt.

In the case of State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 800 [21 L. ed. 179], the Supreme Court of the United States held that the State of Pennsylvania had no power to tax the bonds held by a nonresident of that State, although the bonds were secured by a mortgage upon property situated in that State. It was held that the power of taxation in the State was limited to a person's property and business within the State, and that neither the person nor the property then taxed were so situated. Justice Field remarked that "It is undoubtedly true that the actual situs of personal property which has a visible or tangible existence, and not the domicile of its owner, will in many cases determine the State in which it may be taxed. The same thing is true of public securities consisting of state bonds and bonds of municipal bodies, and circulating notes of banking institutions. The former by general usage have acquired the character of and are treated as property in the place where they are found, though removed from the domicile of the owner. The latter are treated and pass as money wherever they are. But other personal property, consisting of bonds, mortgages, and debts generally, has no situs independent of the domicile of the owner, and certainly can have none where the instruments, as in the present case, constituting the evidences of debt, are not separated from the possession of the owners."

Among the cases cited by Mr. Justice Field in his opinion is that of People v. Eastman, 25 Cal. 603. The Statute of California requires all property to be taxed in the county where situated. "The mortgage," said the court, "has no existence independent of the thing secured by it. A payment of the debt discharges the mortgage. The thing secured is intangible, and has no situs distinct and apart from the residence of the holder. It pertains to and follows the person. The same debt may at the same time be secured by a mortgage upon land in every county in the State; and, if the mere fact that the mortgage exists in a particular county gives the property in the mortgage a situs subjecting it to taxation in that county, a party, without further legislation, might be called upon to pay the tax several times, for the lien for taxes attaches at the same time in every county in the State, and the mortgage in one county may be a different one from that in another, although the debt secured is the same."

It is perceived that the purport of the above cited opinion is: first, that a mortgage has no situs but that of the owner for any purpose, including that of taxation; and second, that a State Legislature has no power to fix a situs, other than that of the owner, for the purpose of imposing a tax upon its owner, who is in a foreign jurisdiction, and it must be kept in mind that what is said in those cases is said in respect of mortgages where the holder of the security and the owner of the land mortgaged are in different jurisdictions, or is said in respect of mortgages the owners of which and the land upon which they are secured are in the same State, and there has been no legislative provision relative to the place of their taxation.

While it is clear, under the rule enunciated by the federal courts, that a State Legislature cannot impose a tax upon a mortgage upon lands within this State if such mortgage is owned by the resident of another State, yet it is equally clear that the Legislature can exempt from taxation a mortgage held by its citizens upon land in another State, or can exempt land owned by a citizen subject to a mortgage held by a resident of another State. So, also, it seems clear that although, in the absence of legislative direction, all debts, including those secured by mortgages, are taxable to the owner and his domicile, yet the Legislature has the undoubted ability to provide for their taxation elsewhere, so long as such provision does not contravene the constitutional requirement that property shall be taxed under general laws, and by uniform rules, according to its true value. State v. Brannin, 28 N. J. L. 484-496.

The result deducible from these cases appears to be that the mortgage taxed in the present case had its situs in the City of Newark; that there was no legislative provision changing the rule in this respect; and that the taxation of the land upon which it was secured in the State of Kansas cannot be regarded as a taxation of the mortgage; for if so regarded, it would be clearly beyond the power of the Legislature of Kansas to accomplish. The attention of the court was called to the case of State v. Runyon, 41 N. J. L. 98.

It is insisted that the doctrine enunciated in that case is inimical to this conclusion. The only question, as I understand the decision in that case, was whether a debt secured by a mortgage was thereby so differentiated from other debts as to make a rule applicable to the former alone a general rule. The Legislature had expressly declared that mortgages should be taxed, either as mortgages or as land, at the place where the land was situated. The question in the case was one of legislative power and not of legislative intention. The court held that a mortgage had such a character by reason of its representing a qualified interest in land that it could be localized with the Legislature, and taxed at the domicile of the mortgagor. The language used in the opinion was employed exclusively in respect to that question.

Again: it is claimed that the legislative policy in this State has been averse to the taxation of both the mortgage and the land upon which the mortgage is a lien. It is therefore urged that it must have been the legislative intent to regard a mortgage, and an interest in the land equal to the amount of the mortgage, as identical subjects of taxation in all cases where the statutes speak of property which has paid a tax within twelve months preceding; but, in the absence of expressed words, I do not regard this as a natural inference.

Because either the mortgage or the land is relieved from taxation when both are within this State, it does not follow that the Legislature intended to apply the same rule when the land is beyond our jurisdiction.

We must remember that the Legislature has recognized a difference between debts owing to domestic and those owing to foreign creditors. While legislative policy permits the former to be deducted from the ratables of the debtor, it takes no cognizance of the former. The policy which permits a reduction for debts is induced by a desire to avoid double taxation; for if the debtor pays taxes for all his property, and is permitted no deduction for the unpaid price of the same property, while the creditor is also taxed for such price, it is double taxation, as obviously as if the price was secured by a pledge or a mortgage upon chattels or a mortgage upon land. A mortgage, while it has features which will justify exceptional legislative treatment, is but a debt secured by a lien upon land; and, unless the legislative intent is plain to otherwise regard it, the credit is the thing which taxation reaches. 1 Desty, Taxn. 830.

I find no such legislative intention in the statutory clause invoked by the counsel of prosecutrix. In it mortgages are not mentioned, while in the statute concerning the taxation of mortgages upon land in this State the place of taxation is expressly fixed.

Our attention is again called to the condition of the law in respect to the taxation of stock in foreign corporations held by residents of this State. The cases are cited in which it is settled that a statute of this State exempting stocks in a corporation will exempt the property of the corporation, and a statute which exempts the property will exempt stock. State v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 532; State v. Branin, Id. 484; State v. Jones, 88 N. J. L. 89.

It is said that the theory upon which these cases go is that a taxation of the corporate property and of the stock of the corporation is identical.

It is also said that it has been the policy and practice since the enactment of the Statute of 1863, now embodied in the Revised Act (Revision, p. 1151, § 84), to exempt from taxation the stock of foreign corporations held by resident taxpayers.

The exemption of such stock from taxation has, so far as I am aware, not been expressly decided in this State; but, assuming that such stock is exempt, I do not perceive how this fact leads to the conclusion that mortgages upon foreign land are also exempt. In the first place, the exemption clause of the Tax Act uses the words, "stocks situate and being out of this State." The word mortgage, as I have before observed, nowhere appears. Secondly, in the light of the several changes in the law upon this subject—in the successive Acts of 1857, p. 475; 1862, p. 844; 1863, p. 500; 1866, p. 1078—in which the word stocks appears, viewed in connection with the previous decision of our courts, holding that stock in a foreign corporation held here was taxable, it may with much reason be concluded that all stocks of foreign corporations should be exempt, and that this exemption should apply to all certificates of stock in such corporations, whether the certificates were within or without this State, but there is no legislative history appertaining to mortgages similar to this.

The character of stocks as property is dissimilar from that of mortgage. The sum total of the property of the stockholders, as has been pointed out in the cases already cited in this State, is the sum total of the property of the corporation. It is substantially the indivision of all the property of the corporation. It is not a mere security for a debt which is the principal, but it is the thing itself; but, apart from this dissimilarity between stocks and mortgages, the use of the word stocks in addition to the words personal property, in the exemption clause of the statute, would seem to be an argument against including mortgages, which are unnamed, within the exemption.

The tax will be affirmed.

Bradley A. GRIFFIN

v.

MACON COUNTY.

(....Fed. Rep.....)

Overdue interest on bonds represented by negotiable coupons cannot be included in the recovery in an action on the bonds after an independent suit on the coupons has become barred by the Statute of Limitations.

NOTE—Coupon bonds; past due coupons attached. Negotiable bonds not due, with attached coupons past due and unpaid, do not thereby appear dishonored upon their face; but the presence of such unpaid coupons is a material circumstance bearing upon the question whether the purchaser acquired them in good faith, and without notice. Morton v. New Orleans & S. R. Co. 79 Ala. 590. Coupons past due, attached to a bond at the time of its transfer, do not affect the coupons which had not matured at that time, so that the equities good between the original parties will attach to them also. Miller v. Berlin, 13 Blatchf. 245; but compare First Nat. Bank v. Scott County, 14 Minn. 79; Burr. Pub. 2 L. R. A.

ON submission at law of the question whether interest installments due upon county bonds and represented by negotiable coupons, which fell due more than ten years before action was commenced upon the bonds, could be recovered in such action. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cunningham & Elliot for plaintiff.

Mr. R. G. Mitchell for defendant.

Secur. 582. When separated from the bond, so far as the right of action is concerned, they cease to be an incident of the bond. National Exch. Bank v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co. 8 R. I. 375. They do nothing more than represent, in a negotiable form, the payments of interest to become due on the bond, and the interest should be due and payable on the coupons at the same times at which it would be due and payable by the terms of the bond. Arents v. Com. 18 Gratt. 774. Burr. Pub. Secur. 573. They have the qualities of commercial paper, and are in this respect subject to the same rules as the bonds to which they are attached. Spooner v. Holmes, 108 Mass. 503; Haven v. Grand Junction R. & Depot Co.

Thayer, J., delivered the following opinion:

Plaintiff brings suit on six bonds, executed by Macon county. They bear date January 1, 1870, and matured January 1, 1883. In the body of the bond it is recited that the county will pay interest "at 10 per cent per annum, which interest shall be payable semi-annually, on the presentation of the coupons hereto annexed."

All of the coupons originally attached to the bonds have been detached except three which matured on and after July 1, 1878. In the first count of the petition plaintiff demands judgment for the principal sum due on the six bonds, and also interest thereon at 10 per cent per annum, from January 1, 1870, to January 1, 1878, and from January 1, 1883, to the date of rendition of judgment. The coupons that matured after January 1, 1878, and up to the maturity of the bonds, are sued on in the second count of the petition.

This suit was filed on April 20, 1883. It will be observed, therefore, that all the coupons on the bonds in question which matured on and prior to January 1, 1878, were more than ten years overdue when the said suit was filed, and for that reason an action on the coupons is barred by limitation. By suing on the bonds, and demanding judgment for the principal sum, together with all interest that accrued thereon up to January 1, 1878, the plaintiff seeks to avoid a plea of the Statute of Limitations, which could have been successfully interposed if he had declared on the coupons. Huey v. Macon County, 25 Fed. Rep. 481, and cases cited.

The point to be determined is whether such overdue interest can be recovered by declaring for it in a suit on the bonds, notwithstanding the fact that it could not be recovered by a suit on the coupons. The point is novel, and, so far as I am advised, has never been expressly determined. In several well considered cases it has been held that when money due on a note or bond is made payable by installments, the Statute of Limitations begins to run against each installment from the time it matures. Duck v. Stowell, 71 Pa. 208; Burkham v. Brown, 23 Maine, 400; Katabrook v. Moulton, 9 Mass. 258; Haywood v. Parrie, 10 Pick. 233.

But Mr. Wood, in his work on Limitation of Actions says that, "with singular inconsistency" it has been held in some cases that interest made payable annually is not subject to the same rule; that the statute does not run against interest installments payable annually, until the principal debt matures. Wood, Lim. Ac. § 126, p. 296.

In my opinion, there is no distinction in principle between a debt payable by installments and interest payable annually or semi-annually in installments. If the statute begins to run in the former case as soon as an installment of the debt matures, for equally good reasons it ought to run against interest installments as soon as they become payable. It is worthy of note that the few cases cited by Mr. Wood as holding that the Statute of Limitations will not run against interest installments until the principal matures, were suits upon notes or bonds to which no interest coupons were attached. Separate contracts to pay installments of interest at stated intervals were not annexed to the obligation to pay the debt. Grafton Bank v. Doe, 19 Vt. 463; Henderson v. Hamilton, 1 Hall, 214; Ferry v. Ferry, 2 Cush. 92.

The rulings made in the cases last mentioned appear to have been based on the ground that interest is a mere incident of a debt, and is so inseparably connected therewith that it may be recovered in connection with the debt when it matures; no matter for how long a period it has been overdue. By this was meant, I suppose, that the stipulation with reference to interest in the cases then under consideration formed an inseparable part of the promise or obligation to pay the principal debt. But if, as in the present case, the parties to a note or bond make independent stipulations as to interest, and put such stipulations in the form of negotiable coupons, which may be detached from the bond, and are intended to be detached and negotiated, no reason is perceived why the Statute of Limitations should not run, as soon as they mature, against all such installments of interest as are represented by such interest coupons.

It appears to me that it would be extremely technical, as well as illogical, to say that the Statute of Limitations runs against the promise contained in a coupon from the date of its maturity, but does not run against the same promise contained in the bond until the bond matures. In view of the fact that it has been held that the same period of limitation applies to a coupon that applies to a bond—that they are contracts of equal dignity—the true doctrine is, no doubt, that when an action to recover a given installment of interest cannot be mainained from the bonds, and they contain a promise to pay or an acknowledgment of the debt due, and an action of debt may be maintained on them. Knox County v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 229 (18 L. ed. 235); Thomson v. Lee County, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 227 (18 L. ed. 177); Nashville v. Potomac Ins. Co. 3 Baxt. 208; Beaver County v. Armstrong, 44 Pa. 62; *Spranger v. tained on a coupon by reason of lapse of time, such installment cannot be recovered by a suit on the bond. Kenosha v. Lamson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 482 [19 L. ed. 728]; Lerington v. Butler, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 296 [30 L. ed. 812].

The views here expressed are incidentally confirmed by the decision in Clark v. Iowa City, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 586 [23 L. ed. 428], although it is true that the precise question now before the court was not involved in that case. It was there held that coupons, when severed from municipal bonds, are negotiable, and pass by delivery, and that, when so severed, they cease to be mere incidents of the bonds, and become independent claims. It was further held that though bonds are canceled or paid before maturity, such coupons as are at the time outstanding in the hands of third parties do not lose their validity, but may be collected by the holder for value.

If outstanding unpaid coupons are not extinguished by the cancellation, payment, or surrender of the bonds to which they pertain, it is manifest that the interest which accrues from time to time on bonds with interest coupons annexed is not a mere incident of the debt, and is not so inseparably connected therewith that it may be recovered along with the principal debt in a suit on the bond, as distinguished from a suit on the coupon, regardless of the length of time such interest may have been overdue.

The question submitted to the court as to whether the interest installments which fell due more than ten years before the suit was filed may be recovered in an action on the bonds, is accordingly decided in the negative. Such interest installments are barred, unless the statute can be avoided by a plea of some of the exceptions which suspend its operation.

BACON, Baldwin & Co., Plfs. in Err.,
v.

JOE. HORNE & Co., Garnishees of Henry Schoenwald.

An assignment for creditors, made in New York in conformity with the laws of that State, passes the title to property in Pennsylvania as between residents of New York, although the assignment has never been recorded in Pennsylvania in accordance with the [Pennsylvania Act of May 3, 1885 (Pub. Laws, 412).

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 2 of Allegheny County (White, J.), brought by the plaintiff below to review a judgment in favor of garnishees in foreign attachment. Affirmed.

Action of foreign attachment in case, brought by the firm of Bacon, Baldwin & Co., against Henry Schoenwald, as defendant, and the firm of Joseph Horne & Co. as garnishees.

At the trial the jury found the following facts, in the form of a special verdict: (1) The foreign attachment in this case was issued September 15, 1886, and served on garnishees the same day. (2) Judgment was entered against defendant April 5, 1887, for $1,419.15. (3) On August 11, 1886, Henry Schoenwald made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, under the Laws of New York, which was duly recorded in New York City that day, and the trust accepted by the assignee. Both plaintiff and defendant were at that time, and are still, residents of the City of New York. The assignment has not been recorded in this

In Pennsylvania. An assignment by a citizen of one State, of personal property located in another State, passes the title fully for all purposes. The law of the domicile regulates the transfer of personal property. Smith's App. 104 Pa. 381. When, therefore, a foreign attachment is issued in any county in this Commonwealth where the property of a nonresident is situated, after the execution of an assignment in another State, but prior to the recording thereof in the county where the property it by the Laws of Illinois. Green v. Van Buskirk, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 807 (18 L. ed. 509). A bank situated in Missouri made a general assignment of its effects to a resident of that State. Among those effects was a deposit in New York State, of a part of which a nonresident of both States claimed an equitable assignment. It was held that the validity of the county; and further, we find for the plaintiffs $226 1/8, subject to the opinion of the court, whether on the facts above stated, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover; if not, judgment to be entered for the garnishees non obstante veredicto.

The plaintiffs submitted the following point: "That under all the evidence in this cause, the verdict of the jury should be for the plaintiffs. The court refused to affirm this point.

Thereafter the court rendered an opinion on the reserved question, ruling in favor of the garnishees, and ordering judgment for them non obstante veredicto.

Judgment having been entered accordingly, plaintiffs took this writ, assigning as error the refusal of their point and the rendition of judgment non obstante veredicto.

Mr. Jos. M. Friedman, for plaintiffs in error:

The provision of the Act of May 8, 1855 (Pub. Laws, 415), requiring the recording of the assignment in this county in order to protect property therein from the liens of bona fide creditors of the nonresident assignor, is applicable to this case. The question of comity does not apply.

See Philson v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280; Steel v. Goodwin, 4 Cent. Rep. 659, 118 Pa. 288; Smith's App. 9 Cent. Rep. 595, 117 Pa. 80; Warner's App. 18 W. N. C. 505.

As to the question of jurisdiction and what would constitute actual notice of the assignment, see:

Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 415.

Mr. James F. Robb, for defendants in error:

The Act of May 8, 1855, does not apply; because the plaintiffs and defendant are both citizens of the State of New York, where the assignment was made.

As against a citizen of other States, especially of the State where the assignment was made, an assignment valid by the laws of the State in which it is made, is valid everywhere, and a subsequent attachment by a citizen of that State will not hold as against the assignee in such case.

Mulliken v. Aughinbaugh, 1 Penr. & W. 126; Speed v. May, 17 Pa. 91; Law v. Mills, 18 Pa. 187; Bugby v. Atlantic etc. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291; High, Receivers, 2d ed. § 241; Burrill, Assignments, p. 474, § 810; Moore v. Bonnell, 81 N. J. L. 97; Bentley v. Whittemore, 19 N. J. Eq. 466; Burlock v. Taylor, 16 Pick. 835; Sanderson v. Bradford, 10 N. H. 280; Bholen v. Cleveland, 5 Mason, 174.

If the plaintiffs should be successful in this suit, they would have to turn the fund over to the assignee in the State of New York.

Van Buskirk v. Warren, 18 Abb. Pr. 145.

Philson v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 280, and Steel v. Goodwin, 4 Cent. Rep. 659, 118 Pa. 288, cited by plaintiff in error, were cases in which the attaching creditor was a resident of this State, and of course would be protected by the Act.

In the case of Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 415, the question of whether the doctrine of comity applied and the Act of 1855 did not apply, when the assignor and attaching creditor were both residents of another State, was not considered.

From the foregoing citations, it would seem to be a well settled doctrine of the comity between States that where two citizens of the same State are bound by the law of their domicile they will not be allowed to come into another State, where personal property of one may be situate, and invoke the aid of a law antagonistic to the law of their domicile.

See also Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 118 (3 L. ed. 208).

Paxson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We do not think the property in question was liable to the foreign attachment. Both the plaintiffs and the defendant in that writ re-recognize, as against the claims of creditors of the assignor domiciled therein, the validity of general

5 Mass. 145; Faulkner v. Hyman, 3 New Eng. Rep. 183 note, 142 Mass.

sided in the City of New York. Before it issued the defendant had made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. The assignment was made in New York and was in conformity to the laws of that State. Under all the authorities it passed the title to the property in this State. It is sufficient to refer to our last case, Smith's Appeal, 9 Cent. Rep. 595, 117 Pa. 30.

It was said, however, that inasmuch as the assignment was not recorded in this State in accordance with the Act of May 8, 1855 (Pub. Laws, 415), relating to foreign assignments, and the attaching creditor had no notice of the assignment, the property was liable to the attachment. The first section of the Act of 1855 is as follows: "That whenever any person making an assignment of his or her estate, situate within this Commonwealth, for the benefit of creditors, shall be resident out of this State, such assignment may be recorded within any county wherein such estate, real or personal, may be and take effect from its date; Provided, That no bona fide purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor, having a lien therefor before the recording in the same county, and not having had previous actual notice thereof, shall be affected or prejudiced; and the court of common pleas may dismiss or appoint trustees under such assignment, as in other cases."

The manifest object of this Act was to protect our own citizens; hence, it was held in Steel v. Goodwin, 4 Cent. Rep. 659, 118 Pa. 288, that where a foreign attachment had issued after an assignment in another State, but before it was recorded here, and the attaching creditor had no actual notice of such assignment, the attachment was good as against such assignment. To same effect see also Philson v. Barnes, 50 Pa. 230.

These cases were well decided, but they do not rule this one. The Act of 1855 is not invoked by any Pennsylvania creditor seeking its protection. As before observed, both of these parties, plaintiffs and defendant, are residents of New York. The plaintiffs come into this State to obtain an advantage by our law which they could not obtain by their own. They are seeking to nullify the law of their own State and ask the aid of our court to do so. This they cannot have. If for no other reason, it is forbidden by public policy and the comity which exists between the States. This comity will always be enforced when it does not conflict with the rights of our own citizens. Bagby v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 86 Pa. 291.

The same principle is recognized to a greater or less extent by many other authorities. It is sufficient to refer to Mulliken v. Aughinbaugh, 1 Penr. & W. 117; Speed v. May, 17 Pa. 91; Law v. Mills, 18 Pa. 185; Moore v. Bonnell, 81 N. J. L. 97.

The case of Chemical Nat. Bank v. Tuttle, 17 W. N. C. 415, was cited as authority on the other side. We do not so regard it. While the facts of that case are upon all fours with this, the point now under consideration was not raised, and of course not decided. The case turned upon the question whether the attaching creditor had actual notice of the assignment. It was assumed that it came within the Act of 1855, and this court decided only what was then before it. The question of comity was left untouched.

The learned Judge below entered judgment upon the reserved point in favor of the garnishees, non obstante veredicto. In this there was no error.

Lacombe, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit brought to restrain the defendants from infringing letters patent 848,073 granted to the complainants August 24, 1886, for "an improved reproducing surface for type-writing and manifolding."

The circumstances of the case are peculiar and present what seems to be a novel question.

On March 22, 1886, the complainants filed their application (known as serial number 196,200). The patent issued thereon and now sued on sets forth that the invention relates to an improved reproducing surface adapted to be employed for obtaining copies of type-writing, or other printed or written impressions, by means of a type-writer or other printing device, or by the employment of a stylus or other writing means. That the transfer surface is spread upon a sheet or vehicle, and when so applied is adapted to be employed in place of the articles of trade commonly known and designated as "carbon papers" or "semi-carbon papers." The specification then proceeds as follows:

"('Carbon papers' or 'semi-carbon papers') are employed by type-writers and others to produce copies of impressions either obtained by a machine or by a stylus or other writing means.

"In carrying out our invention we employ in the manufacture of our improved transfer surface dyewood solutions or their active principles, which we filter and precipitate with alkalies and mineral salts, or with alkalies, acids and mineral salts, or with acids or alkalies alone. After the solution has been filtered the precipitate is removed from the filtering device and dried. The precipitate is then mixed with lard oil and wax, or their equivalents, and the mixture is then ground together in a warm state.

"The dye solutions we prefer to employ are obtained from logwood or hæmatoxylon, the active principle of logwood, Brazil wood, sapan wood, peach wood, madder, or its active principle—alizarine.

"The proportions we find to answer well in producing our improved surface are as follows: take one pound of extract of logwood and dissolve the same in one gallon of water, then add to the solution one pound of soda and one pound of mineral salt, using one of the salts of iron or copper, preferably sulphate of copper. The mixture thus obtained is then placed in a filter. After the solution has been filtered the precipitate is removed from the device employed for filtering and then dried, after which the precipitate is ready for use. To every two pounds of precipitate thus obtained we add one pound of oil and one pound of wax, and then grind the mixture in a warm state in what is commonly known as a 'paint' or other suitable grinding mill. The heated mixture thus obtained is then applied to tissue paper or other suitable paper or ... ric by means of a sponge or other suitable transferring device.

"The paper or fabric to which our improved surface is to be applied is placed upon a heated table, by preference formed of iron, and heated by steam; but this may be varied.

"In place of employing oil or wax, or both combined, we can employ any other suitable oleaginous matter or combination of oleaginous matter having equivalent, or approximately equivalent properties."

The invention having been thus described, the patentees claimed "A sheet of material or fabric coated with a composition composed of a precipitate of dye matter, obtained as described, in combination with oil, wax or oleaginous matter, substantially as and for the purposes set forth.

On the same day (March 22, 1886, Serial Number 196,199) complainants also applied for a patent for a "composition for transfer surfaces for producing copies of type-writing," and letters patent therefor (No. 848,072) were issued to complainants on the same day as those sued on—August 24, 1886.

The specification sets forth that the invention relates to the process of producing a transfer surface adapted to be employed upon a sheet or vehicle to take the place of the articles of trade commonly known and designated as "carbon papers" or "semi-carbon papers." It then states that these papers are employed by type-writers or others to produce copies of impressions either obtained by a machine or by a stylus or other writing means, and proceeds to describe the invention in the identical words used in the other patent and quoted above.

Having thus described their invention, the patentees claimed "the coloring composition herein described for the manufacture of a substitute for carbon paper, composed of a precipitate of dye matter, in combination with oil, wax, or oleaginous matter, substantially as set forth."

This novel method of manifolding an invention was adopted, as complainants state, in order to comply with recent decisions of the Patent Office, interpreting Rule 41 of that office, and holding that where a person has "invented something in an art or as it is ordinarily called 'a process,' also a machine for carrying out the process, and also the manufacture or article which is produced in the operation or the process by the machine" he must take out three separate patents, one for the process, one for the machine, and one for the product. Ex parte Blythe, 80 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1821; Ex parte Herr, 41 Pat. Off. Gaz. 468.

Before those decisions the patent would have contained the common specification above quoted, with two separate claims, one for the process and resulting composition, the other for its combination with the paper. The complainants insist that their position is precisely the same whether their invention is covered by a single patent with a double claim or by two separate patents. Whether this is so, under the circumstances of the particular case here presented, must be now determined.

The defendants insist that no invention is set forth in either patent, and that they do not infringe. For the purposes of the argument upon the preliminary objection, however, the converse of these propositions will be accepted.

The present application is to restrain the defendants from continuing to infringe; and for some unexplained and unaccountable reason the complainants sue only on a single patent, and that, too, the one whose numbers would indicate that it was, in time of application and of issue, subsequent to the other. Having taken their stand solely upon this patent, what is their position towards defendants, who make the composition of matter described in both patents and combine paper with it as indicated in the one sued on?

When differentiated from each other it is found that the only step in advance which the higher numbered patent suggests is the spreading upon paper of the composition described in the lower numbered patent. In view of the earlier patents and publications which have been put in evidence—in fact considering only what is within the common knowledge of all who have, for upwards of a generation, mani-folded writing by the use of a paper coated or impregnated with some pigment—it is difficult to see how even the Patent Office could detect novelty or invention in merely taking a coloring substance already known and applying it to paper. If the patent for the composition of matter forming the coloring substance had been granted to John Doe the day before complainants applied for their patent covering the application of that substance to paper, the latter would be clearly void for want of novelty or invention.

It follows that if the first numbered patent were held by an assignee of the complainants, near or remote, he could not be held an infringer of the second patent. Complainants conceded upon the argument that an assignee could not be so held, except for the combination of paper with the coloring substance for the purpose named, and such a combination is clearly old.

The complainants insist that their position is precisely the same as if they held a single patent with two claims, one for the process or composition of matter producing the coloring substance, the other for the combination of that substance with paper. This might be so, if they could be considered as holding both patents. But in this suit they have carefully abstained from declaring upon the first patent, or even in any way referring to it. Its issuance is only known to the court through the defendants, who set it up in defense. The complainants base their claim to a monopoly solely upon the second patent. As that single patent, tried by the usual tests, may stand or fall, the case which they make out upon their complaint must also stand or fall.

One who seeks to enforce the rights secured to him by a patent is an Ishmaelite—his hand against everyone and everyone's hand against him. His adversary may avail himself of every publication of the fruits of human invention—by letters patent, by printed books, by actual public use—as if they were his own. When offered in evidence they may prove not conflicting, not anticipatory, or be found otherwise immaterial; but for what they are worth, they are the common property of all who are called upon to justify their acts in the face of a complainant patentee.

The holder of the patent sued upon in this case must submit it to comparison with the first patent as if that first patent were outstanding. By not declaring upon it as its present owner, he leaves it to the defendants to be availed of as if it were the property of a stranger.

What, then, is his position?

At the very time when his patent was issued the composition of matter which enters into his combination with paper was known, and the right to exclude all persons from making it was conferred upon the holder of another patent. Upon the holder of the patent sued upon was conferred the right to exclude all others from combining paper with this composition; but in view of the state of the art such a grant was void.

The cases cited by complainants (Railway Register Mfg. Co. v. Broadway & 7th Ave. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 655, and McMillan v. Rees, 1 Fed. Rep. 722) do not apply. There it was held that the additional combination which the original inventor sought to secure by his later patent was in fact a real step in advance. It was held that the description of his invention in the earlier patent would not preclude him from securing his additional claim, because that additional claim covered a patentable invention. "Whether two patents," says the court in the case last cited, "cover the same invention must be determined by the tenor and scope of their claims, not by the description in the specifications."

Here, as we have seen, the combination, which the second patent sought to cover, was not patentable. This suit, based upon it alone, must therefore fail. To the holder of the first patent, whoever he may be, alone, belongs the right to exclude all others from making the new composition of matter, the only invention which (if the other issues in the case be decided against the defendant) was sufficiently novel to warrant the granting of letters patent.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Re Petition of UNION ELEVATED R. CO. OF BROOKLYN.

When the provision of the Rapid Transit Act (N. Y. Laws 1875, chap. 606) providing for the appointment of commissioners and their determination as to the propriety of constructing the proposed railroad in public streets, in lieu of the consents of abutting owners, has been complied with, and their determination that the road should be constructed has been confirmed by the supreme court, after the giving of public notice and an opportunity to abutting owners to be heard, such decision of the supreme court involves the determination of the validity of the incorporation of the company proposing to construct the road, and being the decision of a competent tribunal in a judicial proceeding in which the abutting owners had an opportunity to be heard on that question, will estop such owners from thereafter attacking the validity of such incorporation collaterally.

APPPEALS by certain property owners from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of the Kings Special Term appointing commissioners on the petition of the Union Elevated Railroad Company of Brooklyn, relative to acquiring title to certain real estate or interests therein in certain city streets. Affirmed.

The Mayor of Brooklyn, upon a petition in proper form under the Rapid Transit Act (Laws 1875, chap. 606), signed by fifty property owners, appointed a commission to determine the necessity of rapid transit and perform all the other duties required of such a commission by that statute. The commission so appointed determined that there was a necessity for an elevated railroad, and located its routes and decided upon the plans for the construction thereof. Thereupon the corporation petitioner was formed and its stock subscribed for and the necessary amount paid in in cash, and thereafter, on July 16, 1886, the company obtained the consent of the local authorities to the construction of the road, but being unable to obtain the consent of a majority of the property holders, applied to the general term of the supreme court for the appointment of a commission in lieu of the consent of property holders, as authorized by the statute. This commission, after giving public notice and an opportunity for all interested to be heard, reported that all the routes, except one, ought to be constructed. This report was confirmed by the general term and from the order of confirmation no appeal was ever taken.

The company thereafter commenced the construction of its road and after parts of it had been completed and were in operation, commenced the present proceedings, by petition to the supreme court, for the appointment of commissioners to appraise the amount of compensation to be made by petitioner to the owner or owners interested in the streets and premises described therein.

Mr. B. F. Tracy for property owners, appellants.

Messrs. George Hoadly and George W. Wingate for petitioner, respondent.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties who are affected by these proceedings to acquire title to their property, privileges and easements, to the extent necessary for the construction and operation of an elevated railroad, oppose the same on the ground that the petitioner never was duly incorporated; that it has no existence as a corporation, and has no right to construct and operate a railroad, on certain streets, etc.

There is a doubt as to the correctness of the proposition that the right of eminent domain cannot be exercised by a corporation to deprive a citizen of his property, or property rights, except it be a corporation de jure; but the question here is whether these parties may at this day question the legality of the corporate existence of the petitioner. If by the force or virtue of legal proceedings, they have heretofore been brought into court and have had the opportunity of contesting that very question before a competent tribunal, they should not be heard upon it now; for I consider it to be a well settled principle that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, proceeding upon a matter of which it has cognizance, cannot be questioned collaterally. If it can be shown that upon a prior occasion these appellants, by proceedings competent to affect them with notice, were afforded a time and place for trying out the question they present now, their failure to avail themselves of the opportunity and a decree rendered therein, standing unreversed, must be held to preclude them from afterwards raising such question.

known and referred to as the Rapid Transit Act, which lies at the foundation of the proceedings for the construction and operation of steam railways within cities, contains the provision in its 4th section, "That the consent of the owners of one half in value of the property bounded on, and the consent also of the local authorities having the control of that portion of a street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate such railway or railways, be first obtained; or in case the consent of such property owners cannot be obtained, that the determination of three commissioners, appointed by the general term of the supreme court in the district of the proposed construction, given after a due hearing of all parties interested, and confirmed by the court, that such railway or railways ought to be constructed or operated, be taken in lieu of the consent of such property owners."

This proceeding to substitute for the consents of property owners the determination of the commissioners depends for its success upon the decree of the court named. With respect to the whole matter, it is a distinct and special proceeding; having its inception in the application by the company proposing to construct and operate a railroad, and thereafter depending within the jurisdiction and control of the tribunal which the Legislature has empowered to entertain it. By the 7th section of the Act it is provided that the commissioners appointed in the first instance by the mayor, upon the general application of taxpayers, to determine upon the necessity for steam railways and the location of their routes, are to prepare articles of association for the company to be formed, and shall embody therein, inter alia, the conditions and requirements of the 4th section we have mentioned. This mandatory provision of the 7th section, with respect to the articles of association, makes it perfectly clear that the proviso clause which we have quoted from the 4th section is referable to the company to be formed under the Act, and is to be construed in connection with the powers and corporate capacities conferred by the statute upon that new corporation. Unless regarded as one available to the corporation to be formed by the mayor's commissioners, the provision mentioned in the fourth section would be senseless.

We find, then, as part of the scheme, that after the mayor's commissioners have set upon its feet the new corporation, its first steps must be in the direction of obtaining the requisite consents of property owners and local authorities to the construction and operation of its railway along its designated routes. Failing to obtain the consents of the owners of property bounded on the proposed railway route, the company may set in motion a proceeding before the tribunal designated by the Legislature to secure, in invitum the nonassenting property owners, a decree allowing a construction of the railway.

It will be observed that the proceedings are hostile and that they must fail, unless in three essential features there is compliance with the Act: there must be a due hearing of all the parties interested; the commissioners must determine that the railway ought to be constructed; and, finally, the court itself must set the seal of its confirmation upon the determination of its commissioners, by its decree. The creation of this tribunal, with the exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of whether the proposed railway should be constructed in the face of the opposition of property owners affected, is a part of a plan or system, devised by the Legislature and framed in the Act which it passed. To provide therein for such a tribunal, whose decision might be substituted for the consents of property owners, was perfectly competent for the legislative body; as a part of, or an incident to its delegation to the corporation of the power to exercise the right of eminent domain; by which right the corporation is empowered to obtain, in invitum the owners the possession of what is their property.

This delegation of sovereign power is based on the theory that as land is held subject to the right of government to resume its possession at any time for public use, the construction of a railway is a public use, in the interest or promotion of which the right of eminent domain possessed by the government may be exercised through the quasi public corporation which is chartered. We have held that the Rapid Transit Act embraces the whole law on the subject of the formation of corporations thereunder (N. Y. Cable Co. v. New York, 104 N. Y. 21, 6 Cent. Rep. 56); and we can add here that a system of procedure is provided for which is independent and complete, and which is capable of attaining the end sought, of securing to the corporation organized thereunder full scope for its legitimate action and for the acquisition of necessary properties.

The statute is not to be construed so literally as to balk the legislative purpose and to work injustice or a wrong; it should receive a construction which will permit of the accomplishment of the general purpose of the grant. An element of that purpose is the creation of a tribunal with original jurisdiction and with power to enforce the right of eminent domain when sought to be exercised by the corporation in the acquisition of the right or license to construct and operate its railway. It is altogether reasonable, as a construction of the grant, to find the intention of the Legislature to be that the determination of that tribunal, with respect to the opposition of property owners, being made in the inception of the enterprise, should be once and for all; as otherwise—as is the fact in the present case—when the company had gone ahead, expending its moneys and constructing its railway, an abutting owner, who had stood by while the work was progressing and perhaps the company then actively engaged in operating its franchises, might secure a judgment destructive of the corporate franchises upon questions which were equally open for assertion by him before any capital was expended or work undertaken. Any other conclusion would work a great wrong, and I do not think should receive the sanction of any court of justice.

In Re Kings County Elevated Railway Company, 82 N. Y. 95, it was held, with respect to the determination of the commissioners appointed by the general term of the supreme court under this very Act, that the railroad should be built; that the court, in confirming that report, adjudged upon the reasons for and against the determination.

Folger, Ch. J., says: "We cannot admit that the tribunal that has the power to appoint commissioners, whose duty it is to make report to the authority that created them, which report is of no effect until confirmed by that authority, is not a tribunal of original jurisdiction; so far as to have the function to review the action and conclusion of its commissioners in all the particulars that enter therein." It was there held that in providing for the substitution of a determination by commissioners confirmed by the court, for the consents of a fixed proportion of property owners, a grave provision of the fundamental law was dealt with—referring to the constitutional provision contained in section 18 of the third article of the Constitution. And it was considered not to be reasonable to hold that the supreme court at general term acted only a clerical or formal part, and was without the power to exercise a judgment upon the facts and circumstances of the case.

A tribunal of original jurisdiction, therefore, being established, having cognizance of all questions affecting the rights of property owners, have these parties or their properties been brought within its jurisdiction? Have these questions been adjudged upon by due process of law? It was conceded upon the hearing before the commissioners by the appellants that the proceedings of the general term were regular. The order appointing the commissioners was upon the company's petition and provided for notices to be given by the commissioners of the time and place of the hearing before them, by publication in several newspapers and for posting such notices conspicuously at a number of places along the proposed routes of the company.

The Act makes no provision as to how notice shall be given, but only provides for a hearing. The order also required the giving of a previous notice of the presentation of the report of the commissioners to the general term for confirmation, by publication in the daily papers and by service of a copy of the notice upon all who had formally appeared by attorneys.

Proof was made of the giving of the notices called for by this order and, indeed, I find no dispute raised as to the regularity of the formal proceedings leading up to the final order of confirmation of the report of the commissioners, which recites the proof of the publication and service of notices, etc.

In N. Y. Cable Company v. New York, 6 Cent. Rep. 56, 104 N. Y. 1, the appeal was from the order of the general term refusing to confirm the report of its commissioners. The refusal was based on the ground that the petitioner had not the legal right to construct or operate its railways. That declaration in the order authorized a review by this court of the questions of law involved in the decision of the general term, and we held that the company had never been validly legally organized, so as to have acquired the right to construct its road. That case decided the proposition that, unless validly organized in pursuance of the Rapid Transit Act, a company acquired no right to construct its road, and, consequently, could not demand that the supreme court confirm the report of its commissioners as a substitute for the consent of property owners. I think it follows, logically, from the true construction of the Rapid Transit Act and from the decisions in the Cable Company's and the Kings County Railroad Company's Cases, supra, that the general term is a tribunal of original jurisdiction, whose functions are judicial, and whose determination is a judgment upon questions necessarily comprising within their scope that of the valid legal organization of the petitioning company. The proceedings before this tribunal are in rem, and, under well settled rules, should be conclusive upon all mankind. They are brought against certain property rights to condemn them for quasi public uses in the permitted exercise of the right of eminent domain. The propriety of taking private property for a public use is not a judicial question but one of political sovereignty.

Denio, J., said in People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 598: "In imposing a tax or in appropriating the property of a citizen, or of a class of citizens, for a public purpose, with a proper provision for compensation, the Legislative Act is itself due process of law . . . It is not necessary for the Legislature, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, either directly or indirectly through public officers or agents, to invest the proceeding with the forms or substance of judicial process."

The case is cited from as an authority bearing upon the question of a power vested in the Legislature to exercise this right of eminent domain, which is without control as to the form or manner of the exercise; except that compensation must be made and the objects must be within the definition of a public use. As the power may be delegated to private corporations, established to carry on enterprises of a public nature, the Legislature may prescribe how the power shall be exercised by them; which it has done in the case of railway corporations organized under the Rapid Transit Act. The consent of the abutting owner on the street proposed to be occupied must be had and constitutes a species of property or monument of title (People v. O'Brien, 19 N. Y. 8. Rep. 173, decided November, 1886), and a right is given to acquire it in invitum under the provisions of the Act, by proceedings before a tribunal especially authorized and empowered by the Legislature. The exercise of the right is placed under the control of that tribunal, and provision is made for a hearing of all parties interested; but the method of a giving notice of the hearing is left entirely with that tribunal.

The principles which govern in cases of assessment and taxation are applicable to the decision of the question suggested in this case, as to whether there has been due process of law. Whether the taking of private property be under the imposition of a tax, or in appropriating it for a public purpose, the right stands on the same basis and its exercise is purely a matter of legislative regulation and direction.

In Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, which was a case involving the question of the constitutionality of a law imposing an assessment for local improvement, Earl, J., discusses at some length what constitutes that due process of law which is guaranteed to each citizen by the Constitution. He says: "Generally that due process of law requires an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case in which the citizen has an opportunity to be heard and to defend, enforce and protect his rights." He reviews many authorities which fully sustain his proposition.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 355), says that "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs."

In Philadelphia v. Miller, 49 Pa. 440, it was said by Agnew, J., in speaking of taxation, "Notice, or at least the means of knowledge, is an essential element of every just proceeding which affects rights of persons or property."

This notice or means of knowledge, which all the authorities agree to be a necessary part of a proceeding by which the citizen may be deprived of property, was furnished in the present case. It was not a personal notice, perhaps, as to all or some; but that is not prescribed by the law, nor is necessary by implication. To hold otherwise would be to lay down a doctrine which has no support in principle or in authority. It might and probably would be practically impossible to personally notify all the property owners affected by the construction of the railroad; as it might be also in the cases of assessments or statutory proceedings, which include within their scope the deprivation to a citizen of his property.

In Re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 199, the court says by Denio, J.: "We have not been referred to any adjudications holding that no man's right of property can be affected by a judicial proceeding unless he have personal notice." It was there held that the Constitution does not positively require personal notice in order to constitute legal proceeding due process of law. Consequently, the objection raised in that case, that there was not a personal notice to all the parties to be charged as stockholders of the Empire City Bank, was held untenable, and the proceeding was deemed not to lose the character of legal process, within the constitutional provision, by the omission to require personal notice to be given.

In Campbell v. Evans, 45 N. Y. 356, Allen, J., said with respect to the requisites of a notice to the owner of animals seized by the local authorities on the public highways, that "It is no objection to the proceedings that personal notice to the owner, or other claimant of the property, is not made necessary by the Act or essential to the jurisdiction of the magistrate, or that the proceedings are to some extent summary. The proceedings are in the nature of proceedings in rem—the penalty of forfeiture attaching to and being a lien upon the offending animals. Under the statutes of this State there are various proceedings, both in rem and in personam, in which the party to be affected only has notice by a publication or posting of the summons or notice."

It is known that in the United States Courts jurisdiction may be acquired in admiralty proceedings by posting a citation under the rules of the practice of the court.

We hold, therefore, that the proceeding by this company before the supreme court at general term to obtain the determination provided by the statute in lieu of the consents of property owners, was a judicial proceeding before a competent tribunal, constituted by the Legislature for the purpose, instituted and maintained against the property rights of citizens, of which they had notice and where they had an opportunity to come in and litigate the very matters now sought to be put in issue. There is an obvious propriety in so holding; for there was ample power to deal with all questions of right and of wrong; and to hold otherwise would be to permit the injustice of a single property owner being able to interfere with and perhaps destroy an important quasi public enterprise.

The distinguished counsel, who argued for the property owners, suggests that the absence from the record of the petition precludes the point as to the bar of the decree of the supreme court at general term from being insisted upon. While, to that extent, the record before us may be imperfect, yet the decree of that court, taken in connection with all the other proceedings, which appear to have been taken by or before the commissioners and the court, and with the concession as to the regularity of the proceedings of the general term, render the absence from the record of the petition itself not a material defect. Nor does what we have decided in the Cable Company's Case conflict with the proposition that the proceeding in the supreme court at general term constituted an estoppel upon these appellants. We did hold that unless validly organized the company acquired no right to construct the road, and consequently could not demand that the supreme court confirm the report of its commissioners, as a substitute for the consents of owners; and that there was no basis for the petitioner's application in the refusal by the property owners of their consents under the circumstances disclosed. These views were expressed upon the appeal from the order of the supreme court, which denied a motion to confirm the report of the commissioners. It was because the legal questions were raised in that form and at that stage of the petitioner's existence, that they were discussed and were reviewable.

In this case, had the parties now opposing the petitioner's efforts to carry on its enterprise raised their objections on a like occasion and before the same forum, they could and would have been heard and disposed of, and on appeal the judgment would have been reviewable on the legal propositions involved. The judicial discretion of the supreme court at general term, as to whether the road ought to be built, would not be reviewable; because it was discretionary and a question of policy; but, if the petitioner was alleged not to be a corporation de jure, and to have no standing in court to demand anything, or to exercise any right of eminent domain, a denial of its application on any such ground, or the granting thereof in the face of such an objection, would have rendered the judgment reviewable upon that question.

We conclude, therefore, that in the proceedings had in the supreme court at general term, upon the occasion of the proceeding to substitute for the consents of property owners the determination of its commissioners, the property owners had notice of the same and were afforded an opportunity to be heard upon the questions now sought to be raised. The judgment of that court constructively involves the establishment of the facts of legal incorporation and of legal capacity, and in that respect judicially estopped the abutting owners from ever afterward raising the question. That judgment is no longer open to collateral attack. We cannot give our approval to the doctrine that these appellants, having had an opportunity in the first instance to secure a judgment establishing their rights, could stand by and see the company going on with its work, upon a subsequent occasion of their own choosing, claim that no day in court was necessary, and that the question may be raised whenever it is sought to devert them of their property rights.

DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

Harman YERKES, Appt.,

v.

A married woman who, with her husband, has executed a mortgage containing covenants of seisin, quiet possession and warranty, on her separate property, is, in Dakota (where by statute a married woman is empowered to make any engagement respecting property which she might if unmarried), estopped from setting up against the purchaser on foreclosure any title subsequently acquired by her, even though it is acquired after the foreclosure, and although the mortgage is a mere lien, and does not convey an estate in the land.

(Oct. 5, 1888; Rehearing denied Feb. 11, 1889.)

APPEAL by plaintiff, from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County (McConnell, J.), in an action for the possession of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stone & Newman for appellant.
Mr. Taylor Crum for respondent.

Carland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this action discloses that on and prior to December 8, 1881, Lafayette Hadley and Kate Irene Hadley, his wife, were in possession of and lived upon lot 17, in block 4, of the City of Fargo, in this Territory; that on said date they executed to Harman Yerkes their joint and several promissory note for $500, with interest at 10 per cent per annum, payable annually, which note was to be payable in five years from the date thereof. The interest to become due was evidenced by joint and several interest coupon notes, attached to said original note and signed by the makers thereof. To secure the payment of this note, and the interest to become due thereon, said Lafayette Hadley and Kate Irene Hadley made and executed to said Harman Yerkes their mortgage on the premises hereinbefore mentioned, which mortgage was duly recorded on the said 8th day of December, 1881, as provided by law.

The mortgage in form was what is termed a mortgage deed, being an absolute deed of bargain and sale, with joint covenants of seisin, quiet possession, and warranty. It also contained the usual defeasance common to such instruments.

Default having been made in the conditions of said mortgage, it was duly and legally foreclosed, and the land in dispute was purchased by Harman Yerkes on the 11th day of March, 1884. No question was raised as to the regularity of the foreclosure proceedings. A sheriff's deed was duly issued to the purchaser on March 20, 1885. Claiming title through said foreclosure, Harman Yerkes commenced this action to obtain possession of said lot 17.

The defendants, by their answer, averred, and such was the proof on the trial, that on the 10th day of June, 1878, the Northern Pacific Railroad conveyed said lot 17 to one A. H. Moore, which conveyance was duly recorded May 31, 1880; that said A. H. Moore conveyed said lot by quitclaim deed to Robert Hadwin, on March 11, 1879, which quitclaim deed was duly recorded August 17, 1883; that on the 12th day of June, 1885, said Robert Hadwin granted and conveyed said lot to said Kate Irene Hadley, which conveyance was duly recorded on August 15, 1885.

At the trial the court found for the said defendant Kate Irene Hadley, and adjudged that she was the owner of said lot. From this judgment appellant appealed to this court.

It will be seen that the facts thus stated raise the single question as to whether the title acquired by Kate Irene Hadley subsequent to the execution and foreclosure of the mortgage given by her on the 8th day of December, 1881, inured to the benefit of the appellant, Harman Yerkes. In considering this question we must bear in mind that Kate Irene Hadley was a joint debtor with her husband, so far as the record discloses. She signed the note, and the mortgage contained the following condition: "Provided, nevertheless, that if the parties of the first part, their heirs, executors or administrators, shall pay or cause to be paid to the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, the sum of $746, according to the conditions of six promissory notes of even date herewith."

From all that appears from the record, Kate Irene Hadley may have received all of the consideration for the mortgage. This being so, she had the authority, under the laws of this Territory, to execute a mortgage to secure said indebtedness, in the same manner as if she were unmarried. Section 661, Civil Code, as amended by § 2, chap. 2, Laws 1881; § 79, Civil Code.

We cannot presume that she was executing a mortgage on her husband's property, for the reason that it appears that her husband never had any ownership in the property mortgaged. Having the same rights as an unmarried woman in regard to the granting or incumbering of her property, Kate Irene Hadley could make the mortgage to Harman Yerkes, and could bind herself by any lawful covenant inserted therein, the same as any other person.

The authorities which hold that a married woman may set up an after acquired title as against her deed and mortgage, and which also hold that she is not estopped by the covenants of warranty in a deed of her husband's lands to set up an after acquired title as against the deed which she has signed, place the rule upon the ground that she is not sui juris, and hence cannot be considered as authority in jurisdictions where married women may "make any engagement or transaction with any other person respecting property, which she might if unmarried." Civil Code, § 79.

It must be conceded, therefore, that Kate Irene Hadley had the power to bind herself by the covenants contained in the mortgage to Yerkes. This being so, what effect would the covenants have upon title to said lot, acquired by her at any time subsequent to the execution of the mortgage? There can be no doubt that the covenants of warranty would forever estop Kate Irene Hadley from asserting an after acquired title to the premises in question. It would estop any other person; why not her?

But it is claimed that, she having acquired the title that she sets up subsequent to the foreclosure of the mortgage, the estoppel does not apply; that in order to have the after acquired title inure to the benefit of the purchaser at foreclosure sale, it must have been acquired while the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee existed; and our attention is called to the case of Jackson v. Littell, 56 N. Y. 108.

In that case the mortgage did not contain covenants of warranty, and it was decided that title acquired by the mortgagor subsequent to the foreclosure of the mortgage did not inure to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale; but the court further says: "Different considerations would apply when the mortgage contained covenants of warranty. In that case the consideration paid would represent the value of the land as warranted, and the mortgagor would be estopped from setting up an after acquired title against which he covenanted in the mortgage."

If we once admit that Kate Irene Hadley had the power to bind herself by the covenant of warranty in the mortgage, then the result naturally and necessarily follows that she never afterwards could say that she did not create a lien on the premises mentioned.

The respondent, however, insists that as a mortgage in this Territory does not convey any estate in the premises mortgaged, but creates only a lien, the covenants of warranty in the mortgage in question are mere surplusage. We think that the words in the mortgage purporting to grant an estate in the premises are unnecessary, under the laws of this Territory; but we cannot see why, if a mortgagor desires merely to create a lien on his estate, he may not warrant the title to the estate upon which he proposes to create the lien. It certainly would oftentimes be an inducement to a person to loan him money.

When these covenants are inserted in a mortgage it must be presumed that they form part of the consideration for which the loan was made, and for that reason the mortgagor may never say that he did not create a lien upon the premises mortgaged. Why may not the mortgagor in a mortgage which merely creates a lien covenant that he is seised in fee, and that he will forever warrant and defend the title to the premises mortgaged against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever? Are they not covenants for the breach of which a personal liability is incurred?—and, if so, has not Kate Irene Hadley broken her covenant?—and, if she has broken the covenant, has not the very circumstance arisen upon which the doctrine of estoppel in these cases rests?

In Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 52 U. S. 11 How. 297 [13 L. ed. 708], the court, after reviewing all authorities, English and American, as to what words in a grant of real property would operate as an estoppel so as to prevent the grantors from setting up after acquired title, said: "The principle deducible from these authorities seems to be that, whatever may be the form or nature of 'the conveyance used to pass real property, if the grantor sets forth on the face of the instrument, by way of recital or averment, that he is seised or possessed of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey; or, what is the same thing, if the seisin or possession of a particular estate is affirmed in the deed, either in express terms or by necessary implication—the grantor and all persons in privity with him shall be estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was so seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance. The estoppel works upon the estate, and binds an after acquired title as between parties and privies. The reason is that the estate thus affirmed to be in the party at the time of the conveyance must necessarily have influenced the grantee in making the purchase, and hence the grantor and those in privity with him in good faith and fair dealing should be forever thereafter precluded from gainsaying it. The doctrine is founded, when properly applied, upon the highest principles of morality, and recommends itself to the common sense and justice of everyone. And, although it debars the truth in the particular case, and therefore is not infrequently characterized as odious, and not to be favored, still it should be remembered that it debars it only in the case where its utterance would convict the party of a previous falsehood—would be the denial of a previous affirmation upon the faith of which persons had dealt and pledged their credit, or expended their money. It is a doctrine, therefore, when properly understood and applied, that concludes the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only when in conscience and honesty he should not be allowed to speak."

Adopting the reasoning of the learned court, let us look at the facts in the case at bar. Kate

Irene Hadley covenanted with Harman Yerkes that she and her husband were seised in fee of the premises, and that she would warrant and defend that title against all lawful claims of any person whomsoever. She said to Harman Yerkes, and to whoever should become the purchaser at the foreclosure sale: "We are seised in fee of the land mortgaged. I will warrant and defend any title you may obtain through this mortgage." Harman Yerkes parted with his money on the strength of such representation. To now say that she could set up a title hostile to Yerkes would be to convict her of a previous falsehood, and deny an affirmation upon the faith of which Yerkes had dealt and expended his money. It is the fact that the covenant or affirmation was made, not that an estate in the premises was conveyed, that creates the estoppel. By what sort of reasoning can it be argued that the covenant is destroyed by foreclosure and sale? What destroys it? The covenant says she will forever warrant and defend; and when Kate Irene Hadley made the covenant in the mortgage in question, she forever put herself in a position in which every principle of law, reason and morality will compel her to stand.

We do not think the fact that mortgages in this Territory are mere liens, and do not convey an estate in the land, makes any difference with the operation of the covenant of warranty, when inserted in the mortgage. The mortgage operates on the estate concerning which the representations are made for the purpose of security, and the mortgage which only creates a lien may result in an absolute conveyance of the property, just as much as if the mortgage had conveyed a conditional estate in the first instance. Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 688; Clark v. Boyreau, Id. 686.

In the case last cited the court said, referring to the case of Clark v. Baker, supra: "We there held that it was immaterial whether the mortgage was regarded as a conditional estate, as at common law, or as containing a mere lien or incumbrance, as by the law of this State; that though by our law the title does not pass, yet the lien created operates upon the property in a way precisely equivalent to that which would follow if the instrument transferred the legal title; that whatever in the instrument treating it as a conveyance would operate to transfer a subsequently acquired title to the grantee, must equally operate, treating the instrument as a lien or incumbrance, to subject such acquired interest to the purposes of the original security."

The view we have taken as to the effect of the covenants contained in the mortgage in question renders it unnecessary to determine the force and effect of section 1727, subd. 2, of our Civil Code, upon property acquired by the mortgagor subsequently to the execution of the mortgage.

We are clearly of the opinion that—certainly as against Harman Yerkes—Kate Irene Hadley is estopped from setting up an after acquired title to the premises in controversy, irrespective of the time when said title was acquired by her, and that judgment ought to have gone for the plaintiff at the trial.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Ada H. ROBINSON, Appt.,

William H. ROHR et al., Impleaded with the City of Watertown, Resp'ts.

(.... Win. ....)

1. A board of street commissioners, although in adopting plans and specifications they exercise judicial and legislative powers, and are not amenable to anyone except the public for any errors, negligence or misfeasance in the matters within their jurisdiction, become liable to third persons for their negligence or misfeasance when, after adopting plans and specifications they undertake to carry them out practically and do the work themselves through agents and servants; as in so doing, if they are acting as officers at all, they are merely ministerial officers.

2. A board of street commissioners who, after advertising for proposals for building a bridge and accepting a proposal therefor, fail to enter into any contract, but in accordance with the recommendation of a committee undertake to perform the work themselves and to carry it on through their superintendent and other persons employed by them, and under the supervision of their committee, are individually liable for injuries sustained by a person through the falling of a derrick in consequence of the negligence of their servants.

3. A city is not liable for injuries or damages caused by neglect of its officers in the performance of their duties.

APPEAL by plaintiff, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, entered on a verdict for defendants directed by the court in an action for damages for a personal injury, brought against certain individuals, who were street commissioners of the City of Watertown. Reversed.

The action was originally brought against the said individual defendants, the present respondents, together with the City of Watertown.

Upon the trial in the circuit court, after the testimony was closed, the court directed the jury to render a verdict in favor of the respondents and against the plaintiff; but as between the plaintiff and the City of Watertown, the case was submitted to the jury and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the city, for $7,000. The judgment against the city on this verdict was reversed by this court, on the ground that the court had acquired no jurisdiction over the city. See Watertown v. Robinson, 60 Win. 300.

The case is further stated in the following opinion.

Mr. Harlow Pease for appellant.

Messrs. Gregory, Bird & Gregory and Charles H. Gardner for respondents.

Orten, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The above defendant and six other are charged in the complaint as follows: they were constructing and repairing stone piers and abutments under the Main Street bridge over the Rock River, in the City of Watertown, and there was standing in an upright position on said bridge a large and heavy hoisting machine, known as a "derrick," which was placed there by them, and before that day had been used by them in repairing and constructing said piers and abutments. The plaintiff was walking along upon that portion of the bridge which was set apart for persons traveling on foot, and through the carelessness and negligence of the defendants, their agents, servants and employes, said derrick was allowed to fall across and upon said bridge, and upon the plaintiff, while she was walking along as a traveler on said highway bridge, and without fault on her part; whereby she was greatly hurt, bruised and injured.

The defendants by answer admit that the piers and abutments of said bridge were being constructed and repaired, but deny that they were constructing or repairing the same, and deny that it was through their fault, or that of their agents, servants or employes, that the derrick fell upon the plaintiff, and that she was greatly injured thereby, or that she received any injuries by reason of their negligence, or that of their agents, servants and employes, and deny that the plaintiff was without fault, and aver that her own negligence contributed to her injury. They allege that said bridge had been out of repair for some time, and needed repair and reconstruction; and that the board of street commissioners of said city, in its collective and legislative capacity, had duly let the work of repairing and constructing said piers and abutments to competent persons to do that work, and the said persons were then engaged in the due prosecution of said work, exercising due and proper caution in operating the said derrick.

The facts in respect to said mason work on the piers and abutments, stated in respondents' brief and proved on the trial, were as follows: the clerk of the city was directed by the defendants, in accordance with the requirement of section 8 of subchapter 9 of the City Charter, in respect to all such work, to advertise for proposals for doing the mason work, and furnishing materials for the bridge according to the plans and specifications adopted by them as the board of street commissioners, to be received up to a certain date; and on that day the proposal of one Charles Baxter for doing said work, and furnishing materials, was accepted by them, and they directed a contract to be entered into with him according to said proposal, and that the said work be let to him, he being the lowest bidder for the same. But before any contract was entered into with him, and before, as they ascertained, he had acquired any rights in the same, by resolution of the de-defendants as such board the whole matter was left open and undisposed of for their future action. Their committee, to whom the matter had been referred, reported plans and specifications of said mason work and materials, and recommended that said work and furnishing materials be done by themselves, under the supervision of their committee on streets and bridges, and that a superintendent be appointed, and said resolution was accordingly adopted by them.

In this manner the work upon said bridge commenced, and was carried on by the defendants, through their superintendent, and other persons employed by them, and under the supervision of their committee, up to the time the plaintiff was injured by the falling of the derrick by the negligence of their servants. No contract was ever let to anyone to do the said work, or to furnish materials for the same, but the defendants did the work, instead of a contractor, obtained according to the requirement of the charter as the lowest bidder for the same.

On these facts the circuit court directed a verdict for the defendants, except the City of Watertown.

It will be seen that the facts proved do not support the answer as to letting the work to other persons. It may be said here that all the authorities cited by the learned counsel of the respondents have application only to the case made by the answer, and in no respect to that made by the facts proved. The same elementary authorities cited by them make the very distinction which here exists between the answer and the proofs. The board of street commissioners, when they determined upon the work, and adopted the plans and specifications of it, acted as public officers, exercising judicial and legislative power; and they are not amenable to anyone except the public for any errors, negligence or mere misfeasance in the matters within their jurisdiction. In this case they are not charged with any dereliction in these respects. But when, after adopting the plans and specifications, they undertake to carry them out practically, and do the work themselves, and employ agents and servants to execute the plans and specifications manually, then, if they are acting as officers at all, they are merely ministerial officers, and not judicial or legislative, and, according to the same authorities, are liable to third persons for their negligence or misfeasance, or, as the authorities say, as public officers they acted in a ministerial capacity, and are therefore liable. Cooley, Torts, 389-376.

If, as public officers, they owe only a duty to the public, and are not liable to persons, yet, if they so act as to owe a duty to individuals, then their negligence therein is an individual wrong, which may be redressed by private action.

In this case the defendants owed a duty to the traveling public, and to the plaintiff while traveling over the bridge, to look out for her personal safety, while they were managing the work through their servants. This is not a public but a private duty, which they must discharge properly, or be liable to those injured by their negligence. As public officers, acting for the public alone, they are exempt from personal liability. The doctrine of respondet superior does not apply to such. But if, as the authors say, they engage in some special employment, and their duties are of a more private character, and concern individuals as well as the public, they are amenable to private actions. Whart. Neg. § 284; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 166, 167.

This distinction is plainly marked and easily applied. The authorities cited by the learned counsel of the respondents apply only to the first class, and therefore are not applicable to this case; such as Squires v. Neenah, 24 Wis. 588; Hurley v. Texas, 20 Wis. 637; Hamilton v. Fond du Lac, 40 Wis. 47; Smith v. Gould, 61 Wis. 81.

Special attention is called to Alford v. Barrett, 18 Wis. 175, as illustrating the rule contended for by the learned counsel. But in that case the court said: "If the town clerk had been guilty of any neglect of duty or misconduct, whereby the appellant had sustained damages, the case would have been different."

So in Harris v. Baker, 4 Maule & S. 27, the trustees for lighting streets were not liable to a person injured by falling over a heap of dust deposited in the highway, because, the court said: "They were too far removed from the cause of it." But suppose the trustees had deposited the heap in the highway wrongfully or negligently, they would not have been too far removed from the cause of the injury.

In New Clyde Shipping Company v. River Clyde Trustees, Hay, Dec. 79, 14 Scot. Jur. 586, it is conceded that the remedy would be against the persons who committed the wrong. The defendants rejected the contractor, who would have been liable for such injury, and took his place to do the work, and thereby assumed the liabilities of a contractor to those injured by the negligence of their servants. The board planned the ditch, and are not liable for their plan; but if the commissioners dug the ditch, and negligently left it unguarded, and a person falls into it in the dark, are they not liable? By personally and practically undertaking to do the work, through servants of their own employment, they are brought into contact and relation with the traveling public and the plaintiff, and assume corresponding duties and obligations.

This is sufficient as to the principle which governs this case, treating the defendants as officers as well as operatives. In such case it follows as of course, if they are liable, the city is not so; and that cases in which it is held that the municipality is not liable for such a personal injury, caused by negligence or wrong, are authorities that the persons or officers who did the wrong or were guilty of the negligence are liable.

In Wallace v. Menasha, 48 Wis. 79, the city treasurer sold the property of one person for the tax of another. It was held that the city was not liable for such a tort. His acting colore officii made no difference. In that case the doctrine and distinction, as above stated, together with the above and other authorities, are fully and ably reviewed by Mr. Justice Lyon, and it is a case in point with this, in principle.

In Uren v. Walsh, 57 Wis. 98, it was held that the defendants were liable to personal action for unlawfully tearing down a fence to open a highway, and it made no difference that they pretended to act as public officers. This class of cases is distinguished from the cases cited by the learned counsel of the respondent by the Chief Justice, in an able review of the doctrine. It was a personal wrong for which the town was not liable, and is distinguished from those cases where the municipality is held liable, because in such cases it directed the act, or ratified it, or it was within its general powers. In that class of cases the damages are the natural and proximate consequence of the illegal act, and not the result, as in this and similar cases, of some incidental and independent act of negligence or of wrong, not necessary to the work, and committed while doing it, to the injury of third persons.

For such an act of negligence or wrong as that complained of the municipality was never held liable. The City of Watertown had nothing to do with it, never authorized or ratified it, and it was not within its general powers or for its benefit. The city might as well be held liable for an assault and battery committed by these commissioners while prosecuting this work.

But treating the defendants as officers, and lawfully doing the work, they would be liable, and the city would not be. A city is not liable for injuries or damages caused by the neglect of its officers in the performance of their duties (Schultz v. Milwaukee, 49 Wis. 254); or for their misfeasance or malfeasance, or omission to perform their duties, or for negligence in its performance. Little v. Madison, 49 Wis. 605.

When an officer of a corporation performs an illegal act resulting in an injury to another, he is liable. Peck v. Cooper, 112 Ill. 192.

Whenever a person sued sets up a defense that he was an officer of the government acting under color of law, it plainly devolves upon him to show that the law which he invokes authorized the particular act in question to be done, and that he acted in good faith. Flanders v. Tweed, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 504 [21 L. ed. 839].

But where the issue is negligence, motives or good faith are immaterial. Hover v. Barkhoof, 44 N. Y. 118.

Where an officer injures another while performing ministerial duties, he is liable. Mills v. Brooklyn, 82 N. Y. 489.

For a personal injury caused by the negligence of several persons they are severally or jointly liable. Creed v. Hartmann, 29 N. Y. 591; Peoria v. Simpson, 110 Ill. 294; Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 387; State v. Babcock, 42 Wis. 138.

These general propositions are indisputable, and with the authorities are taken from the brief of the learned counsel of the appellant.

We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff had a right to recover against the defendants, except the City of Watertown, and that the court erred in directing a verdict in their favor.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

Joseph LEVY et ux., Appts.

"1. While the doing of certain acts by a person in the use of his premises as a dwelling house might not in themselves amount to a private nuisance, yet when the same acts are done wantonly and maliciously, for the mere purpose of annoying his neighbor, and to destroy the peace and quiet of his home, and they have such effect, they may amount to a nuisance which a court of equity will restrain.

2. Where two families are occupying rooms in the same house, using in common the halls and stairways, a court of equity will not restrain the one from committing a nuisance against the other, unless the proof of the existence of such nuisance is clear and strong. 3. He who comes into a court of equity

*Head notes by the COURT.

NOTE.—He who comes into equity must come with clean hands. This maxim sometimes expressed in the form "He that committeth iniquity shall not have equity" (Hershey v. Wetling, 60 Pa. 244; Olema Tramways Co. v. Mendel, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 236) is a fundamental principle of equity jurisprudence, and governs the "discretion" or discretionary powers of equity courts in the exercise of their jurisdiction and remedial functions, and furnishes a universal rule affecting their entire administration as to remedies and remedial rights. See Paine v. Lake Erie & L. R. Co. 81 Ind. 283; Meyer v. Yesser, 82 Ind. 204; Musselman v. Kent, 88 Ind. 452; Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 368; Marcy v. Dunlap, 5 Lans. 365; Walker v. Hill, 22 N. J. Eq. 513; Wilson v. Bird, 23 N. J. Eq. 352; Bleakley's App. 66 Pa. 187; Lewis' App. 67 Pa. 166; Hunt v. Rowland, 28 Iowa, 349; Weakley v. Watkins, 7 Humph. 256; Overton v. Barrister, 8 Hare, 503; Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ordway, 68 Cal. 679; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 434. The maxim is invoked in cases of fraudulent contracts. Equity will not, at suit of one of the fraudulent parties while the agreement is executory, compel its execution or decree its cancellation, nor after it is executed set it aside and restore plaintiff to the property or other interests which he to such an extent that he is in part defunct with the defendant, he can obtain no relief. Equity does not in general relieve a person from the consequences of his own actual fraud. Dunaway v. Robertson, 96 Ill. 419; Roman v. Mall, 42 Md. 513; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 414. must come in with clean hands; therefore when there appears to be an unfortunate quarrel between two women, which involves the families of each, and both are in fault, a court of equity will not interfere to protect one against the other, and enjoin as a nuisance what one does against the other.

APPEAL, by defendants, from a decree of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, perpetuating an injunction. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mrs. Gibson & Michie for appellants.

Mrs. Simms & Easley for appellees.

Johnson, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill of injunction to restrain a private nuisance. The plaintiffs in February, 1887, presented their bill, in vacation, to the Judge of the Circuit Court of Cabell County, in which Thomas Medford alleged that he is the owner in fee of a three story brick and stone building in the City of Huntington, that the lower story is used as a business room, and the second story for dwelling purposes, and the third has not been used for any special purpose; that on or about the first day of November, 1885, the plaintiff, who had occupied the first floor with a stock of queensware, determined to sell or rent the same; that on the 20th of that month he rented Joseph Levy the store and three rooms on the second floor for a dwelling for one year, with the privilege of three years; that he has been occupying the second floor of said building since 1884, and there is a front and rear stairway leading to the second floor, and a large hall at the top of the stairways; that himself and wife, a little girl, and a house girl occupy a portion of the said second story rooms, and the said defendants occupy the others; the stairs and hall are used in common; the front room on the east side is used by the plaintiff as a parlor, and three rooms adjoining on the same side are used by them as bedrooms, and they use a building in the rear of the main building as kitchen and diningroom; that defendants use a room in front, on the west side of the building, as a parlor, and two rooms—one in the rear, on the west side, as a bedroom, and the other rear room on said floor as a kitchen and diningroom—which last rooms were constructed with two sets of doors, to keep offensive smells from the kitchen from the other part of the house, and also a partition and door across the hallway to assist in avoiding smells from the kitchen; that when said doors of the kitchen and hall are kept properly closed no offensive smells can pass from the kitchen on the second floor into the rooms in front, but all such offensive odors pass out the corridor in the kitchen; that plaintiff's wife had been a great sufferer from neuralgia, is in feeble health and very nervous and excitable, and is now and almost constantly subject to severe attacks of neuralgia, and any unusual noise or confusion produces upon her severe nervous attacks, which require the continual care and attention of the doctor to alleviate her suffering; that during the past two months the defendants have maliciously and willfully inaugurated a system of conduct, in the use of their rooms, for the avowed purpose and object of driving the plaintiff from the rooms which he and his family occupy, and make living in them impossible; and the defendants threatened to continue their willful and malicious annoyance, and make the living in said rooms so disagreeable and uncomfortable that, to preserve their health and comfort, they will have to abandon their dwelling rooms aforesaid, unless defendants are restrained from continuing their malicious and offensive conduct and doings, which are unnecessary and uncalled for in domestic life.

The bill then proceeds to specify the offensive conduct, among them impolite hailing of Mrs. Medford by Mrs. Levy, as, "Good-bye, Sal!" "Hello, Sal!" "Cheer up!" and like sayings; that such remarks are made and persisted in for the purpose of annoying, exciting and mortifying the wife of plaintiff, and without any provocation on the part of Mrs. Medford, and that she is thereby annoyed and excited to such an extent as to interfere with their enjoyment of their rooms; that defendants, while their meals are being prepared, instead of keeping the doors closed, and allowing the kitchen the effects of his associate from the operation of that process, and by this very act bound himself with the force of a second judgment for the validity and for the satisfaction of the demand. If he addresses himself to a court of equity, praying that court to undo all that he has voluntarily and deliberately performed, and, in order to accomplish this end, he seeks to stamp his own acts with illegality from their very inception, for such purposes he surely would have no standing and receive no countenance in a court of equity, upon any of its known principles. Ornth v. Sims, 48 U. S. 5 How. 507 (12 L. ed. 118). If the contract has been voluntarily executed and performed, a court of equity will not, in the absence of controlling motives of public policy to the contrary, grant its aid by decreeing a recovery back of the money paid or property delivered, or a cancellation of the conveyance or transfer, and as long as the contract is executory, it cannot be enforced in any kind of action brought directly upon it. The illegality constitutes an absolute defense. Bolinger v. Earle, 22 N. Y. 388, 397, 399; Shaw v. Carille, 9 Heak. 104; York v. Merritt, 77 N. C. 212, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 497.

A party to a fraud, and who was to receive the whole benefit of the fraud, cannot come into equity for relief against a confederate in the fraudulent act. Johns v. Norris, 22 N. J. Eq. 110. odors to escape into the outside air—an arrangement which is amply provided for in the construction of the house—throw open the doors leading from the kitchen to the hall, and filling the whole house with objectionable odors, owing to the frequent cooking of cabbage, onions and other things, the odor of which is particularly nauseating to the wife of plaintiff in her present enfeebled and excited condition, and has the effect of making her sick, and rendering her said rooms unfit for the reception of company, and in many other ways interfering with her free and perfect enjoyment of her said rooms; and that the said defendants, although knowing that this can be avoided, persist in these things, for the purpose of annoying plaintiff and his wife; that said defendants are in the habit of throwing old boots and shoes and socks and other objectionable things into the yard, sweeping dirt out of the rooms which defendants occupy into the halls and stairways, and allowing it to remain there a long time, cleaning shoes, shaking clothes, carpets and rugs in the hall, thereby filling it with dust, and the floors with dirt, which they do not sweep up and carry away, but allow it to remain, thereby adding to the dirt already accumulated; that all these things are very disagreeable, annoying and insufferable to your said plaintiff, and especially to his wife, whose habits are those of a neat and tidy housewife, and that they are a matter of great embarrassment to her in the presence of visitors; disagreeable smells make plaintiff's wife nervous, bring on attacks of neuralgia, and thereby affect her health, and thereby destroy the peace and comfort of plaintiff's home; that all these acts are wholly unnecessary on the part of the defendants, but that they persist in them on account of their untidy habits, of which plaintiff and his wife were both ignorant before renting the property to said Levy, and also for the purpose of annoying plaintiff and his wife, of making their rooms as uncomfortable as possible, and of causing them finally to vacate the rooms, which they will be compelled to do unless the defendants are restrained; that instead of passing through the halls quietly, and not making any more noise than necessary, the defendants engage in loud talking, singing and whistling, stamping and dancing in the halls and rooms; that they make excessive and unnecessary noise with coal buckets, and by slamming doors; that these noises are not made from any necessity, or even thoughtlessly, but for the express purpose of exciting, annoying, and vexing and reviling the plaintiff and wife, and, owing to her nervous organization and feeble health, they do annoy, excite and vex plaintiff's wife, and at times completely prostrate her with nervous attacks, and impair her peace of mind, and completely unfit her for her duties, and interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment of domestic life; that they have thrown dirty water out of the windows, purposely spilled water on the stairs, leaving it there, annoying the plaintiff and his wife, and damaging his property; that they are in the habit of leaving doors open when they ought to be closed, and closing them when they ought to be open, wiping their feet on the newspapers of plaintiff left at the door, sweeping dirt under doors, and throwing it through transoms over which they have no control, and thereby excessively annoying and irritating plaintiff and his wife, and seriously interfering with their happiness, and the perfect enjoyment and comfort of their home.

The prayer of the bill is that defendants, etc., be enjoined "from doing the acts above mentioned and enumerated, or any one or more of them, or from doing anything else done for the purpose of annoying, exasperating, or reviling your said complainants, or either of them, or in any other manner calculated to disturb them in the full and perfect and quiet enjoyment and comfort of their said home," etc.

The injunction was granted in vacation, and was as follows: "An injunction is granted the complainants against Joseph Levy and C. Levy, his wife, as prayed for in the within bill, enjoining, restraining and inhibiting the said Levys, their servants or agents, from making loud, boisterous and unnecessary noises in the use of the rooms and halls of the tenement now occupied by them on the same floor of the building with the complainants, on the south side of Third Avenue, between Ninth and Tenth Streets, in the City of Huntington, and which building is No. 935 Third Avenue; and from using scurrilous and offensive language in the presence or hearing of the female complainant, intended or calculated to annoy, disturb or fret the female complainant; and from leaving open the hall doors during the cooking of meals in the kitchen; and from leaving in the halls and stairways sweepings, dirt, old clothes or other objectionable matter, calculated to offend the sight or smell of the complainants, occupants; and from generally so conducting themselves in the use of the rooms as to unnecessarily annoy and make the other occupants on the said floor uncomfortable, as complained of in the said bill, until the further order of the court," etc. The injunction was not to take effect until a bond in the penalty of $200 was given. The bond was given as required.

On the 28th day of March, 1887, the defendants appeared, and demurred to the bill for want of equity. The complainants joined in the demurrer, and it was set down for argument. The defendants answered, denying the allegations and charges of the bill. A great number of depositions were taken on both sides, and on the 10th day of January, 1888, the cause was heard on the bill, answer, replication and depositions, and the court perpetuated the injunction, with costs. From this decree the defendants appealed.

The first error assigned is that the court did not act on the demurrer; second, that the court erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the bill; and third, that the court erred in perpetuating the injunction.

The court did act on the demurrer by its final decree, because it held the bill sufficient, and necessarily overruled the demurrer. Ought the demurrer to have been sustained? It is charged in the bill "That the defendants have willfully and maliciously inaugurated a system of conduct in the use of their rooms . . . for the avowed purpose and object of driving the complainants from their rooms, and make the use thereof impossible," and threaten to continue the same; and then proceeds to set forth the grievances of complainants.

The current of the authorities seems to be that if anyone does a lawful act on his own property the motive by which the act is done is in law a matter of indifference. Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 564; Panton v. Holland, 17 Johns. 92; Mahan v. Brown, 13 Wend. 261; Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 89; Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49.

In Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East, 571, it was held that firing at wild fowl, to kill and make profit of them, by one who was at the time in a boat on a public river or open creek, where the tide ebbs and flows, so near to the ancient decoy on the shore (about 200 yards) as to make the birds there take flight, the defendant having before fired at a greater distance from the decoy, which brought out some of the birds from thence, though he did not fire into the decoy pond, is evidence of a willful disturbance of and of damage to the decoy, for which an action on the case is maintainable by the owner.

In Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117, it was held that, in the absence of all rights acquired by grant or adverse use for twenty years, the owner of land may dig a well on any part thereof, notwithstanding he thereby diminishes the water in his neighbor's well, unless in so doing he is actuated by a mere malicious intent to deprive his neighbor of water.

In Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 316, it was held that no action will lie for injuries caused by cutting off subterranean waters, percolating the soil, or running through unknown channels, and without a distinct or defined course; but it was further held that an exception exists in case of an injury done by cutting off such waters with malice; that no person can wantonly and maliciously cut off on his own land the underground supply of a neighbor's spring or well without any purpose of usefulness to himself. To the same effect is Hakleman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528.

In the well considered case of Chesley v. King, 74 Maine, 164, it was held that if an owner of ground dig a well thereon, for the sole purpose of inflicting damage upon a party who had rights in a spring, he would be liable in damages. The court in that case said: "In view of the numerous cases where the commission of a lawful act does become actionable by the mere carelessness of him who does it, when it results in damage to innocent parties, it sounds strangely to say that its commission for the sole purpose of inflicting damage upon another, and without any design to secure a benefit to its doer or others, is not actionable, when the damage intended is thereby actually caused. We rather incline to the view that there may be cases where an act, otherwise lawful, when thus done, may combine the necessary elements of an actual or legal damage to the plaintiff, and a wrongful act committed by the defendant; or, in other words, may be an invasion of the legal rights of another, accompanied by damages. One of the legal rights of everyone, in a civilized community, would seem to be security in the possession of his property and privileges against purely wanton and needless attacks from those whose hostility he may have in some way incurred."

Every family possesses under the law the legal right to security in their home; to have peace, quiet and comfort against purely wanton and needless attacks from those whose hostility they may have in some way incurred. Other families, even those whose hostility they may have incurred, have also the right to the privileges of a home, the right to talk, even loudly, and to sing loudly, and dance; to open and shut doors; and it may be that they would not always be expected to use great care in the manner of opening and closing doors; to cook their food, and, for their comfort, to even keep the door of the kitchen open while the food was being cooked and prepared for the table; but they have no right, wantonly and needlessly, to do any or all these things, in an unusual manner, for the mere purpose of annoying and rendering uncomfortable their neighbors; and while under other circumstances the doing of these things in the manner indicated would not amount to a private nuisance, yet, when done for the malicious or willful purpose of annoying their neighbors, and it does have such effect, and makes their home uncomfortable, it would amount to a nuisance.

While there are some things alleged in the bill, as sweeping the dirt into the hall, and talking offensively to their neighbors, which would not amount to a nuisance, yet the charge that, for the mere willful and malicious purpose of annoying and making uncomfortable the plaintiffs, they, by loud talking, singing and dancing, and permitting offensive odors to escape from the kitchen through doors left open for the purpose, did render the home of the plaintiff materially uncomfortable, presents a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity. The bill was sufficient.

Was the decree proper, under the pleadings and proof? The case presented here is happily of rare occurrence. No case like it has been cited in the argument of counsel. It is the first case I have ever seen where there was trouble between two private families, originating between the mothers, respectively, and a court of equity asked to interfere with its strong arm to protect one against the other. It is to be hoped no such case will again occur; and while, as we have held, the bill presents a case of which the court, under the established principles of equity, must take cognizance, yet it would not perpetuate the injunction unless the proof was clear and strong. The court will discourage, as far as it can, a resort to its power for the purpose of interfering in mere domestic broils. We do not wish the idea to obtain that if there is a quarrel between two women, and both become excited and nervous, and things are done and said which are unseemly, and their domestic peace and happiness is thus destroyed, that either can, with ease and dispatch, prevail upon a court of equity, that is busy over more weighty matters, to interfere, and preserve the peace and quiet of the home of either.

The proof here shows that these two women had for ten months lived together, using the same stairs and halls, without trouble, when one wanted to exchange kitchens with the other, which was declined. Then the trouble commenced, and was endured for about two months, when the bill was filed, and the injunction obtained. The plaintiffs were both examined in their own behalf, together with a Miss Worten and a Miss Roberts, girls who had lived with them, and these give evidence which substantially sustains the allegations of the bill; also a Mr. McDowell, who testified to loud singing in the hall, and the doors shut hard, could smell onions cooking, and the smell was disagreeable (he was there on two occasions); and Drs. Aldrich, Mayo and Buffington, who attended Mrs. Medford at different times. Dr. Aldrich was called in but once. Found her nervous, and in mental distress. Did not know the cause. Dr. Mayo saw her once. Found her in considerable excitement, and she had a severe headache. Did not know the cause. Dr. Buffington went to see her twice. Found her in a very nervous state. Is subject to shortness of breath and palpitation of the heart. Not one of these physicians was asked as to noises and odors in the house. A Miss Via also testified she heard some loud singing by Mrs. Levy. Mrs. Levy was in her own kitchen while singing. Mrs. Burdick, the only other witness for plaintiffs, testified to being at Mrs. Medford's on one occasion, and there was a very offensive odor in the hall. Said she could not tell what it smelled like, but thought it was caused by the cooking of kraut.

On cross examination, Mrs. Medford and Mr. Medford both admit they said nothing to the Levys about their annoying them by the noise or odors. Mrs. Levy in her deposition says that she said to Mrs. Medford, before they went there: "Mrs. Medford, consider what you are doing when you give up your kitchen. Remember you are giving up your best and most useful room, and don't repent of it when it is too late." She further said that, in December, Mrs. Medford came to her, and said: "Mrs. Levy, how would you like to have the rooms down stairs" (a small frame building in the yard, which they were using as diningroom and kitchen)? "I asked her what she meant. She said: 'If you will give me your kitchen, I will give you the two rooms down stairs.' Mrs. Levy says she afterwards informed her Mr. Levy was not willing to make the change. At this she became very angry, and said it was very inconvenient the way she was situated, and if she had the room she could dispense with a girl, and do her own work."

The evidence for the defense shows that after the trouble about the kitchen the trouble grew worse, until it culminated in an encounter between the two women. The Levys in their depositions say Mrs. Medford swept dirt into the hall, and slammed doors; that they cooked as other people, and ate what other people ate; that Mrs. Medford cooked upstairs, with the door open; that it was of no avail to close the kitchen door, for the transom was broken, and could not be shut. They are corroborated by Miss Lavine. Dr. Mayo says he was called to see Mrs. Levy, and found her suffering from nervous prostration. The women had much trouble about who should clean the halls, etc. John Ran says he is a barber and lives next door to the Medfords. Said he had heard a little singing, but it was not loud and boisterous. Dr. Buffington, who was also sworn for plaintiff, says, at the time he visited Mrs. Medford he heard no unusual noises coming from Levy's apartments, such as loud singing, whistling, dancing, stamping or slamming doors, as he recollects; that he did not recollect smelling any bad odors. A. M. Thomas was a hotel keeper within thirty feet of the Medfords. Said he had heard no unusual noises coming from the apartment of the Levys, such as loud singing, dancing, stamping or slamming of doors, and that none of his guests had ever complained to him of such noises. W. A. Gibson said he did business within twenty feet of the Levys, and that he could recall no unusual noises coming from their apartments.

I have referred to this much of the evidence to show the character of this unseemly controversy. There is an old maxim that He who comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands. Therefore, when there appears to be an unfortunate quarrel between two women, which involves the families of each, and both are in fault, a court of equity will not interfere to protect one against the other, and enjoin as a nuisance what one does against the other.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, with costs, and the injunction is dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

Green and Woods, JJ., concurred.

Snyder, J., concurring:

If the plaintiff had any right which he was entitled to enforce in law, he had an adequate and complete remedy in a common-law court, and therefore the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained. I concur in the conclusion reached.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Eva McNUTT, App't
v.

James S. McNUTT et al.

(....Ind....)

1. A contract in consideration of marriage, where each party releases all interest in the other's property, is upon a sufficient consideration as to both parties, at least where each is possessed of property before marriage.

2. A valid antenuptial contract, founded on the consideration of marriage alone, may be executed by a woman who has an estate of her own.

3. No particular form of words is necessary, to constitute a valid antenuptial contract.

NOTE.—Antenuptial contract, consideration of marriage. Marriage is, at the common law, an adequate consideration for a promise. 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 775, 776; Wright v. Wright, 54 N. Y. 437; Wall v. Scales, 1 Dev. Eq. 478. A release from a contract to marry is a valuable consideration.

However informal the instrument may be it will be given effect if the intention of the parties is manifested and it is such as can in law or in equity be executed.

4. That a promise to marry was made six years before the writing was drawn and signed does not impeach the consideration of the contract, as the written instrument merges mere oral negotiations.

5. The word "heirs" in a marriage contract, providing that neither party shall take any interest in the property of the other, but that it shall descend to their heirs, as if they had not married, is not restricted to the children of the parties, but includes any legal heirs. And such provision excludes any claim of either party as heir by virtue of marriage.

6. Where the parties agree before marriage that after their marriage each shall hold his or her antenuptial property to his or her own separate use, and on the death of one of them neither shall have any marital claim on the estate of the other—this is, at least in a court of equity, generally esteemed to be a good bar to dower.

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Clinton County (Paige, J.), in favor of the plaintiffs in an action to recover the possession of land and to quiet the title thereto. Affirmed.

The facts, and questions presented, are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. C. Suit, R. P. Davidson, S.

O. Bayless, W. H. Russell and F. F. Moore for appellant.

Messrs. Samuel H. Doyal, Perry W. Gard, James V. Kent and John W. Merritt for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is evidence that a written antenuptial contract was executed between the appellant and her husband, Henry G. McNutt, since deceased, and that the writing was destroyed by her. This is the evidence upon which the trial court acted, and we cannot disregard its decision upon this question of fact. There is also evidence that the contract was in these words:

"Article of agreement this day entered into by and between the said Henry G. McNutt and Eva McBride, both of Clinton County, State of Indiana. Whereas, The said Henry G. McNutt and Eva McBride contemplate marrying each other, and have both been married before, and have separate estates, and have children by such former marriages, it is therefore contracted and agreed by the said Henry G. McNutt and Eva McBride that the survivor of either shall take and hold no interest, or part of interest, by descent or otherwise; but the estate, both real and personal, shall descend to the heirs, the same as it would if they had not married."

We must take as conclusive the finding of the trial court upon questions of fact wherever it is supported by the evidence; and it is only a waste of time to argue in this court that the decision of thereto released to the other all claims against their separate estates respectively, in equity bars the wife's right to dower although wanting in the requisites of a legal or statutory jointure. Barth v. Lines, 7 West. Rep. 217, 118 Ill. 374; McGee v. McGee, 91 Ill. 542; Wentworth v. Wentworth, 68 Maine, 247; Andrews v. Andrews, 8 Conn. 79; Brooks v. Austin, 95 N. C. 474. An equitable jointure, or a competent and certain provision for the wife in lieu of dower, if assented to by the father or guardian of the infant before marriage, is an equitable bar of dower. McCartee v. Teller, 2 Paige, 511; Wetmore v. Kinsam, 3 Bosw. 227. An antenuptial contract of a woman that she will not claim her dower in the event of her intended marriage, unless founded upon the consideration of some provision for her in lieu of dower, will be ineffectual both in law and equity. Curry v. Curry, 10 Hun, 306. The pecuniary provision which is provided must be something that she can take and enjoy, after the death of her husband, to take effect in possession or profit immediately on his death. Orain v. Cavana, 36 Barb. 412, 43 Barb. 109.

Enforcement of contract in equity. Executory agreements made between a man and a woman who afterwards marry and which then become void at common law, in the application of the conscientious principles of equity, will be specifically enforced against either husband or wife at the suit of the other. Gould v. Womack, 2 Ala. 52; Croswright v. Hutchinson, 2 Bibb, 407; Cannell v. Buckle, 2 P. Wms. 243; Acton v. Acton, Prec. in Ch. 237. Where an antenuptial contract is just and reasonable, and was fairly made by the parties competent to contract, it should be upheld and enforced as to all the property of the parties, including the homestead when the same becomes subject to partition. Hafer v. Hafer, 35 Kan. 524. Marriage contracts in writing are to be liberally construed, to carry into effect the intention of the parties; and no want of form or technical expression will invalidate them. Brown v. Ranney, 74 Ga. 210. Where the parties evidently intended to make a final complete settlement, it will be so regarded, although it be headed "Articles of Agreement," etc. To effectuate their intent one part may be taken as a complete settlement and another part as mere articles. Neves v. Scott, 50 U. S. 9 How. 196 (13 L. ed. 102). When the instrument provides for future acquired property, such property follows the limitations of the settlement. Neves v. Scott, 50 U. S. 9 How. 196 (13 L. ed. 102).

at antenuptial agreement of each party

the trial court is wrong because the weight of evidence is against it.

Eva McNutt was a widow, and Henry G. McNutt a widower, when this contract was executed. Both were of mature age, and both had children by their former marriages. The former was the owner of 173 acres of land, which came to her from her first husband, and Henry G. McNutt was also the owner of real property. What personal property the appellant had does not appear. The contract does not, in formal terms, recite that a consideration moved from the prospective husband to the intended wife; but it does show that it was made in contemplation of marriage, and that each released to the other all interest in each other's property.

Here there were two elements of consideration—marriage, and the release of a right which, but for the release, would flow from the consummated marriage. These elements of consideration were both of the class valuable. If the contract is to be judged by the ordinary rules of law, then there can be no possible doubt that on its face it imports a sufficient consideration, since a consideration fixed by the parties is, by the courts, deemed a sufficient one; for the courts will not, in the absence of fraud or mistake, substitute their judgment for that of the contracting parties. Wolford v. Powers, 85 Ind. 294.

If this contract could be regarded as within the general rule, there would be no difficulty in disposing of the case, for there are two distinct elements of consideration embodied in it; but the difficulty arises upon the point made by the appellant, that a contract of this character requires a consideration which the court can affirm is equal to the dower right of a wife. In support of their position counsel refer us to the cases of Curry v. Curry, 10 Hun, 868; Gould v. Womack, 2 Ala. 86; Power v. Sheil, 1 Moll. 206; and to 4 Kent, Com. 12th ed. 56, note a; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 247; and 8 Redf. Wills, 881.

There is, however, much conflict in the authorities. The weight is strongly against the appellant. Many of the modern cases hold that, even where the wife has no estate of her own, the marriage is of itself a consideration sufficient to support the contract of the prospective wife not to claim any interest in the lands of the husband. Mr. Schouler clearly marks and defines the distinction—a distinction lost sight of in some of the cases—between a postnuptial and an antenuptial agreement, shows that both classes are included within the general term "marriage settlements," and says: "In antenuptial marriage settlements, or what are called 'marriage settlements,' the marriage affords a sufficient consideration." Schouler, Dom. Rel. pt. 2, chap. 13.

This is a just deduction from what Mr. Bishop calls "the better authorities."

But we are not dealing with a case in which the prospective wife was without property of her own. She was the owner of 172 acres of land, acquired from her first husband. It is true that she did not own the fee, since, by force of our statute, the second marriage cut down her estate to one for life. Mathers v. Scott, 37 Ind. 303; Teter v. Clayton, 71 Ind. 287.

But, while she did not have a fee in the land acquired from her first husband, she did have an estate for life. Indeed, she had something more; she had an estate for life, with a qualified right of alienation and a possible fee. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2484; Bryan v. Uland, 101 Ind. 477.

It cannot, therefore, be said that she was not the owner of property, since she had at least a freehold estate. We know that the prospective husband yielded nothing, except the right that might have grown out of a possible fee; and we concur to a great extent in the view of appellant's counsel that he yielded no then present right in the property of his wife. Prima facie, at least, he could not have taken any estate in her land at her death, since, upon the happening of that event, the children by the first husband would take by descent. While the argument of counsel establishes the proposition that the husband parted with no present and vested rights in the land of the wife, it does not prove that the appellant had not property of her own.

The question therefore is not, What is the rule where the prospective wife is without an estate of her own in land? but, What is the rule where she is the owner of at least a freehold estate?

Our judgment is that where the prospective wife is the owner of land in her own right, and there is no fraud, and nothing making the contract unconscionable, the courts will not strike it down. Here there was no fraud. The parties were of mature years. The subject had been long under consideration. There was deliberation, not haste. There is nothing unconscionable in the contract. It was no more than equitable that the prospective husband should, at the time he made the contract, provide that his estate should go to his children by a former wife.

It is indeed difficult to find any principle upon which courts can set aside contracts made in good faith, with due deliberation, and by persons of mature age, even though that contract be one between a man and a woman contemplating marriage. It is stretching, as many of the authorities suggest, the power of the courts a great ways to declare that a man and a woman may not, even though the latter has no estate of her own, make their own contracts. In earlier ages there was, perhaps, some reason for the old English law rule, for women were not educated then as now, and were far more under the dominion of men than in these ages. The reason for the rule has failed, and where the "reason faileth the rule faileth."

But whatever may be the rule where the woman has no estate of her own, it is different, and it ought to be different, where she has, in her own right, a freehold interest in land. An illustration will, we believe, prove our conclusion: suppose the woman's freehold estate to be of great value, yielding an annual income of $10,000, why should courts in such a case interfere, and annul an antenuptial contract made and acted upon in good faith? Upon what imaginable ground of public policy could such an interference be justified? If she does own an estate in land, and if there is no fraud, and nothing unconscionable, she should be allowed to judge for herself whether the marriage is of itself a sufficient consideration and courts should not, after the husband's death, substitute their judgment for hers. The truth is, it is exceedingly difficult to imagine why, in any case where there is no fraud, courts should displace the judgment of contracting parties and substitute their own. No persons in the world can so well and so justly judge as the contracting parties themselves; and it is only in the strongest and clearest cases that courts should disregard their judgment, and never where there is neither positive wrong nor fraud. The authorities sustain our conclusion.

The case of Jacobs v. Jacobs, 42 Iowa, 600, is very like the present, and we quote from the opinion in that case: "It is claimed, however, that the contract is unreasonable, and without sufficient consideration, and therefore ought not, in a court of equity, to be enforced. The law always looks upon marriage as a civil contract, and this marriage seems to have been purely a business transaction. So far as appears, the contract was freely and voluntarily entered into, without any fraud or imposition. One of the parties was a crippled widower, sixty-two years old, with eleven children, and real estate worth $12,000; and the other a widow, with three children, forty acres of land, and $700 or $800 in money. They were willing to marry, but each wanted the sole control of his or her own property, and to transmit it to his or her children." In concluding its observations on this point, the court said: "We cannot say but that the advantages are about equal, and the contract fair and reasonable. We know of no reason why it should not be enforced."

In Wentworth v. Wentworth, 69 Maine, 247, the court held an antenuptial contract valid, although it made no provision at all for the woman, except that the husband should not intermeddle with her property. The court, in the course of the opinion, said, in speaking of the contract: "It was made in consideration of marriage, although it is not so declared in terms. Nail v. Maurer, 25 Md. 532. Marriage is the highest consideration known to the law. Ford v. Stuart, 15 Beav. 499; Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348 [8 L. ed. 709]; Vance v. Vance, 21 Maine, 370. Even if it were otherwise, the reciprocal character of the stipulation might well constitute a sufficient consideration. Nail v. Maurer, supra."

The conclusion of the court in the well considered case of Forwood v. Forwood (Ky.) 5 S. W. Rep. 361, is thus expressed: "There is another class of cases that hold (and with which we agree) that an antenuptial contract is a legal contract, the consideration of which may be: first, that of the intended marriage alone; or second, that of a jointure or settlement upon the intended wife in lieu of her dower or distributable share in her intended husband's estate; and that either of these considerations, if both parties are sui juris, is sufficient to uphold the antenuptial agreement on the part of the woman to relinquish her right of dower and distributable share in her husband's estate."

In a similar case the Supreme Court of Maryland said: "The contract was made in contemplation of marriage, and, as clearly appears, was intended to bar or prevent the acquisition of any right by either in the property of the other, in order that the marriage proposed might take place. The main object in view was the consummation of the marriage, and it was to that end that the contract was executed. It seems almost impossible to view the contract as founded on any other consideration, although the reciprocal character of the stipulations might be held to constitute one sufficient to make the contract binding and effective. But whether the marriage they proposed be expressly mentioned as a consideration or not, we think it must be regarded as such, within the purview and meaning of the contract; and we accordingly hold that the contract cannot be avoided on that ground." Nail v. Maurer, 25 Md. 538.

The court, in deciding the case of McGee v. McGee, 91 Ill. 548, thus expressed its view of the law: "The contract, in our judgment, is a reasonable one. It is one that persons advanced in life could, with great propriety, make, and especially where the parties have previously been married, and where there may be children by both marriages, among whom controversies as to property may arise after the death of the parents. Such agreements are forbidden by no considerations of public policy, and there can be no reason why equity will not lend its aid to compel the surviving party to abide by the contract. Our opinion is, the fair construction of the antenuptial agreement is that it intercepts dower of the widow, and may be set up as an effectual bar to her demand for dower in the lands of which her husband died seized."

This doctrine was reaffirmed in Barth v. Lines, 7 West. Rep. 217, 118 Ill. 374; and the cases of Wentworth v. Wentworth, supra, and Andrews v. Andrews, 8 Conn. 79, were cited with approval.

It was said in Johnston v. Spicer, 9 Cent. Rep. 566, 107 N. Y. 185, that "Antenuptial contracts, by which it is attempted to control the interest which each of the parties to the marriage shall take in the property of the other during coverture or after death, like dower, are favored by the courts, and will be enforced in equity according to the intention of the parties, whenever the contingency provided by the contract arises." 2 Kent, Com. 165; Re Young, 27 Hun, 54, affirmed, 92 N. Y. 235.

In the case of Andrews v. Andrews, 8 Conn. 79, the judge who spoke for the court said: "I see no reason why such an agreement, deliberately made, and upon a sufficient consideration, should not be enforced in chancery. Such contracts, especially in late marriages, are not unusual. They are opposed to no rule of law, nor to any principle of sound policy. On the contrary, they are, in my judgment, highly beneficial, and are eminently entitled to the aid of a court of chancery, where such aid is necessary to carry them into effect; and especially is this true where the contract has been executed in good faith by one of the parties."

It was said in the case of Pierce v. Pierce, 71 N. Y. 154, that "Antenuptial contracts, whereby the future wife releases her claim to the right of dower and all other rights to the estate of her husband upon his decease, are fully recognized in law. When fairly made, and executed without fraud and imposition, they will be enforced by the courts."

Nearer to the case under discussion than those last cited but in line with them, is the case of Gelse v. Gelse, 1 Bailey, Eq. 387. In that case, the court said: "The complainant was of full age, and under no legal disability to contract. The subject matter was legitimate, and the consideration of marriage is sometimes said to be the highest known to the law, and I confess that I have not been able to discover any rule or principle which discharges her from the obligation which the agreement imposes. She had an ample fortune of her own so tied up that she could not confer it upon her husband, and in consideration that he would take her in marriage she agreed not to claim her dower, or any right of inheritance in his estate. It is a contract without fraud, and apparently of perfect equality. Both Atherly and Roper treat this question as one admitting of no controversy. A jointure, to operate as a bar to dower under the statute, must consist of a freehold estate; but a woman under no legal disability may stipulate to substitute anything she pleases in place of it. Ath. Mar. Sett. 511; 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife, 480."

We pause in our examination of the authorities to say of the case just cited that the woman's property was entailed, and that the husband could by no possibility take any estate in it, so that he released no right in the woman's property. It is true that in the case cited the woman's fortune was ample; but the extent of her estate, if at all considerable, cannot affect the principle involved, since she should be allowed to judge of its sufficiency, and there is no reason why the courts should interfere.

The opinion in Hafer v. Hafer, 38 Kan. 449, is an elaborate one, gathering and grouping many authorities. It was there said of an antenuptial contract not unlike the present that "It was held in the court below that the contract was without consideration. Clearly, this is not so. In addition to the reciprocal agreements therein, it has for its support the consideration of marriage, which is not only a valuable consideration, but has been held to be the highest consideration known in law, and is indisputably sufficient to sustain an antenuptial contract."

We cannot add to the length of our opinion by further discussion of the decision of other courts, and turn to some of the decisions of our own court. These decisions do not, indeed, directly decide that a woman who has an estate of her own may execute a valid antenuptial contract, founded on the consideration of marriage alone; but we think they do implicitly assert this doctrine.

In Richards v. Richards, 17 Ind. 636, the provision made by the antenuptial contract was not the equivalent, by any means, of the estate the statute would, but for the contract, have vested in the wife; yet the agreement was held valid.

Substantially the same ruling was made in Houghton v. Houghton, 14 Ind. 506. That we are not in error in asserting that these cases impliedly approve the rule we have stated is clear; for, if they did not, then the conclusion declared could not have been reached, for the provision for the wife was not in either case equal to the right substituted by our statute for that of dower.

We cannot, in detail, speak of all the authorities cited by appellant's counsel, but will briefly ly notice such as are most earnestly urged in argument.

First in importance of these authorities, in the estimation of counsel, seems to be the case of Mouser v. Mouser, 4 West. Rep. 390, 87 Mo. 437; but we think it not at all in point, because it is rested entirely on a Statute of Missouri, and the contract was by parol, and not in writing.

In Hollowell v. Simonson, 21 Ind. 398, no question concerning the validity of an antenuptial contract was considered or decided.

Craig v. Craig, 90 Ind. 215, decides that an antenuptial contract cannot be revoked by parol after marriage.

And Cory v. Cory, 81 Ind. 469, simply decides that an antenuptial contract may so provide for the wife as to make it proper to deny her alimony.

The point affirmed in Camden Mutual Insurance Association v. Jones, 23 N. J. Eq. 173, is that, where the annuity provided by the antenuptial contract fails, so does the contract.

Gibson v. Gibson, 15 Mass. 110, and Hastings v. Dickinson, 7 Mass. 158, are placed solely on the Statute of Henry VIII., and were decided as strictly common-law cases, without reference to the equity rule, which, both in England and America, has long been different from the rigid rule of the common law.

Curry v. Curry, 10 Hun, 366, is repudiated by the later cases in the same court and in the court of appeals. It is deservedly and strongly criticised in Wentworth v. Wentworth, supra.

In the case of Young v. Hicks, 27 Hun, 56, it was said: "The agreement in the present case is a good antenuptial agreement, even under the case of Curry v. Curry, 10 Hun, 366. It makes a provision in lieu of dower, and of the rights of the widow in the husband's estate. The principle decided in that case, that such a consideration must be proven to uphold an agreement made in contemplation of marriage, does not seem to be supported by any good reason."

The disapproval of Curry v. Curry is repeated in Clark v. Clark, 28 Hun, 509, where it was said: "But we cannot concur in the observations of the learned judge in that case that antenuptial contracts are against public policy. On the contrary, we think that the current of decisions respecting marriage settlements shows that when such contracts are freely and fairly entered into, they are generally conducive to the welfare of the parties thereto, and subserve the best purposes of the marriage relation." The Supreme Court of New York, judged by its latest utterances, may therefore be regarded as strongly against the appellant, and in line with the great majority of the modern courts.

The case of Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50, confuses postnuptial with antenuptial contracts, and applies to the latter class of contracts the rules applicable to the former. This error led to a wrong conclusion, for it led the court to apply a statute applicable only to conveyances and contracts made after marriage to contracts made before marriage. That this is true is apparent from what is said on pages 59 and 62 of the opinion.

But if it were conceded that the case cited is rightly decided, still it would not be applicable here, for in that case there was absent an important element which is here present. This element is the fact that the wife had a separate estate of her own.

The later case of Mintier v. Mintier, 28 Ohio St. 307, lays down an essentially different rule from that laid down in the former case, for it was there said: "If the antenuptial agreement in this case was intended by the parties to operate as an equitable jointure, and, as such, to bar all claims of the wife to dower in the real estate of the husband; if the parties were of mature age, and capable of judging in respect to their interests; if the agreement was fairly entered into in good faith, and without any fraud or imposition; if it was reasonable in its terms, and was in good faith acted upon and carried into effect by Robert Mintier during his life—no good reason is perceived why full effect should not be given to it according to the intention of the parties."

In the earlier case of Stilley v. Folger, 14 Ohio, 610, the court said: "Antenuptial contracts have long been within the policy of the law both at Westminster and in the United States. They are in favor of marriage, and tend to promote domestic happiness by removing one of the causes of family disputes—contentions about property, and especially allowances to the wife. Indeed, we think it may be considered as well settled at this day that almost any bona fide and reasonable agreement made before marriage to secure the wife in the enjoyment either of her own separate property or a portion of that of her husband, whether during the coverture or after his death, will be carried into execution in a court of chancery."

It is evident that in Ohio the rule, as laid down by the well considered cases, is not very different from what we have embodied in our own conclusion, and stated as the rule applicable to this particular case. We have restricted our statement of the rule because it is not here necessary for us to make our statement broader; but we may appropriately say that the cases go very far to support the rule as thus stated by Mr. Freeman in his note to the case of Morritt v. Scott, 6 Ga. 568, 80 Am. Dec. 872: "The marriage itself is the consideration of the settlement, and it is the highest consideration known to the law." Mr. Bishop employs even stronger language: "To say, therefore, that it is to be regarded, where it is the inducement to any contract, as a valuable consideration, is to utter truth, yet only a part of the truth. What this utterance lacks is in our books not infrequently expressed by the adjective 'highest,' as marriage is the highest consideration known in law." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 775.

No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a valid antenuptial contract. However informal the instrument may be, it will be given effect if the intention of the parties is manifested, and it is such as can, in law or in equity, be executed. "This sort of agreement," says an eminent text writer, "will, of course, vary in its terms according to the inclination of the parties; but without regard to such variations it should be held alike, on the better authorities, to exclude dower, where such is the plain intent of the parties." Id. § 423.

that no formality is required, but they go further, and declare that such contracts are to be construed with liberality and favor. They will be upheld if possible, and not overthrown unless the necessity leading to that result is imperious. As Mr. Schouler says: "Equity pays no attention to the externals, but considers only the substantial intention of the parties." Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 178.

The cases enforce and illustrate this rule in many forms. Neves v. Scott, 50 U. S. 9 How. 196 [13 L. ed. 102]; Hooks v. Lee, 8 Ired. Eq. 157; Smith v. Moore, 4 N. J. Eq. 485; Johnston v. Spicer, supra, and cases cited; Hafer v. Hafer, supra.

It has even been held that letters between the parties, although informal, will be sufficient evidence of the contract. Logan v. Wienholt, 1 Clark & F. 611; Hammersley v. De Biel, 12 Clark & F. 45; Kinnard v. Daniel, 18 B. Mon. 496; Peck v. Vandemark, 99 N. Y. 29.

Reason and authority are both in favor of a liberal construction of these contracts, for their purpose is to prevent strife, secure peace, adjust rights and settle the question of marital rights in property. From the earliest years of the law, the courts of chancery, respecting the iron rules of the common law, have favored contracts of this character, and this rule of equity has been grafted into the body of American jurisprudence. Andrews v. Andrews, supra; Pierce v. Pierce, 71 N. Y. 154; Barth v. Lines, 7 West. Rep. 217, 118 Ill. 874; Jacobs v. Jacobs, supra; Beard v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 180; Shuee v. Shuee, 100 Ind. 477; Wright v. Jones, 2 West. Rep. 850, 105 Ind. 17-27.

Measuring this contract by the rules of law, reading it by the light of the attendant circumstances, and looking to the object the parties intended to accomplish, there can be no doubt as to the effect that should be given its provisions. Those provisions were intended to constitute a valid marriage settlement, and they do constitute such a settlement, vesting the wife of all interest in the husband's property, and freeing hers from any possible claim that he might otherwise have. The contract not only freed the wife's land from a claim upon the interest held by her at the time the contract was made, but it frees it from all interests which she might subsequently acquire. Cole v. Am. Baptist H. M. Society (N. H.) 6 New Eng. Rep. 406.

It not only governs as to her fixed interest, but also as to the possible or contingent interest which she had in the land when she entered into the contract. It is a mistake, therefore, to assert that there was no interest released except that fixed and vested when the contract was made; for the contract operated upon possible and contingent interests, as well as upon the then present and vested estate. To remove all claims to each other's property was, it is very plain, the leading purpose of the parties, and the court would do wrong to frustrate that purpose. The contract has long existed, has been acted upon; one of the parties is dead; and the courts cannot do otherwise than read the contract as the parties wrote it, and as they intended it should be read.

Turning from the main path to a point which counsel make, and which leads us aside, we affirm that the fact that a promise to marry was made six years before the writing was drawn and signed does not impeach the consideration of the contract. The written instrument, as the authorities agree, merges mere oral negotiations, expresses the matured agreement of the parties, and supplies the best evidence upon the subject of property rights. If parties put in writing their agreement concerning their property, and subsequently marry, the agreement, as written, is the source of evidence, and furnishes conclusive proof of the matured and final contract.

But if there were doubt as to our statement and application of this elementary principle, still the extraneous evidence is strongly against the appellant upon this question, for it shows that she made the final agreement to marry only upon terms such as those expressed in the writing. Her declarations, expressed in language much more emphatic than elegant, show that she exacted the contract, and that without it she would not have taken McNutt as her husband. Both the parol and the written evidence show that the contract was made in consideration of marriage, and that not only that consideration, but the further consideration that each should release all rights in the other's property, entered into the contract, and gives support to the agreement.

The child of Henry G. McNutt by his first marriage died before he did, leaving no children. The appellees are the brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces of Henry G. McNutt. The appellant's counsel insist that even if the validity of the antenuptial contract be affirmed, still the appellees cannot take to the exclusion of the appellant, because the marital rights of the widow are barred only in favor of the lineal descendants of the husband. Counsel thus state their propositions:

"The appellees, being only collateral relations of Henry G. McNutt, and there being no limitation in the contract for their benefit, they are not within the consideration of the antenuptial contract, but are mere volunteers, and cannot enforce the provisions of that contract against appellant. The term 'heirs,' as used in the antenuptial contract, relates to the then living children of Henry G. McNutt and of Eva McBride, who are specifically mentioned in the contract, and is not used in its technical sense at all. It follows that, the contract having been made for the benefit of Lawrence McNutt only, the appellees cannot have it specifically performed for their benefit."

The position of counsel is untenable. The word "heirs" is one of the strongest and most expressive terms in the law. Allen v. Craft, 7 West. Rep. 512, 109 Ind. 476; Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 190; Hochstedler v. Hochstedler, 7 West. Rep. 75, 108 Ind. 506.

Where this word is employed it will be given its settled, legal meaning, unless the context shows in the clearest and most decisive manner that the parties who used it intended that it should have some other meaning. Allen v. Craft and Shimer v. Mann, supra; Jesson v. Wright, 2 Bligh, 1, 56; Doe v. Gallini, 5 Barn. & Ad. 621; Lees v. Mosley, 1 Younge & C. (Exch.) 539; Powell v. Board of Domestic Missions, 49 Pa. 46-53; Robins v. Quintiren, 79 Pa. 383; Evans v. Evans, 3 Am. L. J. *231, 4 Pa. L. J. Rep. 478.

Where there is doubt, say the authorities, the word will be taken in its accepted legal signification. Heirs are lineal and collateral, but the genuine term includes both classes. Children in the lifetime of the parents may be heirs presumptive, but they are not heirs. Schoonmaker v. Sheely, 3 Denio, 485; 1 Prest. Est. 367.

It is an ancient maxim that "No one can be an heir during the lifetime of his ancestor." But in this instance the context of the instrument, and the attendant facts, very satisfactorily show that the parties intended to bar the rights of each in the property of the other, and to secure it to their respective descendants. The appellees are the heirs of Henry G. McNutt, and, as heirs, entitled to the real property of which he died seised. Cole v. Am. Baptist H. M. Society, supra.

Another proposition of counsel is thus stated: "But even if the term 'heirs' be given its strict, technical meaning, it does not avail appellees; because by operation of law which she cannot prevent, appellant is the only 'heir' of Henry G. McNutt, and appellees are not his heirs at all. She could not, by contract, change her legal status." There is a fallacy in this statement, for it contains covert assumptions which are not only unproved, but which are incapable of proof. It is not true that an antenuptial contract changes the status of the woman. This is evident because: (1) when it was made she was not a feme covert; (2) it does not affect the status of the wife when the marriage takes place, but simply the property of the husband and the wife respectively. 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 427.

It is unduly affirmed that the law absolutely casts upon the wife an estate in the lands of the husband, whereas it does not undertake to do so where, by agreement, the parties have fixed the rule which shall govern. The law operates in cases where there is no contract, but does not operate where the parties have for themselves agreed upon the mode in which marital rights shall attach. The law does not assume to override the agreement of the parties, but to furnish a rule where there is no agreement. To be sure, there must be an effective agreement or conveyance. If there is not, the law will prevail. There is little, if any, diversity of opinion upon the general proposition that parties may, by contract, intercept the line of descent, although there is some conflict as to what must be shown to support the contract. The rule long has been that dower and kindred rights may be excluded by the contract of the parties. Id.

Speaking of contracts of this class, Mr. Bishop says: "It is doing what is done every day in other things, namely: providing a rule by agreement to be applied instead of the rule which the law would furnish in the absence of an agreement." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 418.

The rule, as we have stated it, is affirmed by the text writers, and has been declared and enforced by many courts. Naill v. Maurer, Wentworth v. Wentworth, and Pierce v. Pierce, supra; De Barante v. Gott, 6 Barb. 492; Beard v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 190; Charles v. Charles, 8 Gratt. 486; Spiva v. Jeter, 9 Rich. Eq. 434; Merritt v. Scott, 6 Ga. 563.

The decision in the case of Wiseman v. Wise man, 78 Ind. 112, does not lend any support to the argument of appellant's counsel, but, on the contrary, is in direct hostility to it.

"Under our statute," said the court in that case, "a surviving wife who has not conveyed or relinquished her interest in the property of the husband, or accepted a jointure, or received a valid antenuptial settlement, can be deprived of her rights in the land of her deceased husband for one cause, and one cause only." There is, it is obvious, a full recognition of the validity of the antenuptial contract, and not a denial, in the decision from which we have quoted.

We conclude this phase of the subject by a quotation from one of our approved text books, and here assert it as the rule of decision. The author, after commenting on the decided cases, says: "It is but a step from such a case as this to another one, of which there are several in the books, where the parties agree beforehand that, after marriage, each shall hold his or her antenuptial property to his or her own separate use, and on the death of one of them neither shall have any marital claim on the estate of the other. This is, at least in a court of equity, generally esteemed to be a good bar to dower." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 428.

Counsel state an argument in the form of a question thus: "Was not the agreement not to claim marital rights an agreement not to claim a future demand not then in existence? If so, it was void."

This is substantially nothing more than a restatement of an argument of which we have already disposed; but, as it will serve to put our position in a stronger and clearer light, we will give Mr. Bishop's refutation of such argument: "The principle governing these cases," says he, "it should be remembered, is not that the antenuptial contract constitutes a release of dower, for a thing not existing cannot be released; but it is an undertaking not to claim dower—an introduction of a rule by agreement differing from the one which the law provides in the absence of an agreement. For the principle is well settled that, though parties marrying must take the status as the law established it, and cannot vary it by an antenuptial contract, yet, within certain legal limits, and proceeding by a legal rule, they may, by such contracts, vary any or all of those property rights which the status superinduces." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 427.

The argument that the appellant is an heir of Henry G. McNutt, and therefore entitled to the lands, is fallacious. It is very clear that the agreement was meant to exclude her, and that it does exclude her, from the inheritance. The object of the agreement was to bar her rights in the land of her husband. This was the plain intention of the parties, and that intention must prevail. To award her an interest would be to give her what the contract plainly denies her, and thus thwart the intention of the parties and defeat their agreement. But counsel are in error in assuming that a widow is an heir of her deceased husband in the legal sense of the term.

As said in Unfried v. Heberer, 68 Ind. 67: "A widow is an heir of her husband only in a special and limited sense, and not in the general sense in which that word is usually used and understood."

In Brown v. Harmon, 78 Ind. 412, and Wood v. Beasley, 5 West. Rep. 246, 107 Ind. 87, it was held that where a testator devised land to his widow as long as she should remain his widow, and directed that upon her marriage it should go to his heirs, the widow could not claim as heir. These cases rule here. They simply announce that courts will give effect to the manifest purpose of testators and contracting parties, and that where it appears that a widow was not intended to be dealt with as an heir she can acquire no rights in that capacity.

It is argued by counsel that the complaint asserts that the appellees have a legal title, and that they cannot recover upon the title proved because it is an equitable one. In support of this contention we are referred to the cases of Stout v. McPheeters, 84 Ind. 585; Burt v. Bowles, 69 Ind. 1; Brown v. Freed, 48 Ind. 253; Nichol v. Thomas, 58 Ind. 42; Rouse v. Beckett, 80 Ind. 154; and Stehman v. Crull, 26 Ind. 436.

We think that the only case that applies here is Burt v. Bowles, and that the decision in that case is adverse to the appellant. This we say, because the second paragraph of the complaint specifically sets forth the title of the appellees, and the evidence establishes the substance of the issue tendered by that paragraph. Under the ruling in Burt v. Bowles, this entitles the appellees to a recovery.

The facts alleged in that paragraph entitled the appellees to recover possession of the real estate, and it is the facts, and not the prayer, that control. But if it were conceded that the form of the judgment was not correct, still, as the appellant did not move to modify it, he cannot now present that question. Many cases hold that objections to a judgment must be presented by the proper motion to the trial court, or they will not be regarded on appeal. There is still another reason why there can be no reversal, and that is furnished by section 658 of the Code, which provides that no judgment "shall be reversed where it shall appear to the court that the merits of the cause have been fairly tried and determined in the court below."

There was no error in admitting parol evidence of the contents of the antenuptial contract. There was evidence tending to show that it had been destroyed by the appellant; and this, combined with the evidence that it once existed, was sufficient to let in secondary evidence.

It was within the discretion of the trial court to hear the testimony of a witness, although it was not offered until after the evidence had been closed. We can only interfere where there is a clear abuse of discretion, resulting in injustice, and we cannot hold that there was such an abuse of discretion in this instance.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, DISTRICT OF OREGON.

THE CITY OF SALEM—A. F. REED,
Libelant.

(....Sawy.....Fed. Rep.....)

*1. The power to regulate commerce among the several States comprehends the power to regulate the navigable waters of the United States on which such commerce may be or is carried; and to this end Congress may make any regulation concerning such navigation, including the vessels engaged therein, as may be necessary and proper to secure and maintain the safety and convenience of the waterway; which regulations are so far applicable to vessels engaged only in intrastate commerce thereon as to those engaged in interstate commerce.

2. The regulation contained in § 4465 of U. S. Rev. Stat., forbidding a steamboat to carry more passengers than allowed in her certificate of inspection, held, to apply to such boats engaged in carrying passengers on a navigable water of the United States between ports of the same State only.

LIBEL against a steamboat and owner for penalties under section 4465, U. S. Rev. Stat. Exception to libel disallowed.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. Scott Beebe, for libelant, cited—Pollock v. The Sea Bird, 8 Fed. Rep. 578; Hatch v. The Boston, 8 Fed. Rep. 807; The Laura M. Starin, 11 Fed. Rep. 177; United States v. Ferry Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 381; U. S. v. McLane, 31 Fed. Rep. 763; Same v. Same, 34 U. S. 6 Pet. 404 (8 L. ed. 448); Lord v. Steamship Co. 102 U. S. 541 (26 L. ed. 224).

Mr. Charles J. Macdougall for owner and claimant.

*Read notes by DEADY, J.

DEADY, J., delivered the following opinion:
This suit is brought by the libelant, A. F. Reed, against the steamboat City of Salem and Robert Thompson, her owner, to recover sundry penalties for carrying more passengers than is allowed by the vessel's certificate of inspection.

An exception is filed to the libel, to the effect that the transportation of passengers in question was wholly within the State, and was therefore not within the grant of power to Congress to regulate commerce nor the jurisdiction of this court.

Section 4390 of the Revised Statutes declares: "Every vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam shall be deemed a steam vessel within the meaning of this title" (52); and section 4400 of the same provides: "All steam vessels navigating any of the waters of the United States, which are common highways of commerce or open to general or competitive navigation, excepting public vessels of the United States, vessels of other countries, and boats . . . for navigating canals, shall be subject to the provisions of this title" (52).

It is also provided in this title that there shall be an inspector of hulls and one of boilers in each district who shall inspect all steam vessels, and when they "approve a vessel and her equipment" they shall make a certificate to the collector to that effect. Rev. Stat. § 4421.

In case of a steamer "carrying passengers, other than ferry boats, the number of passengers of each class that any such steamer has accommodation for, and can carry with prudence and safety," shall be stated in said certificate (Rev. Stat. § 4465); and if any steamer shall "take on board" any more passengers

L. ed. 391; U. S. v. Burlington & H. Co. Ferry Co. (Iowa) 21 Fed. Rep. 332.

Regulations of supervising inspectors. The rules of navigation established by the supervising inspectors under section 4412 of the Revised Statutes are valid and binding, in so far as they do not conflict with the statutory rules of navigation in section 4393. The Milwaukee, 1 Brown, Adm. 323; The Grand Republic (N. Y.) 16 Fed. Rep. 434. The manifest object of section 4405 is, as its very language imports, to secure, "in the most effective manner," a compliance with the various general provisions of title 52; and for that purpose it authorizes the board to establish all necessary regulations to carry out those specific provisions. "Regulations to be observed by all steam vessels in passing each other." These regulations, when not inconsistent with the specific statutory rules, are held valid and enforced. The Grand Republic, 16 Fed. Rep. 434, 437; The B. B. Saunders, 19 Fed. Rep. 118, 121. So far as they may be in conflict with the statutory provisions, they are null and void. The Atlas, 4 Ben. 35, 30; The Milwaukee, 1 Brown, Adm. 312, 321; The American Eagle, 1 Low. 425, 427; U. S. v. Miller, 25 Fed. Rep. 97. In proceedings to recover a penalty for violations of the navigation laws, the burden of proof is on the prosecution. The Pope Catlin (Georgia) 31 Fed. Rep. 403.

Inspection. Under sections 4425 and 4470, Revised Statutes, the steamboat inspectors may require ferryboats to be provided with the same precautions against fire, so far as applicable, that are expressly provided in reference to any other steam vessels carrying passengers; and when the boat passes inspection on the basis of having a steam pump provided in accordance with section 4471, the boat is bound to maintain it in the condition required by that section. The Garden City (N. Y.) 26 Fed. Rep. 783.

Examination of applicants for license. A system of examinations is provided for, and an oath must than the number stated in the certificate of inspection, the owner shall be liable to any person who may sue for the same, in the penalty of $10 for each such passenger (Rev. Stat. § 4466), and such penalties shall be a lien on the vessel. Id. § 4469.

It appears from the libel that on July 4, 1888, the City of Salem was a vessel wholly propelled by steam and engaged in navigating the Wallamet River, and was duly enrolled and licensed therefor; that by her certificate of inspection she was only entitled to carry sixty passengers; that on said day this vessel was engaged in carrying passengers from the Port of Portland to other points and places on said river and within this district, and did on four such trips carry in the aggregate, 2910 more passengers than allowed by her certificate.

The precise question raised in this case has never been passed on by the supreme court. In the district courts there have been apparently conflicting decisions on the point.

In The Gretna Green, 20 Fed. Rep. 901, it was held that a steamboat "regularly enrolled and licensed" for the navigation of the Ohio River, "and subject to the Laws of Congress," was not liable, under § 4492 of the Revised Statutes, for carrying passengers in barges in tow, the same not being equipped as prescribed by the supervising inspectors, between different ports of the same State. But the opinion leaves it in doubt whether the steamboat would be liable for carrying passengers on her own decks between the same points, contrary to the Laws of the United States on the subject.

After substantially admitting that Congress has the power to prescribe the law of the highway, so far as may be necessary to protect interstate commerce, the court says: "The steamer which had these barges in tow, being subject to the navigation Laws of the United States, the mere fact that she took in tow the barges had nothing to do with any interference with the proper navigation of the Ohio River."

In United States v. Burlington Ferry Company, 21 Fed. Rep. 831, it was held that the owners of the vessel engaged in navigating the waters of the Mississippi, carrying passengers between two ports in the State of Iowa, in excess of the number authorized by a permit issued under section 4466 of the Revised Statutes, are liable for the penalties prescribed in section 4500 of the same.

The court held that Congress has power to regulate the navigation of vessels on the navigable waters of the United States, when engaged exclusively in interstate commerce, and that when a steam ferryboat, contrary to section 4466 of the Revised Statutes, carries passengers between ports of the same State, in excess of the number allowed in her permit, she is guilty of a marine tort, and a District Court of the United States has jurisdiction of a suit in admiralty against her owners to recover the penalty prescribed by section 4500 of the Revised Statutes for the same.

In The Seneca, 1 Bls. 371, it was held that a steamboat employed in carrying passengers between two ports of the State of Wisconsin was not liable to a penalty for not having her hull and boilers inspected under the Steamboat Act of 1852.

In the case of The Oyster Police Steamers of Maryland, 81 Fed. Rep. 763, it was held that three steam vessels belonging to the State of Maryland not engaged in carrying freight or passengers, but used to enforce the State Fishery Laws in the Chesapeake Bay, are liable to the penalties prescribed by § 4499 of the Revised Statutes, for failing to have their hulls and be taken before the granting of the license; and boards of inspectors are given power to investigate acts of incompetence and misconduct of these licensed officers. Rev. Stat. §§ 4433, 4432. But these and similar provisions do not create any new or other officers on shipboard than existed before the passage of the Acts. U. S. v. Huff (Tenn.) 13 Fed. Rep. 323, 322. An indictment under Revised Statutes, 4433, which provides that it shall be unlawful to employ any person, or for any person to serve, as a master, chief mate, engineer, or pilot on any steamer, who is not licensed by the inspectors, need not charge that the employment was with knowledge that the employe had not been licensed as the statute required. U. S. v. Sims (Ohio) 9 Fed. Rep. 443. Section 4441 provides that the inspector shall examine the applicant for license as an engineer, and also requires the engineer, when employed on a vessel, to place his certificate of license in some conspicuous place in such vessel, where it can be seen by passengers at all times. U. S. v. Sims (Ohio) 9 Fed. Rep. 444. Inspectors of the United States have authority to issue a license to the master of a steamboat to act as pilot between Boston and Havana. Rev. Stat. § 4442; Joslyn v. Nickerson (Mass.) 1 Fed. Rep. 133.

Interstate commerce. A steamboat employed by a railroad company to transport passengers on Jamaica Bay, Long Island (which is an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean entirely within the State of New York), in connection with a railroad forming a part of the railroad system of the whole country, is engaged in interstate commerce to an extent sufficient to bring her within the provisions of sections 4465 and 4469 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing penalties for steamers carrying more passengers than allowed by their certificates of inspection. The Hazel Kirke (N. Y.) 25 Fed. Rep. 601.

Provisions against carrying excess of passengers. A steamboat, having obtained a certificate as a general passenger boat, and not as a ferryboat, does not come within the exception in section 4464.

The Hazel Kirke (N. Y.) 25 Fed. Rep. 601. An oral permission to carry an excess of passengers is not admissible as a defense. Pollock v. The Laura, 5 Fed. Rep. 133. In estimating the number of passengers on a steamer no deduction is to be made for children or persons not paying, but those employed in managing the vessel are not to be included; and in estimating the tonnage the measurement of the custom house at the port of arrival is to be taken. U. S. v. The Louisa Barbara, Gilp. 332. When a steam ferry boat, contrary to the provision of Revised Statutes, § 4466, carries passengers on an excursion, largely in excess of the number allowed by her permit, and fails to carry the required number of life preservers, she is guilty of a marine tort, and a United States District Court has jurisdiction of a libel in personam against her owners and master to recover the penalty prescribed by section 4500. U. S. v. Burlington & H. C. Ferry Co. (Iowa) 21 Fed. Rep. 332. Under section 4466 of the Revised Statutes, where a passenger steamer does not carry, or purpose to carry, a number of passengers additional to the number authorized by its certificate, and does not go or purpose to go out of the waters where it is authorized by its certificate to ply, it is not an "excursion" in the meaning of the statute, and no special permit in writing is necessary. The Pope Catlin, 31 Fed. Rep. 408.

Remedy by action for penalty. An action for the penalty need not be prosecuted in the name of the United States. Hatch v. The Boston (Pa.) 3 Fed. Rep. 807. In an action for the penalty, under section 4465 of the Revised Statutes, the United States is not a necessary party. The Laura M. Starin, 11 Fed. Rep. 177; Pollock v. The Sea Bird (N. Y.) 3 Fed. Rep. 573. The secretary of the treasury may remit claims of informers (Rev. Stat. § 5294), and of the United States, its penalties and forfeitures incurred, under sections 4465 and 4469 of the Revised Statutes, for carrying a greater number of passengers than the certificate of inspection permits; and such remission will operate as a full discharge.

huller inspected by the United States inspectors, under sections 4417 and 4418 of the Revised Statutes.

The court held that the "supreme and exclusive control" of Congress of the navigable waters of the United States "might be defeated or rendered less effective for its objects, if there were to be recognized a class of vessels privileged to use them, without being subject to those provisions which Congress determines are required for the safety of all. I am, therefore, unable to assent to the contention that the fact that the vessels in the present case are not used in commerce, but solely for the police purposes of the fishery force, prevents Congress from having the constitutional power to legislate with regard to them. It is not their use, but the fact that they navigate the highways of commerce, which brings them within the constitutional grant of power, and within the language of section 4400 of the Act of Congress.

In Lord v. Goodall Steamship Company, 109 U. S. 541 [26 L. ed. 224], it was held by the supreme court, in the language of the syllabus, that "While navigating the high seas, between ports of the same State, a vessel of the United States is, together with the business in which she is engaged, subject to the regulative power of Congress." Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in speaking for the court said, in substance, that The Venture, while navigating the Pacific Ocean, although bound from and to ports in the State of California, was without the State and on a highway of Nations, and therefore "engaged in commerce with foreign Nations, and as such she and the business in which she was engaged were subject to the regulating power of Congress."

This case falls within the language of the statute (§§ 4399, 4400, Rev. Stat.), defining what vessels shall be subject to the provisions of title 52.

The City of Salem is a vessel propelled by steam. On the occasion in question she was navigating the Willamette River, a navigable water of the United States (Hatch v. Wallamet Iron Bridge Co. 7 Sawy. 136; Wallamet Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 9 Sawy. 648), which "is a common highway of commerce and open to general and competitive navigation."

Unless the Act of Congress, so far as the carriage of the passengers in question is concerned, is unconstitutional, the vessel is liable for the penalties prescribed for carrying more passengers than the law allows.

In my judgment, the solution of this question depends wholly on whether the regulation limiting the number of passengers which a steamboat may carry over a navigable water of the United States, between ports of the same State, is necessary to maintain this highway of foreign and interstate commerce in a safe and desirable condition, for the use of vessels and persons engaged in the same.

The power to make this regulation cannot, in my judgment, be derived from the grant of admiralty jurisdiction. The admiralty jurisdiction of the United States is a part of its judicial power and not its legislative. It extends "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." U. S. Const. art. 3, § 2.

And while it does not authorize Congress to create admiralty cases, yet if in the exercise of its power derived from other clauses of the Constitution it should do so (as the power to regulate commerce), the grant of judicial power would extend to them and include them; because of their nature and constituents they would be cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Take this case as an illustration: The City of Salem is alleged to have violated a Law of the United States, to which a penalty is affixed and made a lien on the vessel. The act was lock v. The Laura (N. Y.) 5 Fed. Rep. 184. In a suit for carrying an unlawful number of passengers, it appearing that the persons were intruders against the will of the officers of the boat, and that the boat moved from her landing to another convenient place to avoid a crowd of people who it was feared might force their way upon her and endanger her, the penalties were not incurred. Poor v. The Geneva (Pa.) 25 Fed. Rep. 647. The libel need not allege that the libellant was a passenger on such steamer, or that he was an informer, or that he used as such; nor need it set out the names of the passengers. Pollock v. The Sea Bird, 8 Fed. Rep. 372. It is sufficient if it sets forth the offense in the words of the statute which creates it, with sufficient certainty as to the time and place of its commission. U. S. v. The Neuren, 80 U. S. 19 How. 94 (15 L. ed. 522).

Prohibition of petroleum on passenger vessels. In an action to recover penalties for the violation of section 4472, Revised Statutes, which prohibits the carrying of petroleum and other dangerous articles upon passenger vessels, although there was an all-rail route over which the petroleum might have been transported, yet, if the rates charge for transportation by rail were so high as to amount to a prohibition of the traffic in that article, it was held that it was not a practicable mode of transportation within the meaning of the section. United States v. Wise (Ohio) 7 Fed. Rep. 192. Same case, 8 Fed. Rep. 41. The word practicable in that section, is used in a commercial or business, and not in a mechanical, sense. Id. 191.

Injury to employees. The remedy given by section 4493 for an injury to an employe on a steam vessel is merely cumulative, and does not exclude the right to any other remedy for such injury which may be given by the general admiralty law. The Clatsop Chief (Or.) 5 Fed. Rep. 707.

of the boat, and prosecuting the same to judgment, release the lien given by section 4460, Revised Statutes. Hatch v. The Boston (Pa.) 3 Fed. Rep. 807. Such lien was not defeated by a sale to a bona fide purchaser. Id. It is not necessary that the vessel should have been attached, before the filing of the libel, to enforce the statutory lien. Id. That the libellant did not proceed against the vessel until the recovery of the judgment, in the personal action against the master and owners, did not constitute laches. Id. Where the claimant pleaded, in his answer to a libel filed under the Revised Statutes, section 4465, an oral permission to carry additional passengers on excursions, under Revised Statutes, section 4466, which requires that the permission should be in writing; this defense could not avail the claimant, and that part of the answer must be stricken out upon exception as immaterial. Pollock v. The Laura, 5 Fed. Rep. 184.

committed on a navigable water of the United States and the admiralty had jurisdiction of the case—to hear and determine it. But if Congress had not the power to pass the law in question, the suit must fail, because no wrong was in fact committed.

The power to make this regulation must be derived, if at all, from the power granted to Congress “to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.” U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8.

In Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 724 [18 L. ed. 99], Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the court, said: “The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all navigable waters of the United States, which are accessible from a State, other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the Nation and subject to all the requisite legislation of Congress.”

And in the case of The Daniel Ball, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 564 [19 L. ed. 1001], Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: The power to regulate commerce “authorizes appropriate legislation for the protection of either interstate or foreign commerce; and for that purpose such legislation as will insure the convenient or safe navigation of all navigable waters of the United States, whether that legislation consists in regulating the removal of obstructions to their use, in prescribing the form and size of vessels employed upon them, or in subjecting the vessels to inspection and license in order to insure their proper construction and equipment.”

That in the case of steamboats, the inspections of their hulls and boilers, the licensing of their pilots and engineers, the carrying of prescribed lights, and the giving and answering of prearranged signals when meeting and passing, do materially increase the safety and convenience of navigable water, considered as a highway of commerce, there is no doubt, and therefore there is no question that Congress may make regulations on these subjects, which are applicable to vessels engaged in intrastate commerce as well as foreign or interstate commerce.

The power to regulate the navigation of the waters of the United States being comprehended in the grant of power to regulate commerce, not merely as an incident but a part of it, Congress has power “to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution” such power. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8.

In McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 421 [4 L. ed. 579], Chief Justice Marshall said: “Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, are plainly adapted to that end which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.” And again (Id. 423): “But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground.”

Upon this exposition of the law, is this regulation, limiting the right of steamboats to carry passengers on a navigable water of the 2 L. R. A.

United States, to the number prescribed by the certificate of inspection of the local inspectors, a necessary and proper regulation of navigation, when such boat is engaged in carrying passengers on such water between different ports of the same State, only?

That it is so, is at least not so apparent as in the instances mentioned, in which it appears there is no doubt on the subject.

In what particular a boat carrying more passengers than allowed by her certificate of inspection or special permit affects the safety or convenience of the highway has not been suggested by counsel. That the passengers so carried are inconvenienced, and it may be endangered, is likely. But the question is, How is the safety and convenience of the highway thereby unfavorably affected as to other vessels engaged in interstate or foreign commerce thereon? If it was shown that an overloaded boat was more difficult to handle or more likely to become unmanageable or burst her boiler or steam chest, the danger resulting to other vessels on the highway would be apparent. But there is no proof on this subject, and I am not satisfied that it is within the limits of judicial knowledge.

One thing is probable: If a steamboat is allowed to carry passengers between the ports of any State, over the navigable waters of the United States, in excess of the number prescribed in its certificate of inspection, the boats running between said ports, and from or beyond, to ports of another State, will be compelled to do the same thing or substantially abandon what may be called their way business. For anyone can understand that a vessel can carry 200 passengers much cheaper per head than another one of the same character and dimensions can carry half the number. The result would be to nullify the regulation or make its enforcement difficult in cases where it is admitted to be legal and presumably beneficial.

It may be said that when it is determined that the carrying of passengers between different ports of the same State is not within the power of Congress to regulate, the State will make proper regulations on the subject. But it is not probable that any state regulation on this subject would be either effective or well enforced.

Congress has expressly declared (§§ 4399, 4400, Rev. Stat.) that this regulation shall apply to steamboats carrying passengers over any part of a navigable water of the United States. The regulation, when applied to the carriage of passengers between ports of the same State, is a beneficial one, and its enforcement tends to the safety of human life. Without it, the excursion boats, which on festive occasions ply between ports of the same State, would often become floating coffins. If this regulation, as applied to vessels engaged in intrastate commerce, is really calculated to promote the safety and convenience of interstate and foreign commerce, in any appreciable degree, the enactment of it is within the discretion of Congress. And while I am not as clear in my mind on this point as I would like to be, I have an impression, which I feel more certainly than I can express, that the regulation in its effect and operation does materially tend to maintain the safety and convenience of this highway of interstate and foreign commerce—the Wallamet River.

On this view of the matter I do not feel warranted, sitting here in the district court, in declaring this Act of Congress unconstitutional. It is a proper case to go to the supreme court. The exception is disallowed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

BUFFALO EAST SIDE STREET R.
CO., Appt.,

(.....N. Y.....)

1. A contract between street railroad companies to make no change in rates of fare so long as the rates allowed by law upon a certain date shall be received will terminate by force of its own limitation when a statute is passed reducing such rates—since it cannot be supposed, without the clearest language indicating such an intention, that parties to a contract anticipated the enactment of an unconstitutional law or contracted upon such an assumption.

2. A statute making it unlawful for street railroad companies in a certain city to charge the rates of fare then received does not impair the obligation of a contract between two of the companies operating street railroads in that city by which each has agreed not to change the rates without the consent of the other.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of Buffalo, sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action for liquidated damages for alleged breach of contract. Affirmed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. James C. Carter, for appellant:

A contract, whether between natural persons or corporate bodies, valid at the time it was made, continues valid and binding, notwithstanding any state legislation, until its full performance.

The property of a corporation is secured to it by the same constitutional guaranties; and its contracts are just as obligatory and inviolable as in the case of natural persons.

There is no difference, so far as the principle in question is concerned, between contracts between individuals and those to which the State is a party.

See 3 Hamilton's Works (Lodge's ed.), p. 29; Angell & A. Corp. § 767; Seibert v. Lewis, 123 U. S. 284 (30 L. ed. 1161).

The Legislature may dictate what contracts corporate bodies may in the future make, but it cannot absolve them from the obligation to perform contracts already made.

Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700 (25 L. ed. 496).

A Legislature cannot by any action under the reserved power take away any property or right, or affect any obligation, acquired or assumed by a legitimate exercise of the powers granted to a corporate body.

The companies are private corporations, although existing for public uses, and contracts made by them with their creditors, with each other or by the State with them, are as inviolable as if they were private individuals.

The Act of May 3, 1872, was (so far as this point is concerned), in legal effect, an express and inviolable contract between the State and the companies, by which, for a valuable consideration, the State agreed with them that, during their corporate existence, they should have the right to charge the rates of fare which they were permitted to charge on that day, unless changed by their mutual consent; and the Act of June 18, 1875, is unconstitutional because it impaired that contract.

When the plaintiff took defendant's promise not to change its fares, it did so knowing that the franchise to change any fare was within the control of the Legislature, and that no one Legislature could take away this power, directly or indirectly, from its successor. So contracting, it impliedly consented that this should be so; and the subsequent legislative action, therefore, in no manner impaired the obligation of the contract which had been made with it.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and defendant are respectively incorporated street railroad companies, located in the City of Buffalo, and the action was 2 L. R. A.

brought upon a contract to recover a sum stipulated to be paid, as liquidated damages, upon a breach thereof by either party that should reduce its rates of fare below the prices authorized to be charged under the statutes in force on May 3, 1872; each party thereby agreeing to make no change therein without the consent of the other.

Subsequently to this contract the Legislature, by chapter 600 of the Laws of 1875, enacted, in substance, that it should be unlawful for any street railroad companies in Buffalo to charge more than five cents for each passenger carried on their respective roads without regard to the distance traveled. This price was considerably less than the amount authorized to be charged by the former statute. Immediately thereafter the defendant reduced its rates of fare to the price authorized by the Act of 1875; and this reduction constitutes the breach of the contract relied upon for a recovery.

No question is made but that if the Act of 1875 was a valid enactment, the defendant was required to conform to it, and would have a good defense to the action. It is, however, claimed by the plaintiff that the Act was unconstitutional and void, inasmuch as it impaired the obligation of contracts. The only contract claimed to have been impaired is the one sued upon. Among the defenses made to the action is the claim that the agreement had terminated, before the alleged breach, by virtue of its own limitation; and it is also urged that a reasonable construction of the language of the agreement shows that its obligations were not intended to survive any statutory reduction of the rates of fare chargeable upon such railroads.

There is no express provision in the contract providing for the period of its duration, but there are several which furnish strong grounds for the inference that the parties did not intend that it should continue after an unfavorable change in the rates of fare. Among these provisions, it is only necessary to refer to one providing that "the said party of the first part, so long as it receives for the transportation of passengers the fare allowed by law on the third day of May, 1872, and no longer," will make connections with roads to be built by the party of the second part, and run a sufficient number of cars to accommodate all passengers applying for transportation, etc.; and another contained in the fifth paragraph, which provides that the party of the first part agrees that it will, during the continuance of the contract, charge the same rates for the transportation of passengers over its railroads, or any part thereof, that it is "permitted to charge by the statutes in force regulating the same on the third day of May, 1872, and that it will not make any change in such rates without the consent of the party of the second part."

Similar provisions were contained in the contract relating to the obligations of the party of the second part, and contemplating the termination of the contract upon the same contingency.

It is quite clear that the parties had in view a condition of affairs under which they would not be permitted to charge and receive the rates of fare authorized by former Acts, and in that event expressly provided for the termination of the contract. But the plaintiff contends that the rates authorized on May 8, 1873, still continue, so far as these two companies are concerned, by force of the obligations of their contract, and that the State was precluded by the constitutional inhibition from passing any law impairing its effect. We are not impressed with the soundness of this contention. It was competent for the parties to agree upon any period as the duration of their contract, and they might, if they chose to do so, provide that it should cease upon the passage of even an unconstitutional law. It is difficult to explain what is meant by the expressions that the contract should continue so long as the companies receive and were permitted to charge the rates authorized on May 8, 1873, and no longer, if there was no constitutional power to effect such change. Settled rules of construction require us to give some meaning and effect to all of the language employed in the contract, provided it can be done without doing violence to the plain object and intent of the parties in making their agreement.

It is quite clear that the parties assumed the existence of the power of the Legislature to change the rates, and contracted with reference to such a contingency. A fair and reasonable construction of the contract would seem to be that the parties intended a change effected by the voluntary action of the parties alone, and not one made in obedience to paramount authority. It would be unreasonable to say that either party intended to run the hazard and danger of disobedience to a statute of the State, and there is nothing, we think, in the contract which required it to do so. Every exercise of legislative power is presumed to be constitutional, and it cannot, without the clearest language indicating such an intention, be supposed that parties anticipated the enactment of an unconstitutional law, or contracted upon such an assumption. We are therefore of the opinion that the contract, so far as this provision was concerned, had terminated by force of its own limitation when the Act of 1875 was enacted. Construed in this way, the legislation of 1873,* incidentally referring to this contract, and providing that its validity should not be affected thereby, is intelligible, and perhaps sustainable; but upon any other theory it is difficult to see its object or design. We cannot ascribe to the Legislature an intention by that Act to hamper and restrain its successors in the exercise of legitimate constitutional power over the subject of railroad fares—Railroad Commission Cases, 116 U. S. 307 [29 L. ed. 636]—and if it was an effort to pass upon the validity of the contract, that subject was a judicial one, and beyond the province of legislative authority to act upon.

But we are further of the opinion that the Act of 1875 was a valid exercise of legislative power, and did not impair the obligations of any contract with the meaning of the constitutional provision. The inability of one Legislature to limit or control the legislative action of its successors is a familiar principle which needs no citation to support it. Brick Presby. Church v. New York, 5 Cow. 588.

The same authority which confers upon one body the power of legislation authorizes its successors, in the exercise of their duty, to change, alter and annul existing laws when, in their judgment, the public interest requires it. In the performance of their duty of legislating for the public welfare, each successive body must, from necessity, be left untrammelled, except by the restraints of the fundamental law; and when called upon to act upon subjects which concern the health, morals or interests of the people, as affected by a public use of property for which compensation is exacted by its owners, they are unlimited by any constitutional restraint.

It is unnecessary to discuss this proposition with much fullness, as it was conceded by the appellant upon the argument, and is repeated in its printed brief, that the authority of the Legislature, in the exercise of its police powers, could not be limited or restricted by the provisions of contracts between individuals or corporations. Pacta privata publico juri derogare non possunt. This proposition is also abundantly established by authority. Brick Presby. Church v. New York, supra; Coates v. New York, 7 Cow. 535; Vanderbilt v. Adams, Id. 349; New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 251; People v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569; Stone v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. 116 U. S. 807 [29 L. ed. 636]; Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27 [28 L. ed. 928].

It was said in People v. Boston Railroad Company, supra, that "Railroad corporations hold their property and exercise their functions for the public benefit, and they are therefore subject to legislative control. The Legislature which has created them may regulate the mode in which they shall transact their business, the price which they shall charge for the transportation of freight and passengers, etc. . . . It may make all such regulations as are appropriate to protect the lives of persons carried upon railroads, or passing upon highways crossed by railroads. All this is within the domain of legislative power, although the power to alter and amend the charters of such corporations has not been reserved . . . Such legislation violates no contract, takes away no property, and interferes with no vested right."

In Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 134 [24 L. ed. 88], Chief Justice Waite, in speaking of the implied powers which social organization confers upon its government over the conduct and property of members, says that "It does authorize the establishment of laws requiring each citizen to so conduct himself, and so use his own property, as not necessarily to injure another. This is the very essence of government, and has found expression in the maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas. From this source came the police powers, which, as was said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the Licenses Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 583 [12 L. ed. 256], 'are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty . . .

* The "legislation of 1873" referred to is chapter 512 of the Laws of that year, passed May 15, 1873, amending the Act Incorporating the Buffalo East Side Railway Company. Said Act of 1873 provides that "Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed so as to impair the validity of any contract now existing between said company and the Buffalo Street Railroad Company; but the same shall remain valid and binding according to the terms thereof." [Rep.]

strued so as to impair the validity of any contract now existing between said company and the Buffalo Street Railroad Company; but the same shall remain valid and binding according to the terms thereof." [Rep.]

that is to say . . . the power to govern men and things.' Under these powers the government regulates the conduct of its citizens one towards another, and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good. In their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its first colonization, to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold."

Judge Bradley, in the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 747 [25 L. ed. 511], referring to the Munn Case, says: "The inquiry there was as to the extent of the police power in cases where the public interest is affected; and we held that when an employment or business becomes a matter of such public interest and importance as to create a common charge or burden upon the citizen—in other words, when it becomes a practical monopoly, to which the citizen is compelled to resort, and by means of which a tribute can be exacted from the community—it is subject to regulation by the legislative power."

We think it unnecessary to discuss the question as to how far the Legislature were authorized to go in regulating the affairs of corporations under the power of amendment and repeal imposed by the Revised and other Statutes. Section 8, tit. 8, chap. 18, pt. 1, p. 1581 (7th ed.). It seems to be conceded by all of the authorities that such reservations confer upon them power to regulate, to a certain extent, the general management and control of the internal affairs of such corporations; but the grounds already referred to are sufficient to dispose of the case without considering questions not essential to that end. We think the authorities cited are decisive of the question, and lead to an affirmance of the judgment.

1. The provisions of the New York Revised Statutes as to the incorporation

NOTE.—Devises, and legacy to corporations; statutory restriction. Restraining statutes were introduced into the Colony of New York and became operative as a part of the common law of the Colony. Reformed Church v. Schoolcraft, 65 N. Y. 155; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 178; DeRuyter v. St. Peter's Church, 3 Barb. Ch. 119, 3 N. Y. 239. Land forfeited, under the Mortmain Acts in New England, for being conveyed to a corporation without license, may, nevertheless, when so alienated, be held until the heir or the Crown enters for the forfeiture. The question of title is between the corporation and the owner of the forfeit right; and no stranger can take advantage of the defeasibility of the title. Cromie v. Louisville Orphans Home Society, 3 Bush, 384. See Starkeweather v. American Bible Society, 73 Ill. 80. Where the terms of § 1 L. R. A.

of colleges are not restricted to colleges incorporated by the regents of the university of the State, but apply also, except as otherwise provided, to colleges created by special charters.

2. The provision of the Charter of Cornell University, that "The corporation hereby created may hold real and personal property not exceeding $3,000,000 in the aggregate," gives the measure of the power of the university to take as well as to hold real property. It cannot be held that while the power of a college, given by 1 New York Revised Statutes, 460, "to take and hold by gift, grant or devise, any real or personal property the income or revenue of which shall not exceed the value of $25,000," is enlarged in respect to the power to hold property the power to take is thereby left unlimited.

3. A devise or bequest to a corporation, of property which will exceed the amount or value which the corporation is by law permitted to take, will be void for the excess; and as to that excess no title will vest for a single moment in the corporation, but will vest instantly in the heir or next of kin. The power to raise the question of the right of the corporation to take the property is not confined to the State, but the question may be raised by the heirs or next of kin.

4. Where a testator gives a university certain sums of money in trust for various purposes, to the fund of one of which the residue of the estate is given, and directs the estate to be converted into money or available securities as soon as it can be done, having in view the best interest of the estate, it operates as an equitable conversion of the estate, and no real estate owned by the testator is thereby devised.

5. An agreement made August 4, 1863, between the State of New York, through the commissioners of the land office acting under and by virtue of Laws of 1866, chap. 481, and Ezra Cornell, for the sale to the latter of the agricultural land scrip held by the State, must be construed to make such sale at thirty cents per acre, with an additional thirty cents if so much should be thereafter realized on the sale by the vendee; and the fact that he agreed to pay his profits, if any were realized, into the treasury of the State as the property of Cornell University, does not make such profits any portion of the purchase price of the scrip. These profits which he hoped to realize, and which were entirely speculative, were paid over, not as a debt to the State, but as a gift of his own to the university.

York, died May 4, 1877, leaving a last will and testament, by which he left $500,000 in trust for his daughter, Jennie McGraw, and made her his residuary legatee, with full power to dispose of all the property left by him, by her will; but in case she made no will and died childless, it was his desire that two sevenths of the property so remaining should go to his nephew Thomas H. McGraw, and the remainder to the other five children of the testator's brother Joseph.

Jennie McGraw married Willard Fiske in July, 1880, and died September 30, 1881, leaving property to the amount of $2,000,000, exclusive of a trust fund of $250,000, being part of the $500,000 trust created by the will of her father, John McGraw, as above stated. She left a last will and testament by which she bequeathed to Cornell University, an educational corporation located at Ithaca, certain specific legacies amounting to $200,000, and by which, after certain legacies to others, the university was made residuary legatee.

Cornell University was incorporated by a Special Act of the Legislature of the State of New York (chap. 585, Laws of 1865), section 5 of which provides that the corporation thereby created "may hold real and personal property not exceeding $3,000,000 in the aggregate."

In the proceedings before the Surrogate of Tompkins County for the settlement of the accounts of Douglass Boardman, executor of the will of Jennie McGraw Fiske, Thomas H. McGraw and others, devisees and legatees under the will of John McGraw, and Joseph McGraw and others, heirs and next of kin of Jennie McGraw Fiske, contended that the said legacies to Cornell University were void, for the reason that the university, at the time of the testatrix's death, held the full amount of property limited by its charter, and therefore could not take the legacies in question.

The surrogate decided that the property then held by the university did not equal the limited amount of $3,000,000, and decreed that the executor should pay to it the amounts of the legacies bequeathed to it.

An appeal from this decree was taken to the general term, where it was reversed; and from the judgment of reversal the present appeal was thereupon taken by Cornell University and Douglass Boardman, executor, the respondents being Thomas H. McGraw and others, devisees and legatees under the will of John McGraw, deceased; Joseph McGraw and others, heirs and next of kin of Jennie McGraw Fiske; Willard Fiske, husband of Jennie McGraw Fiske.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edwin Countryman, with Mr. S. D. Halliday, for appellants.

Mr. George F. Comstock for respondents.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question to be decided in this case is whether Cornell University or some other parties, being the residuary legatees, or else the heirs at law or next of kin of John McGraw, deceased, or of Jennie McGraw Fiske, deceased, or her husband, shall have the property, or any portion of it, bequeathed to the university by the will of Mrs. Fiske.

In case the university should be held not to be a competent legatee, the question as to where the property shall go is, as we understand, a matter in which the various parties to the litigation have agreed; and hence the only question we need consider is, first, in regard to the capacity of the corporation to take the legacy. If that should be decided in the affirmative, it would be necessary to discuss no other question. If, however, it should be held that the corporation had no power to take and hold more than $3,000,000, the second question would be as to whether it was the owner and holder of such an amount at the time of the decease of Mrs. Fiske.

Both of these questions are important and worthy of the most careful and deliberate consideration. The case involves a very large amount of property, and involves, also, the decision of a question as to the effect of the general statutes relating to the acquisition and holding of property by corporations of the class of this university, as the same have been affected by the terms of the special charter granted to it.

The case has been most elaborately and ably argued by counsel on both sides, and the written briefs submitted to the court by them bear conclusive evidence of the thoroughness and extent of their researches into the English Law on the subject of mortmain and its results, as well as that of our own and of the other States of the Union.

To examine and comment upon each argument advanced, and to go through the long list of cases cited in this and other States and in England, would render this opinion of immoderate length and probably would not be of any great service. We must be content to give the conclusion at which we have arrived, together with the reasons which seem to us controlling, in as short a space as it reasonably may be done.

I. Coming to a discussion of the first question, it may be assumed that a corporation, by the common law, had power to take property by devise. Sherwood v. American Bible Society, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 281; 1 Kyd, Corp. 74-78; Grant, Corp. 98.

Our Revised Statutes provided that every corporation as such has power, among other things (§ 1, subd. 4), to hold, purchase and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation shall require, not exceeding the amount limited in its charter. By section 2 of the same title of the statutes the powers enumerated in section 1 "Shall vest in every corporation that shall hereafter be created, although they may not be specified in its charter or in the Act under which it shall be incorporated."

Section 8 provides that "In addition to the powers enumerated in the first section, and to those expressly given in its charter or in the Act under which it is or shall be incorporated, no corporation shall possess or exercise any corporate powers, except such as shall be necessary to the exercise of the powers so enumerated and given. 1 Rev. Stat. 599-600, §§ 1, 2, 8.

Under this power to hold, purchase and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation may require, not exceeding the amount limited in its charter, the corporation could take property by devise, for the word "purchase" includes all means of acquiring property not coming to one by descent or the mere act or operation of the law. The same Revised Statutes, however, in providing for the transmission of real property by will, stated that "Every estate and interest in real property descendible to heirs" might be devised. "Such devise may be made to every person capable by law of holding real estate; but no devise to a corporation shall be valid unless such corporation be expressly authorized by its charter or by statute to take by devise." 2 Rev. Stat. 57, §§ 1, 2, 8.

There are other provisions in the Revised Statutes relating to corporations incorporated for purposes of education. It is enacted therein that "The trustees of every college to which a charter shall be granted by the State shall be a corporation." Section 81.

"Sec. 86. The trustees of every such college, besides the general powers and privileges of a corporation, shall have power . . .

"4. To take and hold, by gift, grant or devise, any real or personal property, the yearly income or revenue of which shall not exceed the value of $25,000." 1 Rev. Stat. 460, §§ 81-87.

At the adoption of the Revised Statutes, therefore, the law in this State was that a corporation could hold, purchase and convey such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation should require, not exceeding the amount limited in its charter; but it could not take any real property by devise unless it was expressly authorized by its charter, or by statute, to take by devise. And there was power in the trustees of a college to which a charter was granted by the State to take and hold real or personal property by gift or devise provided the income did not exceed $25,000 annually.

Some time subsequent to the adoption of these statutes, and in the years 1840 and 1841 (chaps. 318 of 1840 and 261 of 1841), the Legislature passed Acts (the latter being an amendment of the earlier one) by which trusts were authorized to be created by grants, devises and bequests of property to incorporated colleges or other literary incorporated institutions in the State to be held in trust for specific purposes comprehended in the general objects authorized by their charters. The Acts contained no limitation as to the amount or value of property which could be thus taken in trust by the corporation.

It was held, however, by this court in Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 48 N. Y. 424, that these Acts did not repeal or affect the general law of the State limiting and restricting the amount and value of property which could be taken and held by literary and educational corporations; and it was therein said that the general laws of the State are in harmony with its policy, which has been uniform and consistent, so far as such policy is indicated by legislation in relation to gifts in mortmain and the powers of corporations to take and hold property. It was further said that these statutes (those of 1840-41) authorized the creation of special trusts, in furtherance of the objects of the corporations named, but that such trusts could be created and full effect given to the Acts within the limits imposed by the general laws upon the power of the corporations to acquire and hold property. There being no express repeal of the general provisions of law or repudiation of the uniform policy of the State, the intent of the Legislature to do either, it was said, could not be implied.

Thus the several provisions of law relating to the property of corporations stood at the time of the granting of its charter to Cornell University by the State in 1865. By chapter 585 of the laws of that year, the Legislature incorporated and established the Cornell University. In the first section of the Act the following language is to be found: "The corporation hereby created shall have the rights and privileges necessary to the object of its creation as declared in this Act, and in the performance of its duties shall be subject to the provisions and may exercise the powers enumerated and set forth in the second article of the fifteenth chapter, title 1, of the Revised Statutes of the State of New York."

The second article, above alluded to, is entitled "Of the Powers and Duties of the Trustees of Colleges," and is to be found already referred to (supra) as 1 Revised Statutes (460, §§ 81-87). It is subdivision 4 of section 86, which authorizes the trustees to take and hold real or personal property by gift or devise not exceeding the value therein stated.

Section 5 of the charter reads as follows:

"Sec. 5. The corporation hereby created may hold real and personal property not exceeding $3,000,000 in the aggregate."

These provisions in the charter, together with the statutes above alluded to, must be examined for the purpose of discovering, if possible, what was the legislative intent towards this corporation regarding property.

The learned counsel for the appellant claims, at the threshold, that the provisions of the Revised Statutes as to the incorporation of colleges (supra), with a single exception, were merely intended to apply to institutions of learning incorporated by the regents of the university of the State under the general laws of the State. He argues that the regents had power to incorporate a college by virtue of the provisions of the Act (chapter 82) of 1787, the provisions of which were re-enacted in 1813 and incorporated subsequently into the Revised Statutes, and at that time, and for many years thereafter, there was no other way of incorporating a college unless by a special Act of the Legislature; hence, he says these provisions of law, general in their nature, applied to corporations which were incorporated by the regents, and were never supposed to apply to corporations incorporated by special Act, unless expressly made applicable in the special Act.

The counsel is right in his statement as to the fact when the Act was passed. At that time there was no general law for the incorporation of colleges or other institutions of learning, other than by the regents; and when they granted a charter there can be no doubt that its provisions were affected by the Act as contained in the Revised Statutes. But the language therein used (§ 81), that the trustees of every college to which a charter shall be granted by the State shall be a corporation, is general in its nature, and it would seem to include all cases embraced within its language. That it is superfluous to apply it to the case of a corporation which becomes such by virtue of the very Act which incorporates it, is not a conclusive answer. It is an argument from the point of view that it was unnecessary; but because it was unnecessary is not always, perhaps even generally, an argument against the applicability of a statute to a certain condition of things. It is alike unnecessary with regard to colleges or academies which were incorporated by the regents under the power granted them in the Acts of 1787 and 1813, both of which Acts expressly granted them power to incorporate colleges and academies by giving them a charter. When they did so the college or academy became a corporation by virtue of those Acts which empowered the regents to incorporate it. The section (81) was, therefore, unnecessary in both cases; and yet it was adopted, and in its language it embraces all colleges to which a charter is granted by the State.

The thirty-sixth section provides that the trustees of every such college shall have power, among other things (subdivision 4), "to take and hold . . . any real and personal . . . property, the yearly income," etc.

I think it plain, therefore, that the provisions contained in that title would be applicable to the Cornell University, although specially chartered by the State, unless inconsistent provisions were to be found therein. The charter, however, in so many words, makes this title applicable to the university. (See section 1 of the charter, part of the language of which is quoted supra.)

It is true that it states, the corporation, in the performance of its duties, shall be subject to the provisions and may exercise the powers enumerated in the title mentioned, among which is the right to take and hold real and personal property. But the title itself is headed, "Of the Powers and Duties of the Trustees of Colleges;" and among those powers and duties is the right above mentioned. I do not think that the use of the words, "in the performance of its duties," would in any wise exclude the application of this fourth subdivision of section 86, and we must look elsewhere for such exclusion if it is to be excluded. That it is to be excluded all admit; but the exclusion is founded upon a special provision in the charter itself which is wholly inconsistent with its continued applicability. The subdivision confines the taking and holding, by gift, etc., of real or personal property to a yearly income not exceeding in value $25,000, while the charter permits it to hold real and personal property to an amount not exceeding $3,000,000 in the aggregate.

Both sides admit that this subdivision in question is not applicable—the respondents, because an inconsistent provision in the charter expunges it; while the appellant claims that even if there were no inconsistent provision in the charter, it would still be inapplicable because the statute only applies to corporations incorporated by the regents. The provisions of the charter are inconsistent, and still we must look at all the other statutes above cited for the purpose of discovering what the legislative intent is. Looking at the General Statutes we find corporations have power to purchase and hold property necessary for the purposes of their incorporation, not exceeding the amount limited in their charter, but they cannot take by devise unless expressly authorized by their charter or by statute so to take.

Then the Revised Statutes prohibit corporations from possessing or exercising any corporate powers, except such as are enumerated or are expressly given to them by their charters, or such as shall be necessary to the exercise of the powers so enumerated and given. The statutes also allow the trustees of a college to take property by gift or devise not exceeding a certain annual income; and then come the Acts of 1840–41, and then the charter of this university. The argument of the learned counsel for the appellant is, as I have said, based upon the theory of the utter inapplicability of the Act of the Revised Statutes as to colleges; and then he claims that the Acts of 1840 and 1841 bestow a capacity to take property by will not exceeding the amount limited in the charter of the corporation; and he claims, also, that in this case there is no limitation of the power in the charter of the university to take real or personal property to any amount, and the only limitation there is consists of a limitation upon the power of holding more than $3,000,000 in the aggregate. It thus obtains the power to take an unlimited amount of property by virtue of one Act, and a limitation is only placed upon its power to hold by another Act, and that is the organic Act of incorporation itself.

I do not think such an interpretation of the statutes can be sustained. I think the fifth section of the charter gives the measure of the power of the university to take as well as to hold property. The language is an authority as well as a limitation. It is an authority to hold more than the Revised Statutes permitted, but it shall not be permitted to hold more than a certain specified amount. And if there were nothing said on the subject of property in the charter, I think the Revised Statutes as to the limitation for colleges would apply.

Reading the language in the charter, it is difficult to imagine a holding without a previous taking of property; and the counsel for the appellant admits that if there were no other statute providing for a taking of property, the language of the fifth section of the charter would necessarily imply a right to take in order to hold. I do not think that his claim to derive an unlimited capacity to take by virtue of the Laws of 1840 and 1841, when construed with the other statutes and with the provisions in the charter, can be upheld as a fair exposition of the legislative intent upon the subject. The Statutes of 1840 and 1841 were passed for the purpose of authorizing the creation of certain special trusts in connection with these educational institutions, which could not have been legally created prior to their passage, and their object did not in the least infringe upon the general laws of the State or its policy. As has been said, their passage did not repeal those general laws limiting the amount or value of property which corporations might take and hold.

Because a special statute contained provisions upon the subject of the property of the corporation thereby incorporated, which were inconsistent with the general provisions contained in the Revised Statutes relating to the same subject, I do not think the effect was not only to render the general law inapplicable, but also to twist the provisions of the Law of 1841 in relation to the special trusts spoken of into a permission outside of and beyond the language of the charter to take property without any limitation as to amount or value. That might have been the effect if the charter had repealed those general provisions as to this corporation, and had made no other provisions regarding it. Under such circumstances, the Act of 1841 could have been referred to as permitting the corporation to take property by devise and in trust to an extent unlimited; but when the same language which renders the general law inapplicable also gives a power to hold property to a certain limited extent, it seems to me that such a power includes the power to take up to that sum, and limits it accordingly.

It is said that if the power to take an unlimited amount of property and to hold but a certain sum were contained in the same law, there could be no doubt upon the question of the power to take. That may be so, for in that case the legislative will would have been announced in terms which could not be misunderstood. But there is a great difference between the two cases. The question is always one of legislative intent; and the inquiry is whether the Statute of 1841, providing for the creation of trusts, really applies in this instance to this university, so far as an unlimited capacity to take property is concerned. For the reasons already stated, I think it does not.

Looking for a moment outside of and beyond the statute laws of the State, and in order to strengthen his position regarding the true construction to be given that law as to the material distinction, in the case at least of a corporation between the power to take and the power to hold property, the counsel for the appellant has made a most able and learned argument. Its outlines are, in substance, as follows: a corporation at common law could take and hold property by devise. At an early stage in the history of the Law of England, relating to the power of corporations to hold real property, and while the feudal system still prevailed, it was enacted that no man should alienate his feud to a corporation under penalty of a forfeiture thereof to his next superior, of whom he held the land; and in default of such superior insisting upon the forfeiture, then his superior might do so, and thus on until the King, as the general superior and lord of all, was reached. But in case the forfeiture was not insisted upon, the corporation, which had taken a defeasible title to the land, could hold it as against all the world.

He therefore insists that this distinction between taking and holding strengthens his claim that the use of the word "hold" in the charter was intentional and for the specific purpose of permitting the corporation to take an unlimited amount of property and to hold only the amount specified. No sound reason for giving such unlimited power to take, while limiting the power to hold, can, as it seems to me, be stated. And if such were the intent, I think it would have been plainly stated in the charter instead of trusting to such a conjectural application to be given to another statute.

The counsel cites about all the writers upon the subject of corporations, and they have all adverted to this distinction, as existing in relation to the English corporations subject to the Mortmain Statutes; and they state that licenses to hold in mortmain were granted to such bodies, but without such licenses they took the title to the real property aliened, subject only to the right of the superior lord to enter and take the land under the power of forfeiture.

The only penalty, therefore, which a corporation risked when it took lands without a license in mortmain was that of a forfeiture of the land to the next superior of the grantor, and so on up to the King; and the counsel claims that in this State, in the case of a corporation with unlimited power to take, but not to hold more than a certain amount, the penalty for holding more is that the State, representing the whole people and standing in this respect in lieu of the King (there being no meane lords), can forfeit the charter of the corporation and thus prevent the further holding. And assuming this to be the fact, he uses it as strengthening his argument as to the existence of this clear and material distinction between taking and holding property.

The further claim is then made that, as title to the property has vested in the corporation, which, in holding it, has become subject to the forfeiture of its charter, the heirs or next of kin of the testator have no more right to raise the question than any other third parties who have no interest therein. It is said that it is a matter for the State alone to take cognizance of, and until it does, the corporation holds the property, however much it may transcend the limitation prescribed in its charter.

The counsel states accurately the Law of Mortmain in England and its consequences of possible forfeiture of the estate granted, and until forfeiture, the vesting of the title in the corporation indefeasible, except by the re-entry of the person entitled to take it by reason of the forfeiture. But the circumstances under which lands are held by citizens of New York, where their tenure is so wholly different from that which prevailed in England when the early Mortmain Acts were enacted, render any argument in regard to those Acts and their effect totally inapplicable to the case of a corporation of this State.

Taking the law as it exists in our statutes, including the special provision upon the subject in the charter of the university, it seems to me that the provision therein, limiting the holding of property, is, as I have said, a restriction also upon the power to take in excess of the specified amount. As, at common law, a corporation could take real property in the same way as an individual, the consequence was that, in England, large landed possessions were held by religious corporations, and by reason of alienations of real estate to them, the services due by the vassal to the lord were partially, if not totally, paralyzed, and the chief lords lost their escheats. This was a constantly growing and alarming evil. To remedy the difficulty, the first Mortmain Act was placed in Magna Charta, which declared all such alienations to corporations entirely void, and that the lands should revert to the lord of the fee. It was held, however, that the reversion must be accomplished by an entry, and then and from that time there was a forfeiture, the corporation having taken the title and held the property until such forfeiture by re-entry. Shelford, Mortmain, 8, 84; 1 Kyd, Corp. 81; Grant, Corp. 106.

Other statutes upon the subject were subsequently enacted, all for the purpose of preventing the great accumulation of real property in the hands of corporations; and they all provided substantially for a re-entry on the part of the next superior lord whenever lands had been aliened in mortmain, and, until such entry enforcing the forfeiture, the corporation held the lands. There was one law, directed against superstitious uses (38 Henry VIII., chap. 10), which provided that the grant to such uses for more than twenty years was absolutely void, and the estates thus aliened would have gone to the grantor or his heirs, excepting for a provision, subsequently made, giving such estates to the King. Wilmot's Opinions, 9, 10, in Atty-Gen. v. Bouvier, variously reported: Amb. 550, 571; 1 Dick. 414; 3 Ves. Jr. 714; 5 Ves. Jr. 300; 8 Ves. Jr. 256.

The Mortmain Statute (9 Geo. II, chap. 36) renders all devises to charitable uses void. Shelford, Mortmain, 118-120.

The nature of the tenure of real property at the time of the passage of the early Mortmain Acts in England bears no resemblance to the tenure by which a citizen of this State holds lands. Here there is no vassal and superior, but the title is absolute in the owner, and subject only to the liability to escheat. N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 18. The escheat takes place when the title to lands falls through defect of heirs. N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 11.

A devise to a corporation which is forbidden to take (or forbidden to hold, if the word, under the circumstances of the case, is construed to include a taking also), does not, therefore, give a title subject to the right of some superior to claim a forfeiture of the land; but if it be in violation of a statute, I think the devise is void, and the land descends to the heir or residuary devisee.

We have not in this State re-enacted the Statutes of Mortmain or generally assumed them to be in force; and the only legal check to the acquisition of lands by corporations consists in those special restrictions contained in the Acts by which they are incorporated, and which usually confine the capacity to purchase real estate to specified and necessary objects. 2 Kent, Com. 282.

Of course the restrictions contained in any general law, if applicable, must also be referred to.

There is, by reference to our laws, no such necessary and universal distinction between taking and holding property by corporations, as is seen in the Laws of England relating to alienations in mortmain. Whether the Legislature, when using language providing for a limitation upon holding property, meant to permit an unlimited taking, is a question of legislative intent; and I think the general inference would be, in the absence of some plain and controlling circumstance to the contrary, that the legislative body meant to limit a taking as well as a holding beyond the specified amount.

As is said in the Chamberlain Case, this is in accordance with the policy of the State, a policy which has been recognized as existing for many years, and which the courts have concurred in approving and carrying out. I do not think the statute (Laws 1779, chap. 26, § 13) touches this case. It provides that the absolute property of the lands, etc., and all rents, franchises, debts, dues, duties and services, escheats and forfeitures, which before the 9th of July, 1776, vested in or belonged or were due to the Crown of Great Britain, were and forever after the 9th day of July, 1776, shall be vested in the people of the State, in whom the sovereignty and seignory thereof are and were united and vested.

The counsel for the appellant does not claim that this property was itself forfeited to the State, if the State should choose to enforce the forfeiture. His claim is, as I understand it, that if the university exceeded its limitation by holding more property than it was allowed by law to hold, a cause of forfeiture of the charter was thereby created, and that in enforcing such forfeiture, after the payment of the debts of the corporation, the rest of the property would (as he insists) probably go to the State, because there would be no living claimant to it who would have any right to acquire it. A forfeiture of the State may claim and may enforce at pleasure, when the occasion arises; but it is a forfeiture of the charter and not a forfeiture of the property held by the corporation.

It is further claimed that this distinction between the right to take and the power to hold property is one which has been admitted and enforced in the Courts of England, of this State and of the other States of the Union for a long number of years; and that there is no reason why effect to such a distinction should not be given in this case, the result being, as is stated, that the corporation has an unlimited right to take property, and also an unlimited right to hold it as against anyone but the State in its capacity of Sovereign.

There is undoubtedly a distinction between the right to take and the power to hold property under some circumstances, the only question being whether the Legislature had such distinction in mind and meant to provide for it in the case in hand. It is said that an alien has the right to take property by purchase, but he cannot hold it as against the State. That is so. He takes, however, a defeasible title, good as to all but the sovereign power, which must take it upon office found or by escheat. Wright v. Sadtler, 20 N. Y. 320.

In such case it is not exactly an accurate description of the alien's title to simply say that he can take but cannot hold. That is a contradiction in terms. If he take, he must hold, if for but a fractional part of a second of time. The expression is but a short one for the statement that he cannot hold, as against the claim of the State, where properly made and enforced. The same expression is used in the case of a corporation under the Mortmain Laws, that it can take but not hold, the meaning being that it cannot hold as against the claim for forfeiture when made by the next superior lord of the grantor of the lands. That the words lose all their meaning when wrenched from the circumstances under which they were used, and applied to corporations existing by virtue of the laws of this State, seems to me a plain proposition.

The counsel has, however, with great industry and research, cited a number of cases from our own courts and those in other States, where this distinction, he claims, has been admitted, and in cases, too, where the principles involved were similar to the case at bar (one or two being, he says, precisely like it), and where it has been held that in such cases, although the corporation has violated the law of its being, yet no one but the State could take advantage thereof.

I think that, with the exception of one case, they were all entirely different from this one, and the decisions were based upon a totally different and perfectly unassailable ground.

The principal case, or at least one of the early ones, is that of Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 318, which arose in Pennsylvania and was decided in 1821. The restriction in the Charter of the Bank of North America was that the bank should not purchase and hold property excepting under circumstances therein stated. The directors of the bank accepted from their grantor, William Henry, a conveyance of his land (not within their specified powers) at a fair price, in payment of a debt, bona fide, due. The question was whether the corporation could hold and convey a title. Tilghman, Ch. J., said: "The restriction is that the bank shall not purchase and hold. Purchasing and holding are very different things, and the consequences of each are very different. To purchase and hold might have been thought dangerous, but to purchase, subject to the Statutes of Mortmain, which authorized the State to appropriate the land to its own use, could be attended with no danger."

The court there held that some portions of the Mortmain Laws of England were in force in Pennsylvania, to the extent of permitting the State, as the sovereign lord, there being no mesne lords, to enter and claim the forfeiture, and that until the State did so the title of the corporation was good, and it could convey such a title to its grantees. No such laws have been in force in this State.

Under the modern acceptance of the law regarding corporations, this case could probably be supported on an entirely different ground, viz.: that it was an executed contract or conveyance, upon a good consideration, and that the grantor could not be heard to dispute his own grant under the circumstances; and that no one could take advantage of this violation of its charter by the corporation excepting the State, which could proceed to forfeit the charter because thereof. The case is no authority in this State for the proposition that none but the State can interfere; nor is it of any importance upon the question as to how material it is to note the absence of an express limitation in words upon the power to take property under the charter of the university.

Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R. 411, is a somewhat similar case, and decided also upon the authority of Leazure v. Hillegas, supra. Gouldie v. Northampton Water Company, 7 Pa. 233, decided in 1847, refers to the Leazure Case. It was also a case where the contract was on a good consideration, and the company had the right to contract for the land and pay for it, and a deed for value would vest in it a good title, subject to the right of the State to interfere, etc.

The case of Runyan v. Ooster, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 122 [10 L. ed. 382], decided in 1840, upon appeal from the Circuit Court in Pennsylvania, was decided with express reference to the statute of that State, passed April 6, 1833, relative to escheats, which permitted the corporation to retain the title, subject to be divested at any time by the Commonwealth. The decision was put upon the ground of the Act of 1833 and the doctrine of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the Leazure Case. These are the cases cited from the Pennsylvania Courts; and it is plain they furnish no support for the contention in this case, in the absence of those Laws of Mortmain upon which they were founded.

There is one case, however, which has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question of who may take advantage of a violation of the charter in relation to the power to hold property, which comes very near the case at bar. The decision of that court goes quite a distance towards sustaining the contention of the appellant's counsel, although there was another ground upon which the decision could rest. The very great respect which we all feel for any decision of the federal court of last resort, and for any opinion given by its learned and able judges, even in cases where it is not binding upon us, renders it necessary to examine the case with some care. The case is Jones v. Habersham, 107 U. S. 174 [27 L. ed. 401]. The head note is: "Restrictions imposed by the charter of a corporation upon the amount of property it may hold cannot be taken advantage of collaterally by private persons, but only in a direct proceeding by the State."

The testatrix, a resident of the State of Georgia at the time of her death, devised and bequeathed to the Georgia Historical Society certain land for the purposes of maintaining a historical society, etc. The corporation was incorporated in 1839, and had power to purchase, take, hold, etc., lands and tenements, provided the clear annual income of such real and personal estate should not exceed the sum of $5,000. It was admitted that the net income of the corporation from property held by it at the time of the death of the testatrix was between $3,000 and $4,000, and that the income of the property bequeathed to it by her will would add $7,000 to that income. The appellants, who were the heirs at law and next of kin of the testatrix, claimed that the gift was void in toto, as it gave more than the corporation was allowed to take or hold. The court, per Gray, J., stated the answer to such proposition in the language of the head note above quoted, and, without argument, referred in support of such doctrine to five cases viz.: Runyan v. Coster, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 122, 131 [10 L. ed. 382]; Smith v. Sheeley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 358, 361 [20 L. ed. 430, 431]; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 633, 758; DeCamp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 36; Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 131 Mass. 258, 278.

Upon looking at those cases I have been unable to find that they decide the principle they are cited to sustain. It seems to me that the question was not really and fully presented, discussed or decided in any of them.

The first case, Runyan v. Coster, supra, has already been cited and sufficiently discussed. It was decided upon the express Statute of Pennsylvania, and can be no authority for the general doctrine stated by Mr. Justice Gray in his opinion.

The next case is Smith v. Sheeley, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 358-361 [20 L. ed. 430, 431]. The bank in that case had been incorporated by an Act of a Territorial Legislature, where a law of Congress was in force providing that no Act of such a Legislature, incorporating a bank, should have any force until approved by Congress. The bank had power, under the Territorial Act, "to buy and possess property of every kind." Land was sold to it for a money consideration paid by it. Mr. Justice Davis, in his opinion, said:

"It is insisted, however, as an additional ground of objection to this deed, that the bank was not a competent grantee to receive title. . . . It could not legally exercise its powers until the approval of Congress was obtained; but this defect in its constitution cannot be taken advantage of collaterally. . . . Conceding the bank to be guilty of usurpation, it was still a body corporate de facto exercising at least one of the functions which the Legislature attempted to confer upon it; and in such a case the party who makes a sale of real estate to it is not in a position to question its capacity to take the title after it has paid the consideration for the purchase."

This, as it seems to me, is also very far from authority for the proposition for which it is cited. The grantor dealt with it as a corporation, received its money, and should not be heard to deny or question its existence.

The next case cited by the learned Judge is Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. 633, vice-chancellor's opinion, 720-758, as to the point in question. It was provided that the church could not hold more than an income of £500. The fact was that when the grant in question was made it did not hold, with the grant, nearly as much as it was allowed. Then the vice-chancellor said, if it did, it was a question between the corporation and the sovereign power in which individuals have no concern, and of which they cannot avail themselves in any mode against the corporation. This was mere obiter. The question was not involved nor decided. It was not a case of a devise to a corporation holding at the time of the devise more property than the law permitted, and where the question was whether such devise was good, and, if bad, whether the property (not devised by a valid devise) passed to the heirs.

The defense of the defendant was, among others, adverse possession, and that defense prevailed. The case referred to by the vice-chancellor (Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. 587, 604, 629) did not decide the question either. The ground of the decision was that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Cowen, J., says (p. 605): Admit that the law will cast no title on the corporation, the answer, in the words of the statute, is equally fatal. You have been out of possession for more than twenty years, and are thus disqualified to maintain an action to recover your land against me or any other." It was a decision upon a question of adverse possession.

Senator Furman (page 629) in his opinion, assumes from the evidence that the real estate, when received, counting all defendant ever had, did not amount to the limitation of £500. He adds, in giving another view of the case, that the "Restriction is a mere question of governmental policy, and individuals as such have nothing to do with it, and no control over it. That it is only voidable at the instance of the supreme power." He cited no authorities and the question was not before him.

The case is only authority for the proposition that a corporation can insist upon a title to property by adverse possession which, when proved, is as potent to close the mouth of a claimant to the property in the case of a corporation as in that of an individual. To same effect, Harpending v. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 455 [10 L. ed. 1020]; Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige, 175.

Then comes the case of DeCamp v. Dobbins, 29 N. J. Eq. 36, which was a devise to a charitable corporation claimed to have been restricted to a holding of property to the amount of $2,000 annual value. The chancellor found that by a later statute the restriction did not exist. He then gave a dictum that if a corporation takes land by grant or devise, in trust or otherwise, which by its charter it cannot hold, its title is good as against third persons and strangers; the State alone can interfere.

This dictum is opposed by another distinguished judge of New Jersey (Chief Justice Beasley), who, on appeal to the court of errors and appeals in the same case, took occasion, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, while affirming the judgment below, to dissent from any such view of the law. I shall have occasion to refer to the case again. De Camp v. Dobbins (on appeal), 31 N. J. Eq. 671, 690. The New Jersey Case cannot, therefore, be regarded as the least authority for the main proposition under discussion.

The last case cited by the learned Justice is that of Davis v. Old Colony Railroad Company, 181 Mass. 258-273. The case decides that a railroad company had no power to guaranty the payment of the expenses of a musical festival, although it was expected that profits would result to the railroad company therefrom.

Incidentally, and as part of the general argument, the court, in the opinion, at page 278, mentions the doctrine contained in the Leazure Case, supra, and in Old Colony R. Company v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25. Neither case decides the question, and it was not involved in either.

This completes the examination of the cases cited in the opinion in Jones v. Habersham; and I think that it cannot be said that they really furnish any very secure foundation for the doctrine contained in that case; and I think the doctrine is opposed to the principle of the Chamberlain Case, supra, decided by this court. The other cases cited in the printed argument of the counsel for the appellant are mostly cases where a corporation has contracted with parties on a valid consideration, and where a conveyance has been made and then it is sought to raise the question as to the power of the corporation to take or convey a title; and it has been held that in such cases of an executed contract, if the corporation has violated the statute, the parties seeking to set up such violation would not be heard, and in such case none but the State would be. That one who contracts with a corporation shall not, under such circumstances, be heard to raise the question, is, in substance, the principle decided.

Such are the cases, in substance and principle, of Onwell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55 [25 L. ed. 547]; Hough v. Cook County Land Co. 73 Ill. 23; Alexander v. Tolleston Club, 110 Ill. 65; Barnes v. Suddard, 4 West. Rep. 184, 117 Ill. 237; Cal. State Teleg. Co. v. Alta Teleg. Co. 22 Cal. 898; Natoma Water & Min. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544; Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 212; Baker v. Neff, 78 Ind. 68; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Lewis, 53 Iowa, 101; Land v. Coffman, 50 Mo. 243; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 576; Barrow v. Nashville & C. Turp. Co. 9 Humph. 304; Baker v. Northwestern Guaranty Loan Co. 86 Minn. 185; Mo. Valley Land Co. v. Bushnell, 11 Neb. 192.

I have examined all of these cases, and while the facts are, of course, not precisely similar, yet in not one of them does the fact exist of a devise of property to a corporation, which it cannot hold because the limitation has been reached provided for by statute; and, of course, no doctrine that in such a case the heirs cannot claim the property is advanced. In most of them the court looks upon the question as one of a forfeiture of the charter on account of a violation of some limitation therein contained; and in such case, it is said, none but the Sovereign can raise such question.

The case of Hayward v. Davidson, 41 Ind. 212, was that of a devise of real estate to county commissioners for the use of the county. The court held that the county was authorized to acquire and hold title to real property for some purposes, and it could not be made a question by anyone except the State whether or not real estate acquired by such county has been thus acquired for authorized purposes or not. That the title passed under the power of the county to take real estate for some purposes; but the court also said if the charter or the law has forbidden a corporation to take, then a deed or devise passes no title.

In the case at bar, where the statute authorizes the corporation to hold not exceeding a limited amount, is it not the same thing in substance as a prohibition against holding and, therefore, a prohibition against taking, any more? And when the limit is reached, is it not the same as an original prohibition against taking any?

In Chambers v. St. Louis, supra, the court held also that there was a right in the city to take and hold lands; and if there were a capacity in the vendor to convey, so soon as there was a conveyance there was a complete sale; and if the corporation in purchasing violates or abuses the power to do so, that is no concern of the vendor or his heirs. It is a matter between the State and the city. This case rests upon the same principle above alluded to.

In the case of Vidal v. Girard, 48 U. S. 2 How. 127 [11 L. ed. 205], the trusts created by the will of Stephen Girard were held valid, and the court said that in such a case, if the corporation were incompetent to execute them, the heirs could not take advantage of such fact, as that could only be done by the State by quo warranto or other judicial proceeding. This is upon the ground that the trust was a valid trust, and if so, and the corporation as such had no power to execute it, the trust did not for that reason fail; but upon the failure of the corporation for lack of power to execute it, a court of equity would appoint a new trustee. Of course the heirs had no interest in the question when once the trust was declared valid, whether the corporation was exceeding its power in taking upon itself the execution of the trust or not. They had no title to or any further interest in the property. They stood, therefore, in respect to the corporation, as any other strangers. The case does not aid the appellant upon the matter under review.

I have not yet referred to all the cases cited by the indefatigable counsel for the appellants, but I have read them all, and in not one is the question fairly up and decided in the way he asks the court to decide this case.

The cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, known as the National Bank Mortgaging Cases, are cited to sustain the view of counsel. Genesee Nat. Bank v. Whitney, 103 U. S. 99 [26 L. ed. 448]; Fortier v. New Orleans Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 439 [28 L. ed. 764].

They were cases where the bank took a mortgage from a party to secure future advances (against the Act of Congress), which advances it subsequently made, and for the nonpayment of which it attempted to foreclose the mortgage, when the mortgagor set up the violation of the Act. The court held that the Act did not make the security void, and that the government meant that the only penalty should be the right of the government to proceed against the bank for a judgment of ouster and dissolution. Certainly the party who had contracted with the bank, and had obtained its money on the faith of the security, had no equity in his claim. It is not, however, in the least analogous to the subject under discussion. Yet even in that case this court held that the mortgage was void because taken in violation of the National Banking Act (Crocker v. Whitney, 71 N. Y. 161); and it was stated as the undoubted law of this State that a contract made in violation of a statute is void, and it is immaterial that it is not so declared in the statute itself, and that a security taken in violation of a statute is void.

As the case involved the construction of an Act of Congress, an appeal was taken to the federal supreme court, where the judgment was reversed and the penalty for a violation of the Act was held to consist in the right of the government to proceed against the bank for a forfeiture of its charter, and the security was held valid.

The counsel refers to the general doctrine of ultra vires in respect to corporations, and shows that, as matter of fact, corporations have power to violate the law of their existence, or, in other words, to do wrong; and he cites Bissell v. Michigan Southern R. Co. 23 N. Y. 259; Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 63; Atlantic State Bank v. Soverly, 82 N. Y. 292; Bider Life Raft Co. v. Roach, 97 N. Y. 878.

The theory upon which the plea of ultra vires is examined is that it will not, as a general rule, prevail, whether interposed for or against a corporation, when it will not advance justice, but will accomplish a legal wrong. See above cases.

I do not perceive that any assistance accrues to the appellant from a presentation of this doctrine. There is no question between these parties of a contract nature, nor any fact which ought to preclude the respondents from setting up any legal bar to the right of the corporation to take title to property which they claim either as heirs at law or as legatees or devisees.

The cases of Re N. Y. Elevated Railroad Company, 70 N. Y. 337, 338, and Moore v. Brooklyn City Railroad Company, 10 Cent. Rep. 497, 108 N. Y. 98, 104, 18 N. Y. State Rep. 97, are cited to show that none but the Sovereign can take advantage of a forfeiture of the charter, and that must be in a direct proceeding against the corporation. The principle is undenied. But in a case like this it is no forfeiture that is being insisted upon. It is simply a question of title to the property; and, provided it has not been legally devised or bequeathed, it necessarily vests in the heir or next of kin.

But it is said that where property is given to a corporation which has power to take or hold under some circumstances, the title vests in the corporation, for otherwise the State would never obtain the right to forfeit even the charter for a violation thereof. The argument is, the corporation would answer a claim to forfeit the charter by the fact that the charter precluded it from taking such property, and, therefore, as it could not, it had not done so. I do not see the force of the argument. The charter may preclude the rightful taking of the property by the corporation, and may prevent the legal title from vesting in it; but that has nothing to do with the fact that nevertheless the corporation has, as a physical act, taken the property and may be insisting upon its right to keep it as matter of law. In such case can there be any doubt that the corporation has taken and is holding the property as its own and in defiance of the charter, and that it may be punished by having its charter forfeited, although the rightful owner of the property may thereafter obtain his own? The fact that he does obtain it is no answer to the other fact that the corporation had taken it, nor is it any legal answer to the claim of forfeiture of the charter on the part of the State that it was unsuccessful in continuing to hold the property against the charter provisions.

Although we never adopted or enacted the English Statutes of Mortmain, yet in this as in other States we have a decided mortmain policy. It is found in our statute in relation to wills, prohibiting a devise to a corporation unless specially permitted by its charter or by some statute to take property by devise.

"It is a Statute of Mortmain, resting on a mortmain policy as distinctly as any Act of the British Parliament. . . . The necessity is recognized of forbidding the acquisition by will, unless the Legislature, in granting the charter, and in full view of the reasons for so doing, think proper to confer the power in express terms. . . . Nor is this necessity by any means a fanciful one. It is eminently praiseworthy to give in the interest of charity and religion. But in the last hours of life exaggerated impressions of charitable or religious duty often obscure the judgment of men and subject them to undue influence and persuasion. Against these the statute is intended to guard, because it is in behalf of associations incorporated for pious and benevolent purposes that the sentiments of men in such situations are most generally appealed to. The enactment is, therefore, prohibitory, and it ought to be expounded and applied in that sense." Per Comstock, Ch. J., in Downing v. Marshall, 28 N. Y. 366, 367.

"Judges have given the widest possible scope to statutes in restraint of the disposal of property in mortmain, and have been astute in their arguments for the application of such statutes to cases as they arose." Per Gibson, Ch. J., Hillyard v. Miller, 10 Pa. 326.

The courts ought not to impute an intent to the Legislature not clearly expressed, in direct hostility to the traditions and policy of the past. . . . Claiming property and seeking the aid of the courts to reach it, the corporation can rely only on the warrant and authority conferred by law, and cannot claim in transgression or excess of that authority. . . . Doubtless, the restriction upon corporations is a governmental regulation, and one of policy, and to be enforced by the government; but an individual whose interests will be affected by a transgression of the rule may assert and insist upon the limitation as a restriction upon the power of the corporation to take." Per Allen, J., in Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 48 N. Y. 424-430.

Under our General Statutes upon the subject of the right to take or hold property by corporations, and reading them in connection with the provisions of the charter of the university, we should be astute in our arguments against the application of the Mortmain Statutes instead of in favor of them, if we should decide that the language of the charter did not apply as well to a taking as to a holding of property beyond the expressed limit.

There can be no doubt that it is the law, in this State at least, that if there be a prohibition against the taking of property beyond a certain amount or value, a devise or bequest to a corporation of property which will exceed the amount or value which the corporation is permitted to take, will be void for the excess. This is expressly decided in the Chamberlain Case, and we think it was rightly decided. Nor is there any doubt that in such a case the heirs or next of kin can raise the question. This was also decided in the same case. See also White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144.

When we come to the conclusion, therefore, that this university is by law precluded (or was precluded at the time of the death of Mrs. Fiske) from taking more than the amount of property limited in its charter, we bring the case precisely within the rules laid down in the cases just cited.

The language of Chief Justice Beasley, in the case of De Camp v. Dobbins, 81 N. J. Eq. 690, is very appropriate here. He says: "Nor can I assent to the other proposition that if, as the contention assumes, this bequest is violative of the law if carried into effect, none but the State can intervene. I find no warrant for such a doctrine, either in the legal principles belonging to the subject or in the adjudications. There can be no doubt that there are cases in which, when a corporation has acquired rights of property to an extent or in a manner unwarranted by its charter, no one but the public can have the right to complain. A grantor making title to a corporation might be estopped from questioning the effect of his own conveyance. So a mere stranger could not question such a corporate title. But I have not observed any decision that asserts, when a title is created by devise which vests in a corporation, for its own use, a larger quantity of property than the laws authorize, that the heir at law has no right to make objection. The authorities referred to do not lend countenance to such a doctrine."

The learned Judge refers to the cases of Bogardus v. Trinity Church and Leasure v. Hilligas (both cited supra), and continues: "These cases rest on the obvious principle that the capacity of the corporate body to become the grantee in the given case cannot be challenged by a party who does not stand in a position to raise the question. In such a position it would be true that the State alone could object to such corporate Act. But such instances are to be discriminated from that other class, where the corporation claims to take and hold by device, in contravention of law, and the heir of the devisor is the party complaining. In this latter situation the doctrine enforced in the cases cited does not apply . . . I have no doubt that the heir at law has a standing in court to raise such a contention, and that in a court of equity he would be entitled to prevail if he could succeed in establishing the proposition on which such defense rests." The court affirmed the judgment below, on the ground that the corporation was not prohibited from taking the property.

The counsel claims, however, that a devise to a corporation vests the title in it, so far as the question of capacity is concerned, whenever it would in the case of a sale for a valuable consideration. Hence, he says that the cases of sales above cited are decisive of this, if they be admitted as well decided. In the case of an executed sale, however, the question of ultra vires, as set forth in the modern cases, comes in play; and the question of a want of title in the corporation in such case would not be permitted to be raised by the grantor or his heirs, because it would be against justice and would accomplish a legal wrong. Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62.

The question of an executed gift without consideration by a donor, by an absolute delivery to a corporation without power to take, is also instanced; and the question is asked whether the title vests in such a case in the corporation so that the donor or his heirs could not recover it back; and if it does, the counsel asks: Where is the difference in the two cases? It is time enough to decide such a case when it arises. But it seems to me there is a decided difference. In the one case the gift is made inter vivos by the absolute owner, and it is made effectual as to him by a delivery. In such case it would seem that he stands in no position to ask the aid of the court to get him out of a situation into which he voluntarily entered with his eyes open, and the court might well say to him that he stood in no position to attack the right of his donee to property which he freely and absolutely gave it. As to his heirs it could be said that their ancestor had made a disposition of property which was absolutely his own in his lifetime, and in such a way that he could not question its validity, and that as he could not, they, succeeding only to his rights, were alike disabled.

In the case of a devise, however, the case is essentially different. The will does not take effect until the testator's death; and then, if his property is not legally devised or bequeathed, no title vests for a single moment in the devisee or legatee, but it vests instantly in the heir or next of kin; and the corporation claiming under the will asks the aid of the law to give the property to it, and in so doing it must show the authority it has to take. And if there were only a prohibition in words against holding the property, would the law not be doing a vain thing in handing it over to a corporation which by the very fact of holding would render itself liable to have its charter forfeited on that account? Would not the prohibition against holding be properly and necessarily construed as a prohibition against taking also?

Is not this an argument against the right of the corporation to take, if by holding it is thus rendered liable to such a penalty? And is it not an agreement in favor of the construction of the language in the charter that the limitation upon the power to hold property is, under all the circumstances, a limitation upon the power to take any more than it can legally and properly hold?

One more statement must be noticed. It is said that as the Legislature, subsequently to the death of Mrs. Fiske, passed an Act which took away any limitation on the power of the university to hold property, this action of the legislative department of the government throws a strong light upon what is the policy of the State regarding institutions of learning, and, in the view of appellants' counsel, waives the right which might have existed on the part of the State to claim a forfeiture of the charter of the corporation. But the policy of the State in relation to what may be called its Mortmain Laws is to be gathered from its statutes of general application on that subject, and cannot be said to be altered by the passage of special Acts regarding particular corporations.

Nor do I think the counsel for appellants show any change in the general policy of the State by referring to the Acts of 1840 and 1841, already cited, as indicating a purpose to open the door to an unlimited accumulation of property by educational institutions in general. Those Acts, as has been said, did not enlarge the capacity of corporations to take property more than they could take under the General Laws. The Act of 1864, as to union and high schools, by which the board of education has power to take and hold property for educational purposes, and where permission was given to bequeath property to the State or to the superintendent of public instruction for the support or benefit of common schools, or to any county or district school commissioner, for such support, does not betray any change in the policy of the State upon this subject. The bequests spoken of are to the political subdivisions of the State or to the State itself as a corporation, but in its political capacity; and the property remains to be administered by the State officials or the officers of such political subdivisions, for the purposes of education in the common or high schools which the people are taxed to support. This is an entirely different thing from gifts to what may be termed a private educational establishment. Our courts have been quite unanimous in their opinions as to what the policy of the State was and is on this matter; and the extracts I have made regarding it, from the opinions of two very eminent former judges of this court, could be added to very largely by citing opinions of other judges in our own State, but it is not necessary.

However perfect may be the waiver in the Act alluded to, of the right of the State to forfeit the charter of this university on account of any alleged violation thereof, such Act can, of course, have no possible effect upon rights of property which vested at the death of Mrs. Fiske, and before the passage of the Act in question. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144.

The counsel asks, What is to be done in regard to the real property in other States, if we hold this corporation has no power to take any more property? It is said the surrogate has found, as a fact, that the university had legal capacity to take and did take by devise all the real property the title to which was in Mrs. Fiske at the time of her death, in those States. He says the title to real estate is governed by the laws of the States where the real property is situated, and that in the States in question it is held that a corporation can take under such circumstances as this case. This will devise no real estate to Cornell University.

It gives to the university $40,000, in trust for the erection and furnishing and support and maintenance of a hospital; $50,000, in trust for completing and perfecting the McGraw building; $200,000, in trust for the McGraw library fund; and it gives and devises the residue of the property of the testatrix, if any, to be added to the last mentioned fund. It then directs that the estate of the testatrix shall be converted into money or available securities by her executor, as soon as it can be done, having in view the best interests of the estate. This direction to convert operated as an equitable conversion of the estate of the testatrix into money or available securities; and hence no real estate in other States has been devised by her to the university. It is needless to inquire what would have been the rule in case real estate in other States had been specifically devised to the university, while this court should at the same time decide that it held property up to its charter limit, and that it had no capacity to take or hold any more real or personal property than the amount specified in its charter.

Upon a review of the whole question as to the proper construction of the legislation, general and special, affecting this university, I am of the opinion that it had no power to take or hold any more real and personal property than $8,000,000 in the aggregate.

II. Coming to the conclusion I have, on the first branch of the case, it becomes necessary to examine the second and only remaining question, viz.: Does this property, if taken and held by the university, exceed the amount which by law it can hold?

The decision of such question depends partly upon the view which should be taken of the character of the holding under which the university now possesses certain property, which is described in the finding of the surrogate, as property derived from the nation or State, and which he finds amounted to $2,088,012.78, and which was made up, as he also finds, of western land contracts, $439,884.22, and of western lands to the amount of $1,648,178.56; and he states, as part of his finding, that this total of $2,088,012.78, was due or payable by the university to the State, or, in other words, that the university owed the State that sum, and consequently it should not be regarded as any part of its property. This finding has not been concurred in by the general term, which has modified it by holding that the same is to be taken into account as part of the property of the university.

The state of facts under which the question arises is undisputed, and it becomes a question of law as to what is the proper legal inference to be drawn from the undisputed facts; and the decision of that question is reviewable in this court.

Stated as briefly as may be, the facts are these: In July, 1862, the Congress of the United States passed "An Act Donating Public Lands to the Several States and Territories Which May Provide Colleges for the Benefit of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts." A certain proportion of the public lands was in and by this Act donated to the different States for the purposes above expressed, but to such donation or grant there were attached several conditions, among which were these:

(a) The lands should be selected in the State making the selection, if there were public lands enough within it to permit it; if not, the secretary of the interior was directed to issue to each of the States land scrip to the amount in acres for the deficiency, which scrip was to be sold by the State and the proceeds thereof to be applied to the uses and purposes prescribed in the Act, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

(b) In no case should any State, to which land scrip was issued, be allowed to locate the same within the limits of any other State or Territory in the United States, but their assignees might locate it upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States.

(c) All expenses of management, superintendence and taxes from the date of the selection of lands previous to their sale, and all expenses for the management, etc., of the moneys received from such sales, were to be paid by the State, so that the entire proceeds of the sales of the lands should be applied to the purposes named.

(d) All moneys derived from the sale of the lands by the States to which they were apportioned, and from the sales of land scrip, were to be invested by the State in stocks of the United States or of the States, or some other safe stocks, yielding not less than 5 per cent upon the par value of such stocks; and the moneys so invested were to constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which should remain forever undiminished, and the interest of which should be inviolably appropriated by each State to the endowment and maintenance of at least one college where, among others, agriculture and the mechanic arts should be taught.

(e) If any portion of the invested fund, or any portion of the interest thereon, should by any action or contingency be lost or diminished it was to be replaced by the State to which it belonged, so that the capital of the fund should remain forever undiminished; and the annual interest should be regularly applied, without diminution, to the purposes mentioned in the Act. To these conditions the State was required to give its assent by legislative Act, and the grant was only authorized upon the acceptance of them by the State.

Any State taking the benefit of the provisions of the Act was required to provide, within five years, at least not less than one college, as provided in the Act. This State, by an Act passed May 8, 1863, duly accepted the grant and gave its assent to the conditions thereof. The comptroller was authorized to receive the land scrip (as the State had no public lands of the United States unappropriated within its borders), and to sell the same and to make all necessary arrangements, employ agents, etc., as he deemed expedient for effecting a judicious sale of such scrip. Land scrip representing 999,920 acres of land was then issued by the secretary of the interior to the comptroller, and was embraced in 6,178 pieces of scrip for 160 acres each. The comptroller sold about 76,000 acres at the rate of eighty-five cents.

In 1865 the Legislature chartered Cornell University, as a compliance on the part of the State with one of the conditions upon which it received the land scrip; and in the charter the income, revenue and avails which should be received from the investment of the proceeds of the sale of the land scrip were appropriated to the university, and were to be paid over to the trustees thereof for its use and for the purposes defined in the Act of Congress. This gift, however, was upon the condition that Ezra Cornell should give $500,000 to the university and $25,000 to the trustees of Genesee College, at Lima, in this State. Both gifts were made by Mr. Cornell.

Congress having donated this immense amount of land upon the conditions named in the Act, and the State having accepted such gift upon the conditions named, and having received the scrip and incorporated the university, and appropriated to it the income arising from the interest on the proceeds of the sales of such scrip, and the university having received the gift of half a million from Mr. Cornell, the great question then arising was in regard to the best means of disposing of such scrip for the best possible price, so that the income for the university should be increased to the greatest possible extent therefrom. The result of throwing into market such an enormous amount of the public lands as had been donated by Congress to the several States was a fall in the market value of the land, and, of course, of the scrip which represented it. In the fall of 1865 Mr. Cornell had purchased some scrip of the comptroller, representing 100,000 acres, for $50,000, and had given his bond for that sum upon condition that all the profits which should accrue from the sale of the land should be paid to the Cornell University. In this condition of matters the Legislature passed an Act (April 10, 1866) which is as follows:

"Sec. 1. The comptroller is hereby authorized to fix the price at which he will sell and dispose of any or of all the lands or land scrips donated to this State by the United States of America, by Act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and entitled 'An Act Donating Public Lands to the Several States and Territories, Which may provide Colleges for Instruction in Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts.' Such price shall not be less than at the rate of thirty cents per acre for said lands. He may contract for the sale thereof and sell the same to the trustees of the Cornell University.

"If the said trustees shall not agree with the said comptroller for the purchase thereof, then the commissioners of the land office may receive from any person or persons an application for the purchase of the whole or any part thereof at the price so fixed by the said comptroller, and may, if they are satisfied that the said person or persons will fully carry out and perform the agreement hereinafter mentioned, sell the same, or any part thereof, to the said person or persons. But said trustees, or such person or persons, shall at the same time make an agreement and give security for the performance thereof to the satisfaction of the comptroller, to the effect that the whole net avails and profits from the sale of scrip, or the location and use by said trustees, person or persons, of the said lands, or of the lands located under said scrip, shall from time to time, as such net avails or profits are received, be paid over and devoted to the purposes of such institution or institutions as have been or shall be created by the Act, chapter 585 of the Laws of 1865 of the State of New York, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Congress hereinbefore mentioned. And the said trustees, person or persons to whom the said lands or scrip shall be sold shall report to the comptroller, annually, under such oath and in such form as the comptroller shall direct, the amount of land or scrip sold, the prices at which the same have been sold, and the amount of money received therefor, and the amount of expenses incurred in the location and sale thereof.

"Sec. 2. The comptroller is authorized, from time to time as he shall see fit, to make such examination into the actions and doings of his vendees of said lands or scrip therewith as he shall deem necessary to ascertain and determine what are the net avails of said lands or scrip from the sale or from the location and use thereof by his said vendees.

"Sec. 8. This Act shall take effect immediately."

Under this Act the comptroller fixed the price of the land at fifty cents per acre, which, under all the circumstances, was considered a fair amount.

The trustees of the university did not apply to purchase the scrip under the Act of 1866; and on the 4th of August, 1866, the commissioners of the land office made an agreement with Ezra Cornell for the sale to him of all the remaining scrip undisposed of, represented by 5,087 certificates of 160 acres each.

The agreement was entered into between the commissioners and Mr. Cornell, under the authority of the above quoted Act of 1866; and as the decision of the question turns to a large extent upon the proper construction and meaning of this agreement, it is thought better, although the agreement is quite long, to insert it in full so the whole force and effect of the same may be observed. It is as follows:

"This agreement, Made this 4th day of August, 1866, between the People of the State of New York, through their commissioners of the land office, acting under and by virtue of chapter 481 of the Laws of 1866, of the first part, and Ezra Cornell, of Ithaca, New York, of the second part;—Witnesseth, That the said party of the first part hereby agrees to sell and assign and deliver to the party of the second part all of the agricultural land scrip now in the possession or ownership of the State of New York, consisting of 5,087 certificates, each representing 160 acres, on the following terms and conditions:

"First. That said party of the second part shall receive said scrip from time to time, as the same can be judiciously located, in parcels representing not less than 25,000 acres, paying therefor into the treasury of the State, on its assignment and delivery to him by the comptroller, at the rate of thirty cents per acre, in lawful money of the United States, or of the State of New York, or in other good and safe stocks or bonds, to be approved by the comptroller, and drawing not less than 5 per cent interest per annum, and at the same time depositing with the comptroller stocks or bonds to be approved by him, to an amount equal to an additional thirty cents per acre, as security for the fulfillment by the party of the second part of the conditions of this agreement, so far as they relate to the execution of a mortgage to the State on the land to be entered and located with said scrip, on the fulfillment of which, said stock or bonds so deposited as security, shall be returned to said party of the second part.

"Second. That whenever any parcel of scrip sold and delivered to the said party of the second part, under and by virtue of this agreement, shall have been located by him or his agents, the said party of the second part hereby agrees that he will, without delay, furnish to the commissioners of the land office of this State, or to some member thereof, to be designated by a resolution of the board, a full and complete list and description of the land so located. And the said board of commissioners shall, within at least sixty days thereafter, and from time to time subsequently as may be found expedient, fix a minimum valuation by quarter sections, at which the same may be sold by said party of the second part. And said party of the second part further agrees that he will annually, and from time to time whenever required by the commissioners of the land office, render for their information to the comptroller, a full, just and true account of all sales and leases made by him, said report to be made in such form and under such oath as the comptroller shall direct, and will pay into the treasury of the State the whole of the net profits arising therefrom, which shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross receipts on sales the original cost of thirty cents per acre, the cost and expenses attending the location, management and sale of said lands, the taxes assessed and paid on the same by the party of the second part, and the interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum on the several amounts actually expended and liabilities incurred for such purposes. But it is expressly agreed by the party of the second part that he will not sell any portion of said lands at a price below the minimum valuation thereon, which may, from time to time, be fixed by the commissioners of the land office, without first obtaining their consent to do so in writing.

"Third. That the stipulations and conditions of this agreement shall apply to each and every parcel of scrip assigned and delivered to said party of the second part under this agreement, and the comptroller shall defer or suspend further assignments and deliveries of scrip whenever the party of the second part fails to perform such stipulations and conditions in respect to any scrip sold and delivered to him under this agreement until they have been complied with. Except, nevertheless, that stocks or bonds as security for the return and mortgage of lands located under scrip to the party of the second part, shall in no case be required when there shall remain in the hands of the comptroller, by virtue of this agreement, mortgaged lands not released, equal in quantity to the scrip which may be issued to the party of the second part, and remain not located and mortgaged as provided by this agreement.

"Fourth. That as often as and whenever the party of the second part shall furnish a description of any of the lands selected and located by him under and by virtue of said scrip, he shall immediately execute a mortgage thereon to the people of this State to be approved by the Attorney-General, conditioned that the said party of the second part will fully keep and perform each and every of the terms and conditions he is required to do, keep and perform. And this agreement is declared to be a continuing agreement, and a suit or suits at law or in equity may be from time to time instituted and maintained thereon, and upon any or all of said mortgages, for any violation of such terms and conditions, whenever such violation may occur. Said mortgages shall be delivered to the comptroller or to the commissioners of the land office.

"Fifth. Whenever the party of the second part shall sell or dispose of any section of the lands acquired by him under this agreement and pay into the treasury of the State the net profits resulting from such sale, after the deductions hereinbefore mentioned and provided for, the party of the first part shall execute and deliver to the party of the second part a full and sufficient release of the portion sold from the lien of the mortgage, so that a clear title can be vested in the purchaser or purchasers.

"Sixth. That of the moneys arising from sales or leases made by the party of the second part, and paid into the state treasury as herein provided, a proportion equal to thirty cents per acre shall be added to and form a part of the fund known and designated on the records of the comptroller's office as the "College Land Scrip Fund," and the remainder shall constitute a separate and distinct fund, which shall be the property of the "Cornell University," to be known as the "Cornell Endowment Fund," the principal of which shall forever remain unimpaired, the income to be annually appropriated by the Legislature, and paid over from time to time to the trustees of the Cornell University, to be by them devoted to the purposes of the institution.

"Seventh. That the said party of the second part further agrees to purchase the whole of the aforesaid scrip, and select and locate lands under and by virtue thereof, and execute mortgages thereon, as hereinbefore provided, within four years from the date hereof, and that he will sell the lands within twenty years from date, and pay the net profits arising from such sales into the treasury of the State, and that until the same shall be sold and the net profits so paid, he will pay all taxes which may be assessed thereon, and preserve and maintain a title thereto unimpaired, to which the liens created by said mortgages shall attach.

"And if any event shall occur making it needful for the people of this State to incur any expense to preserve the lien of said mortgages, the same shall be paid out of the proceeds of said lands. And if, after the expiration of the period of four years hereinbefore fixed, any of said scrip shall remain with this State, and not have been paid for by the party of the second part, the same shall be released thereafter from the conditions and stipulations of this agreement."

There was no sum provided in the Act of 2 L. R. A.

Congress for the sale of the scrip. It was in the discretion of the State to sell it at any price it could obtain either at public or private sale; and it could sell the whole or any part of such scrip at any time, but the proceeds of such sale were to be invested under the Act of Congress and the income applied as therein provided for. If there be any ambiguity in the meaning of the agreement as a whole, it is not improper to see what meaning was attached to it by the persons who executed it, if possible, and also to look at the surrounding facts so that we may place ourselves in the same position as the contracting parties and thus learn what was in contemplation.

It is known that at the time of the passage of the Act of April 10, 1866, sales of the scrip had almost ceased. It was thought that there was a good chance that the land which might be located under this scrip would, in the future, greatly appreciate in value, and it was the wish of those interested in its welfare that the university should, in some way, reap the benefit of this increase. But it had no funds to purchase the scrip, and it needed ready money as an income to aid it in the discharge of its duties as an educational institution. Hence the problem was to find some one who would purchase the scrip and pay for it and then locate and sell the lands at the higher prices which it was hoped they would attain and give the profits to the university. A glance at the correspondence between Mr. Cornell and the comptroller, and at the minutes of the proceedings of the land commissioners, and the other evidence in the case, shows that there was no one else than Mr. Cornell who was ever thought of as a person who would take upon himself such burdens, troubles, labors and responsibilities for the purpose of giving away all the profits which might, in the future, arise from such sales. It is seen by reference to that correspondence that Mr. Cornell and the comptroller differed in regard to the construction of the Act, the comptroller holding that the Act really meant that the net avails of the scrip should be placed under the custody of the State, while it may be inferred that the idea of Mr. Cornell was that the profits, after paying the original thirty cents, and the additional thirty cents (if realized), as the purchase price of the scrip, might be placed as he should choose, provided the university should receive the benefit of the whole income arising from such profits. Under date of June 9, 1866, Mr. Cornell, in his letter to the comptroller, speaks of his differing with the comptroller in his construction of the law, but adds: "Appreciating, as I do, most fully your motives for desiring to give the utmost possible security and permanency to the funds which are, in a great degree, to constitute the endowment of the Cornell University, I shall most cheerfully accept your views so far as to consent to place the entire profits to be derived from the sale of the lands to be located with the college land scrip in the treasury of the State, if the State will receive the money as a separate fund from that which may be derived from the sale of scrip, and will keep it permanently invested and appropriate the proceeds from the income thereof annually to the Cornell University, subject to the direction of the trustees thereof, for the general purposes of the institution, and not to hold it subject to the restrictions which the Act of Congress places upon the fund derivable from the sale of the college land scrip, or as a donation from the government of the United States, but as a donation from Ezra Cornell to the Cornell University."

Mr. Cornell thus plainly understood that the purchase price of the scrip from the State was thirty cents an acre, with a possible thirty cents more if he should realize that sum on the sale of the land, and that any sum beyond that came to him as profits on his sale of the scrip or land to third parties, and that sum being his own profits, he was willing to donate to the university, and for that purpose to pay the same into the treasury of the State, the same to be invested and the income therefrom to be paid by the State to the university for the general purposes of the institution, and not as part of the purchase price of the scrip, to be invested under the Act of Congress. It was after the receipt of this letter that the agreement was made, the subdivision (six) containing, in substance, the provision asked for by Mr. Cornell.

While in some portions of this agreement, if read alone and laying aside all knowledge of the contemporary history of the events surrounding it, there might arise some doubt as to the meaning of such portion, yet when read as a whole, and in the light of those events, I think no real and grave doubt can exist as to the meaning of this instrument. It seems clear to my mind that the State sold this land scrip at thirty cents per acre, with an additional thirty cents if so much should thereafter be realized upon the sale by the vendee of the State, and that this constitutes the purchase price of such scrip, which, when assigned to Mr. Cornell by the State, in accordance with the terms of the contract, he became the legal owner of. He, it is true, also agreed that his profits should be paid into the treasury of the State, but they were to be paid therein as profits, and not as any portion of the purchase price of the scrip, and they were to be paid, and were in fact paid, as profits of Mr. Cornell, and they were received under the agreement as the property of the Cornell University, the income of which was to be paid to it for its general purposes, and the principal was to constitute the Cornell endowment fund. I cannot see that in all this there was nothing but an agency created in behalf of the State, and that Mr. Cornell was such agent, and that the whole profits realized were really nothing but the proceeds of the sale of the lands by the State. The State on the contrary, by the very terms of the agreement, sold the scrip; and the legal title, by patents from the government of the United States, was vested in Mr. Cornell when he located the lands under the scrip which he had purchased, and took out his patents upon such location.

Neither can I see that the purchaser of the scrip gave, or intended to give, or was supposed to give, his profits as part of such purchase price. His agreement is plain, and in it he stated what such purchase price was, and what he would give for the scrip; and the fact that he agreed to pay his profits, if any were realized, into the treasury of the State, as the property of the university, which was to have the income thereof paid over to it for its general purposes, does not, to my mind, render such profits any portion of the purchase price of the scrip. They were profits which he hoped to be able to realize in the future, but were entirely speculative in character and amount, dependent largely upon the judgment with which the lands were located, and the time and manner of their sale. All this Mr. Cornell was willing to do for this university; but the agreement shows that he was to do it as a gift of his own, and not as a mere agent of the State or of the United States; and that all the compensation he sought for his services, his trouble and his responsibilities, great and onerous as they were, was the fact that all should go to the university as his gift; and the State became the custodian of the profits under a duty to appropriate the income to the trustees for the general purposes of the university.

The counsel for the institution may be entirely right in his statements as to the law regarding this branch of the question, if he is right in the fundamental proposition as to the profits being a part of the purchase price or the avails of the sale of the scrip by the State; but until he can maintain the correctness of that proposition, I do not think his argument reaches the trouble. I do not think the proposition is correct. The profits were the avails of the sale of the scrip by Mr. Cornell, not in any sense the avails of the sale of the scrip by the State.

I think, also, that the agreement is fully authorized by the Act of April 10, 1866. It gives the right to the commissioners of the land office to sell the scrip or any part thereof for the price which was to be fixed by the comptroller, and not less than thirty cents per acre. The right to sell the scrip at the price fixed by the comptroller was based upon the fact that the persons who purchased at such price should also agree to pay over the net avails or profits from the sale by them of the scrip or lands located under it, as they should be received, and that they should be "devoted to the purposes of such institution or institutions as have been or shall be created by the Act, chapter 585 of the Laws of 1865" (the Charter of Cornell University), in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Congress before mentioned. This does not mean that all these possible profits are to be deposited in the state treasury, subject to the same rules that would obtain in the case of the purchase price of the scrip, but only that they shall be devoted to the institution created by the Act of 1865, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Congress already mentioned. Of course the purchase price—that which was fixed by the comptroller—was to go into the treasury and be invested as provided for by the Act of Congress.

The reference in the above section of the Act of 1866 to such institution or institutions as have been or shall be created by the Act, chapter 585 of the Laws of 1865, can, of course, be to none but the Cornell University; and hence the provision in the agreement, that the profits shall all be devoted to that institution, was proper. As that university had complied with all the conditions imposed upon it by the State as a condition to its right to receive all the income from this fund, the right to it could not be taken from it. This the commissioners of the land office stated in their report to the constitutional convention in answer to a request from that body for information as to this land scrip. And in this report, under date of July 22, 1867, the comptroller, as a member of the board of commissioners of the land office, and one of the officers who executed the contract with Mr. Cornell in August, 1866, stated as follows:

"In deciding what portion of the income of the money paid into the treasury under the agreement with Mr. Cornell would be subject to this limitation" (set forth in the Act of Congress) "as to its use and application, the commissioners of the land office assumed that the prohibition applied only to the purchase money received by the State on a sale of the scrip, and that the ultimate profits to be derived from the location and sale of the lands by the purchaser formed no part of the purchase money, and need not, therefore, be included. The nominal price which was fixed on the scrip by the Act of 1866, and for which it was sold, in consideration of the stipulation to pay over the net profits, being less than the market rates, it was stipulated in the sixth section of the agreement that an additional thirty cents per acre from the net profits should be added to the purchase money, thus increasing the price to sixty cents per acre, the current rate for the scrip at the date of the transaction, and limiting the purposes to which it may be applied in conformity with the terms of the grant by Congress."

Here, then, in addition to the language as used in the agreement itself, which, when read as a whole, seems to me quite plain, we find what Mr. Cornell was willing to do as set forth in his letter to the comptroller, above quoted from, in which he claims the Act permitted it, and he would donate the profits as a gift from himself to the university; and we find in an official report of one of the officers executing the contract, speaking for himself and associates, what was their understanding of this agreement. From all sources, the agreement itself, and the separate views of the parties to it, it appears the construction should be, and was, that the profits formed no part of the purchase price or the avails of the sale of the scrip by the State (over the thirty cents per acre if realized), and that such profits belonged to the university by the gift of Mr. Cornell, the vendee of the scrip from the State, the income to be paid to the trustees of the university for the general purposes of the same.

In 1868, by chapter 554, the Legislature authorized the comptroller to invest the moneys comprising the Cornell endowment fund in securities which were not authorized by the Act of Congress, provided such moneys formed any part of the purchase price or avails of the sale of the scrip by the State.

This must be taken as a legislative recognition of the fact that the agreement of sale to Mr. Cornell was for thirty (possibly sixty) cents an acre, and that all profits belonged to Mr. Cornell, but that by an agreement he had agreed to give them to the university for the general purposes thereof. We cannot assume that the State would have run counter to the express provisions of the Act of Congress by enacting that the purchase price of the scrip might be invested in a manner forbidden by that Act.

The commissioners appointed under a joint resolution of the Legislature of 1878 reported (two out of three), that the profits formed part of the purchase price of the scrip, the third commissioner, Horatio Seymour, not concurring and being of the contrary opinion.

The Legislature took no action then upon the subject, but by the Act (chap. 817 of the Laws of 1880), it directed the comptroller, upon the request of the Cornell University, to transfer to it all moneys, securities, etc., constituting a part of the Cornell endowment fund, pursuant to which Act the fund was transferred to it. This was done because the university, under an agreement made with Mr. Cornell in 1874, with the consent of the comptroller and the commissioners of the land fund, had placed itself in the shoes of Mr. Cornell, so far as the contract with the State was concerned, and Mr. Cornell had conveyed to it all his right and title to the scrip, the lands located under it, and all land contracts existing. This was done at the wish of Mr. Cornell, who desired the university to take the further work under the contract, and the responsibility arising therefrom, and the university has paid to the State a portion of the amount coming to it as the purchase price (the additional thirty cents realized) for the sale of some of the lands.

These are the material facts upon which the question discussed arises, and thus the two bodies, the State and the university, stood at the date of the commencement of these proceedings, and thus they stand now. The State has made and makes no claim that any portion of these profits over the thirty cents an acre forms any portion of the purchase price of the sale of the scrip by it. The university, by its agreement with Mr. Cornell and by taking exactly his position, and by receiving the moneys and securities of the Cornell endowment fund by virtue of the Act of 1880, clearly has taken the position that it was the owner of this fund, and was not indebted to the State therefor. Its reports show that they (the trustees of the university) claimed that it had no debts, and they acknowledged none to the State on account of this fund.

If it existed, it would certainly be a somewhat onerous position for the State to be in. It must have all the proceeds of the sale of this scrip including in such case all the profits of the past and what may hereafter arise; it must pay all expenses, etc., after location, in the way of taxes, and all incurred in the management and disbursement of the moneys, and must invest in stocks of the kind described in the Act of Congress, and must forever guaranty the whole amount, so that if any of the principal is lost, it must be supplied by the State; and it must pay over the 5 per cent interest on the whole of this fund to the university. This, of course, does not weigh in case the decision were that the law is in that condition. For the reasons already given, I do not think it is.

Interpreted as we have interpreted the agreement and the Act of the Legislature of New York, the remaining inquiry is, Does the New York Statute, or the agreement under it, run counter to the Act of Congress creating this land scrip trust? I think not. It provides that all moneys derived from the sale of the land scrip by the State shall be invested, etc., as therein prescribed. The scrip is to be sold by the State, which could not itself locate the land, and the avails of such sale are to be invested. The avails of the sale of the scrip by the State were the purchase price thereof; and if I am right, that the profits formed no part of such purchase price, but were the property of the vendee of the State, which he agreed to give to the university for general purposes, as his gift and to form the property of the university, then the Act of Congress has no concern with it.

Another consideration may be adverted to.

It is exceedingly doubtful, in my mind, whether the university can be heard to claim the existence of this alleged debt under the facts of this case. The State has made, and makes, no claim upon the university for the property or any portion of it. It was placed in its possession by virtue of the consent of the State, evidenced by the passage of an Act authorizing and directing it. The university has claimed to be the owner of it, and no one has drawn its rightful title in question. Can it now, while enjoying, without hostile claim from any source, the full control of the property, as its absolute owner, set up, as a reason why it should be allowed to take other property, that perhaps hereafter some one may make a claim that the property does not belong to the university, but that it is a trust fund originating in the Act of Congress? If the State or United States were to commence some proceeding, based on the counsel's argument, to reclaim possession of the property, there is nothing in the present attitude of the university which would necessarily estop or in any way conclude it from denying that any such trust exists, or that any case had been made for taking the possession of the property out of its hands. So far as appears, it seems that this assumed indebtedness is entirely gratuitous on its part, and that there is no creditor who makes the claim, no one who questions its title. It is going a good ways, under such circumstances, to lay much weight on a liability which, up to this proceeding, was never admitted by the university, and is not now asserted by anyone else. It would seem as if property, which was thus in the possession of a corporation, unclaimed by anyone else, was held by it within the meaning of its charter, and that the question in regard to the character of its holding was merely an abstract one, with which courts would not deal, at least so far as this proceeding is concerned.

In all these matters it must be borne in mind, the parties have all been acting in the most entire and perfect good faith. This was no scheme to avoid or evade the provisions of the 2 L. R. A.

Act of Congress. The price of sixty cents an acre, which the State got for the land, was all it was worth at that time. Its future value depended upon many contingencies. The State had the right to sell the scrip for such price as it might agree on with a purchaser. This it did. The university wanted money to pay its expenses. It could not very well wait for twenty or even five years for the purpose of seeing how the value of this scrip would appreciate, if at all. The Legislature was equally in earnest in its desire for the prosperity of the institution; so were the state officers, and, above and beyond all, so was Mr. Cornell, its generous founder and already the donor of such a large amount of money. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, the plan carried out was hit upon, and the amount of the Cornell endowment fund and the property arising therefrom must be regarded as a gift of the donor and founder, and not as a violation of either the Act of Congress, or of the Act of our own Legislature.

The agreement being valid and authorized by our state law, which was not in conflict with the law of Congress, the position of the university with regard to property must now be adverted to.

The university stands in this position, counting the two items of western lands and land contracts as its property:

|                             |                       |
|-----------------------------|-----------------------|
| Funds from individuals..... | $ 598,588 65         |
| Western lands.....          | 1,048,178 56          |
| Western land contracts..... | 499,594 22            |
|                             | $2,686,101 43 |

In the first item, however, is included the university buildings, farm, grounds, etc., as fixed by the surrogate, at $69,683.88. The general term advances those figures by $315,316.67, making the valuation $335,000. Adding $315,316.67 to the $2,686,101.43, we have a total of $3,001,418.10, without counting the college land scrip fund in the hands of the State as property.

We agree with the general term in the modifications made by it in the value of the university buildings and grounds, although we are probably bound by its findings, as there was contradictory evidence in regard to it.

This brings the property of the university above set forth, up to more than its permitted aggregate at the time of the decease of Mrs. Fiske, and no debts to be deducted therefrom.

Under such circumstances, the university could not take the various legacies bequeathed to it by her will.

The judgment of the General Term must, therefore, be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Finch, J., taking no part.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

BRADSTREET COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Robert GILL.

(....Texas....)

1. The question of agency should be left to the jury, where a party's letters, coupled with testimony that he had made reports to a commercial agency of the status of merchants, would support a finding that he was an agent of such agency, but there is other evidence from which the jury might conclude that he was not such agent.
2. An agency is created if relations exist which will constitute an agency, although the parties may not so intend. The effect of such relations cannot be affected by the private intention of the parties.
3. If a libel consisted in reporting plaintiff's standing as a merchant, "in blank," the complaint should inform the court and the defendant of that fact, with such explanations as to what was meant by the report as may be necessary to show that it was injurious and defamatory. A complaint in such case which undertakes to state the substance of the language used, or its meaning, is bad on general demurrer.
4. In an action against a foreign corporation it is not necessary under the Texas Act of March 31, 1885, to allege that it had an agent or representative in the county, and that its principal office was also in the county; but it is enough to allege either that it had an agent or representative in the county, or that its principal office was there.
5. A witness in possession of a key to the reports of a commercial agency may be allowed, in an action for libel, to explain what was indicated by reporting a merchant's standing "in blank," which constitutes the alleged libel.
6. Testimony of witnesses as to the general effect in commercial circles upon the credit of a person of a rating by a commercial agency is inadmissible, being only the opinion of the witnesses about a matter that the jury were capable of judging.
7. Publications of commercial agencies, issued to their subscribers generally, are not privileged communications. They are only privileged when made in confidence to a subscriber who is interested in the pecuniary standing of the merchant reported.

3 L. R. A.

The action was based upon an alleged false report concerning plaintiff's commercial standing, made in January, 1885, by the Bradstreet Company, an incorporated commercial agency. Plaintiff testified that he was cramped in business by the report complained of and that he had been compelled to refuse business on that account. Defendant contended that there was no evidence of damage to go to the jury.

The letters of the defendant company to John M. Finney, referred to in the opinion as tending to show that he was an agent of the defendant, asked him to correct certain reports furnished him, and evidence was given that he had done so.

By the twelfth assignment of error, referred to in the opinion, the appellant contended that if there was any evidence of damage it was caused by prior reports, and not by the report of January, 1885, complained of; and that the claim for damage for such prior reports was barred.

Messrs. Labatt & Noble and Fowler & Maynard for appellant.

No counsel appeared for appellee.

Collard, J., delivered the following opinion:

The appellant, the Bradstreet Company, being a foreign corporation, was sued in Bastrop County, of this State, for damages for an alleged libel upon plaintiff, Robert Gill, a merchant in the Town of Bastrop. The business of the Bradstreet Company is that of a commercial agency. It is a foreign corporation, and does business in the United States and in Texas. It is alleged in the petition that the company is a foreign corporation, and that John M. Finney is its local agent in Bastrop County. Defendant denied that it had any agent in the county, and pleaded in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court. The court instructed the jury "that the evidence shows that defendant has an agent in Bastrop County, and that the court has jurisdiction of the case." It is insisted that this charge is error, because there was evidence tending to show that defendant had no agent in the county, and that the charge was upon the weight of evidence.

We think it was error to so charge the jury. The court should have instructed the jury that if Finney was employed or engaged by the company as its correspondent at the time the suit was brought, to furnish it with information as to the commercial standing of merchants and business men in Bastrop County, to be used by the company in its reports to its customers and subscribers in conducting the agency. The circular of a mercantile agency, issued to subscribers generally, is not privileged; although a publication by such an agency, to persons having dealings with plaintiff, would be privileged. Com. v. Stacey, 8 Phila. 617. A communication by the proprietor of a mercantile agency, through his clerks, to his customers and their clerks, was not privileged. Beardsley v. Tappan, 5 Blatchf. 497; Billings v. Russell, 8 Boston L. Rep. N. S. 609, was the first reported case for libel against a mercantile agency. See Townshend, Libel & S. 456, 477; as to privileged communications, Byam v. Collins, ante, 129.

business of the company, then he would be its agent; and, he being a resident of the county, the court had jurisdiction in the case. The letters of the company to Finney, coupled with the testimony that he made reports to it of the status of merchants in Bastrop, would support a finding that he was such agent; but there was other evidence which the jury might have considered, and from which they may have concluded that he was not engaged by defendant as its agent at the time the suit was brought. The question of agency or not should have been left to the jury. It would have been error to instruct the jury, as requested by defendant, that Finney was not its agent. It was error to instruct them that he was such agent.

The court refused a charge asked by defendant to the effect that if it was not the intention of defendant to make Finney its agent, and if it was not the intention of Finney to become its agent, to find for defendant on the plea in abatement. The refusal to give the charge is assigned as error.

The intention of the parties, it is true, must control; but that intention is gathered from what was actually done or agreed by the parties, not from what they may have privately meant or supposed they meant. Agency or not is a question of law, to be determined by the relations of the parties as they in fact exist under their agreements or acts. If relations exist which will constitute an agency, it will be an agency, whether the parties understood it to be or not. Their private intention will not affect it. It was not error to refuse the charge.

The court overruled defendant's general demurrer to the petition. This ruling is assigned as error, because the petition does not set forth with sufficient certainty the alleged false reports; because it does not set forth with sufficient certainty the actual damages sustained by plaintiff; because it does not show whether plaintiff's suit is for libel or slander, and it does not show whether the suit is for actual or exemplary damages, nor how much is claimed as actual, and how much as exemplary, damages; and because "it fails to show that the defendant has an agency or representation, and principal office in Bastrop County."

The petition does not set out in hac verba the very language of the libel, but pretends to give its substance and meaning. Our rules of pleading require that the petition shall set forth "a full and clear statement of the cause of action, and such other allegations pertinent to the cause as the plaintiff may deem necessary to sustain his suit," etc. It has been many times decided by our courts that the common-law distinctions as to pleading, and its technicalities, do not prevail with us, but that a clear and logical statement of the cause of action is all that is necessary.

A clear statement of the facts constituting the cause of action cannot, however, be dispensed with. The character of the suit must be the guide to the pleader, and enough must be stated to constitute a cause of action. In a suit on a note it will be sufficient to state the substance and legal effect of the note. Not so in a suit for libel. A libel suit is based on language or its equivalent. The complainant in a libel suit should put the court in possession of the libelous matter published—the language used, with such innuendoes as are necessary to explain what was meant by the language—and to whom it applied, so as to enable the court to determine whether the words are actionable.

In this case the complaint attempts to give the meaning of the words or libel only, without stating what the libel was. If the libel consisted in reporting plaintiff's standing as a merchant, "in blank" the complaint should have informed the court and the defendant of the fact, with such explanations as to what was meant by the report as were necessary to show that the report was injurious and defamatory. This is not a case where the pleader must, from the nature of the publication, resort to a verbal description of the slanderous matter, as it would be when movements, postures or pictures are used. Plaintiff could have stated his cause of action as it was, in clear terms. He has not done so. It is not sufficient, in this kind of a suit, to state the substance of the language used, or its meaning. We believe the general demurrer ought to have been sustained. See Townshend, Libel & S. §§ 829-835, inclusive.

The damages claimed by plaintiff are compensatory only. He suffered great damage in the conduct of his business and in his commercial standing. He does not ask for vindictive damages. The allegations of the petition were sufficient upon this subject. This is a suit for libel; it was unnecessary for plaintiff to so characterize it by averment.

In order to maintain the suit in Bastrop County, it was not necessary, as appellant seems to think, for plaintiff to allege that defendant had an agent or representative in the county, and that its principal office was also in the county. It was enough to allege that it had, at the time suit was brought, an agent or representative in the county, or that the principal office was in the county. Either allegation was sufficient.

The statute (Act of March 31, 1885) in force at the time the suit was brought provides that foreign private or public corporations, doing business in this State, may be sued "in any county where the cause of action, or a part thereof, accrued, or in any county where such company may have an agency or representation in the county in which the principal office may be situated, or," etc. There is no comma after the word "representation" in the Act, but to so read it would render it utterly senseless. Reading it with a comma, it becomes perfectly clear and intelligible, and means that "suit may be brought in any county where the company has an agency or representative, in the county where its principal office is situated, or," etc. The rules of construction demand that the Act should be read so as to give it sense and meaning—the meaning it was evidently intended to have. The seeming confusion in the language and punctuation was corrected by amendment, April 4, 1887.

We think there was no error, as insisted by appellant, in permitting witnesses, in possession of the key to defendant's reports, to explain what was indicated by reporting a merchant's standing "in blank." Plaintiff was reported in blank, and it was proper to explain by testimony what the blank represented. The petition should have contained allegations of the fact as published, with the proper innuendo, as a predicate for the testimony. The testimony showing the effect of such a rating upon the credit of plaintiff—that is, the general effect in commercial circles—was inadmissible. It was only the opinion of the witnesses about a matter of which the jury were capable of judging, and which it was their duty to determine. If the rating meant that plaintiff had no credit and no capital, and such rating was false, it was libelous and actionable per se; and the jury should have been left to estimate its effect without the influence of the opinions of the witnesses, however competent to judge of such matters. Townshend, Libel & S. 297. If plaintiff suffered special damage by loss of credit, the injury and the cause of it were susceptible of proof—direct proof—by the persons with whom his credit suffered. If there was a general loss of credit, or breaking down of commercial character, and it was susceptible of proof, it was a matter of opinion for the jury only, unaided by the opinions of outsiders.

There was some evidence, though slight, tending to show that plaintiff's credit was injured by the publication, and that he suffered some damage. It was not the province of the court to judge of the weight of the evidence, any more than it was to direct the jury as to the amount of damages they should find for the injury. Besides this, it was the privilege of the jury to decide upon the general effect of the libel upon the plaintiff's character and credit as a merchant. We cannot, therefore, agree with appellant that the charge upon this subject was unauthorized by the evidence. The assignment of error on this point is untenable.

The twelfth assignment of error is also untenable. It does not appear from the evidence that, if plaintiff was damaged at all, it was by the publication made prior to January, 1885. On the contrary, it does appear that if he was injured it was by the publication of January, 1885. The jury expressly found their verdict on that publication, and we think correctly. Limitation did not bar the publication of January, 1885.

There are several assignments of error predicated upon the refusal of the court to give requested charges of defendant to the effect that the publication complained of was a privileged communication, and that, such being the case, malice in fact must be established to entitle to a recovery. These assignments may all be considered together. We cannot accede to the proposition that the publications of commercial agencies, issued to their subscribers generally, are privileged communications. They are only privileged when made in confidence to a subscriber who is interested in the pecuniary standing of the merchant reported.

In Erber v. Dun, tried in the United States Circuit Court, of Arkansas, Caldwell, J., expressed the correct doctrine, as we understand it. He said: "It is indisputable, under the evidence, that whatever was said orally by defendants about plaintiffs and their business was said in good faith, and in confidence to their subscribers, who were by reason of their business relations with the plaintiffs interested in knowing their financial and business standing, and in answer to requests made by their subscribers in relation thereto. This being so, the statements thus made by defendants are privileged communications." 13 Fed. Rep. 580.

A case more nearly in point is that of Sunderlin v. Bradstreet, decided by the Court of Appeals of New York. In that case plaintiffs were merchants. Defendants were proprietors of a mercantile agency, and published a semi-annual volume, giving the standing and financial credit of merchants in the United States and Canada, and also weekly sheets to their subscribers in the City of New York. In the weekly sheet they published that plaintiffs had failed. The statement was false. Plaintiffs called on defendants for the names of the persons furnishing the information, which defendants refused to give, but published a retraction of the report the next week. It was held that "The defendants, in making the communication, assumed the legal responsibility which rests upon all who without cause publish defamatory matter of others; that is, proving the truth of the publication, or responding in damages to the injured party." It was further said that "The communication of the libel to those not interested in the information was officious and unauthorized, and therefore not protected, although made in the belief of its truth, if it were in point of fact false." 46 N. Y. 188.

The very question under consideration was recently, in 1887, before the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. King v. Patterson, 8 Cent. Rep. 357, 49 N. J. L. 417. The court was divided, but a majority of the court held to the doctrine announced in Sunderlin v. Bradstreet. Both sides of the question were fully discussed in the case by the disagreeing judges, and such authorities as bear upon the subject were cited and reviewed. We think the conclusion reached by a majority of the court a correct one.

A commercial agency is a lawful business, and, when conducted lawfully, is a benefit to society and trade; but no just reason can be given for a rule that would exempt it from liability for false and defamatory publications, when other citizens would not be exempt. If an individual voluntarily or for profit give false and injurious information to persons interested in the trade and commercial standing of another at the time the information is given, such communications would be privileged; but if he furnish the same information to others not so interested—to traders and merchants as a class—the communication would not be privileged. A commercial agency organized for the purpose of furnishing such information, keeping an intelligence office for profit, should, it seems to us, be held to the same accountability as the ordinary citizen. The acts of the agency properly done are no more meritorious or beneficial than when done by an individual, except that they may be more extended, and cover more transactions.

Impartial justice cannot imagine a sound reason for a distinction in favor of an agency. It amounts to this, at last, and no more: the business of a commercial agency is lawful when conducted lawfully. It will be protected so long as it does not transgress the rights of others. It is not entitled to any privileges denied the ordinary citizen. If it is a greater benefit to trade than the occasional acts of the individual, because more extended and continuous in its operation, it is for the same reason capable of doing more harm by its false reports. Its wrong doing is more difficult to remedy. Because it has a monopoly of such intelligence is no reason for giving it a privilege to do a wrong by an improper publication of false statements, though the publication may be in the usual course of business it has adopted. It has the right, then, to the protection of a privileged communication, when made to persons at the time interested in the information, even though the information may be false; but when communicated to its general subscribers it has no such right.

If the publication is privileged, no suit can be maintained against it, unless express malice is shown to have instigated it, or such gross disregard of the rights of the person published as will be equivalent to malice in fact. Even when the communication is not privileged, malice must be shown to authorize a recovery; but in such case negative facts may indicate the malice, as that the publication was false, and was made without legal excuse. The malice may be inferred from the fact of a false publication of libelous matter. When the publication is privileged, the malice so implied from the false and defamatory publication is deemed to have been met and rebutted—in which case as before stated, malice in fact must be shown to warrant a recovery; and such malice is defined to be ill-will, bad or evil motive, or such gross indifference to the right of others as will amount to a willful or wanton act. Holt v. Parsons, 23 Tex. 9; Behee v. Mo. Pac. R. Co. (Tex.) 9 S. W. 449, decided by the commission of appeals, Tyler Term, 1883, and authorities there cited.

It was shown in this case that the alleged libellous matter was issued to defendant's general subscribers in the United States. If the fact published was false and libelous, malice could be inferred from the fact (though it would not be proper to point out to the jury in the charge the facts from which the malice could be inferred); and, if it is shown that plaintiff's credit and reputation were injured by such publication, he could recover damages therefor—besides any other special damages he may have sustained in his business by reason of such publication.

There are a great number of assignments of error presented and apparently relied on in appellant's brief, some of which we may not have more than incidentally noticed; but we believe we have given our views of every material question raised on the trial, so that there need be no difficulty, in the law of the case as we understand it, upon another trial. Because of the errors above pointed out in the rulings of the court, we are of opinion the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF IOWA, App't.,

v.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS,—P. C. CUMMINGS, Claimant.

(...Iowa....)

Under the Iowa Statute providing that the words "intoxicating liquors" as used therein shall be construed to mean "alcohol, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous and malt liquors and all intoxicating liquors whatever," liquor containing alcohol is, as a matter of law, intoxicating, however much it may be diluted, and regardless of the fact that the quantity drunk at any one time would not produce intoxication.

APPEAL by the State, from a judgment of the District Court of Buchanan County (Ney, J.), in favor of the claimant in a proceeding against intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

NOTE.—Intoxicating liquors. Courts will take judicial notice that lager beer, ale, porter and any other liquor made of malt is a malt liquor. Netso v. St. te (Fla.) 1 L. R. A. 825. In New York, the courts take judicial notice that whisky, brandy, gin, ale or strong beer are intoxicating liquors. Rau v. People, 63 N. Y. 279; Excise Comrs. v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173; People v. Zeiger, 6 Park. Cr. Rep. 355; People v. Hart, 24 How. Pr. 286; Josephdaffer v. State, 82 Ind. 402. In order to show the intoxicating properties of beer sold, evidence may be given of a chemical analysis of a similar article. Com. v. Goodman, 2 L. R. A.

Statement by Seevers, Ch. J.:

Certain liquors claimed to be intoxicating were duly seized under legal process. P. C. Cummings appeared and claimed to be the owner of such liquor. A trial was had before a justice of the peace, who found that the liquors were not intoxicating, and ordered that they be returned to the claimant. An appeal to the district court was taken, and judgment was rendered for the defendant. The State appeals.

Mr. H. W. Holman for appellant.

Mr. E. E. Hasner for appellee.

Seevers, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended that the court erred in finding the liquors were not intoxicating. The case was submitted to the court upon the evidence of a single witness as to whether the liquors were intoxicating. Such evidence is before us.

The witness is a chemist, and made an anal-

97 Mass. 119. Medicated bitters "producing intoxication" are "intoxicating liquors" within the legal meaning of a statute making the sale of such liquors illegal. James v. State, 21 Tex. App. 358. Cider, which is an alcoholic beverage, cannot be sold in a State whose statute prohibits the sale of alcohol or fermented liquors. Eureka Vin. Co. v. Gazette Print. Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 570. Whether "peach cider" is an intoxicating beverage, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury under proper instructions. Topeka v. Zufall (Kan.) 1 L. R. A. 387.

yeis of the liquor, and he testifies that one portion thereof contained "2.42 per cent of alcohol by weight, and 8.03 per cent by volume; and the other portion contained 2.58 per cent by weight, and 8.23 per cent by volume." The witness, in response to questions asked him, testified as follows:

"Now what do you say to this . . . being an intoxicating liquor?"

"I do not think it would intoxicate the average drinker."

"Well, what do you say in regard to people who are not in the habit of using it?"

"I think it would intoxicate the larger portion."

"What per cent—how many out of a hundred—would become intoxicated on these goods that contain  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of alcohol?"

"I think a fair proportion of them would."

"Of men generally?"

"Yes sir; if they would take a fairly large quantity."

"What do you say as to the  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent beverages producing the second effect of intoxication on the ordinary man?"

"I think it would produce that effect."

"On all who use it?"

"Nearly all."

The court must have found, under the foregoing evidence, that the liquors were not intoxicating. This finding has the force and effect of a verdict of a jury, and cannot be disturbed if more than one conclusion can be fairly drawn from the evidence.

Conceding the competency of the evidence as to the intoxicating character of the liquor, if the question to be determined rested alone on such evidence, we are disposed to think, under the settled rule prevailing in this court, it would be doubtful whether we could disturb such finding. We do not feel called on to determine such question. The statute provides that the words "intoxicating liquors," as used therein, "shall be construed to mean alcohol, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and all intoxicating liquors whatever."

Alcohol is therefore an intoxicating liquor, regardless of the fact that the quantity drunk at any one time would not have that effect. It is immaterial, in a statutory sense, what effect alcohol may have on the human system; it is an intoxicating liquor. However much it may be diluted, it must remain an intoxicant when used as a beverage. That is to say, the statute provides that alcohol is an intoxicant whenever and however used as a beverage; and no matter how it may be diluted or disguised, it so remains, simply because the statute so declares. The liquor in question contained alcohol, and therefore it, as a matter of law, was intoxicating. State v. Yager, 72 Iowa, 421, supports this view.

It further follows that the court erred in finding as it did, and in rendering judgment for the defendant.

Reversed.

Robinson, J., assents to the conclusion reached, but does not agree to all the grounds upon which it is based.

v.

BREWSTER, Resp.

1. Where, upon a bona fide sale of seed wheat, to be sown on the land of the purchaser, the amount of wheat specified in the seed grain note or contract given therefor was contained in a particular bin containing a larger quantity, all of the same quality and value, out of which it was agreed the purchaser was then and there entitled to take away the number of bushels purchased,—held, sufficient evidence of a sale and delivery of the wheat at the date of the note as between the maker and payee. Weighing or measuring is not absolutely essential to a completed sale, except when necessary to define the subject matter.

2. And where the seed grain described in such note or contract is actually and in good faith sold and furnished to the maker of the note for seeding purposes, pursuant to the agreement of the parties, and a portion of the amount received is subsequently sold or otherwise appropriated by him, and not sown upon the land designated, that fact will not defeat the lien of the seller, under the statute, for the price of that portion of such seed grain actually sown upon the land, upon the crop grown therefrom.

3. The statute authorizes the holder of a seed grain note, upon condition broken, to take possession of the crop raised from the seed for which it is given, and the holder thereof may in such

The seed grain note described in the complaint, upon which a recovery is sought by the plaintiff, contains the requisite statutory provisions, and was filed in the proper office on the day of its date. Lovejoy, the maker of it, occupied the premises therein described under a lease from the owner, one Toombs, and bought the wheat to sow thereon. He actually and in good faith purchased the 200 bushels mentioned, at seventy-five cents per bushel; and the evidence tends to show that he sowed 120 bushels of the same upon the land upon which the crop in dispute was raised, and of the balance he exchanged, with plaintiff's consent, sixty or seventy bushels with defendant for other seed wheat of a different kind, which it was expected would ripen earlier, and which was also sown; and the rest was otherwise used by him. Plaintiff recovered a verdict for $90 and interest in this action, which is in form for a conversion of the wheat grown on the land from the seed so purchased, and appeals from the order setting it aside.

1. Lovejoy sowed the wheat and caused it to be harvested. After it was stacked, Toombs took possession of it under the stipulation in his lease giving him a lien on the crops raised on the land, caused the same to be sold, and it was bid off by the defendant, and was thereafter threshed and put into Toombs' granary. Both Toombs and the defendant denied the plaintiff's right to the wheat or the proceeds, and their testimony shows that they appropriated the same with full knowledge of plaintiff's rights and claims, and assert a prior and superior claim of title thereto under the foreclosure, which is set up as an affirmative defense in the answer; and it sufficiently appears that a demand by plaintiff would have been unavailing, though he swears that he made it. Under the statute the plaintiff was authorized to take possession of the grain upon which the lien was given for the purpose of enforcing the same, and we think the evidence in the case amply sufficient to show a conversion of the same by defendant.

2. There is also evidence tending to show that Toombs waived his lien in favor of the plaintiff before the wheat was sold and delivered to Lovejoy, and it is not claimed that Brewster, who bought the wheat as a favor to Toombs, occupied any better position than the latter. Toombs admits that he asked the plaintiff about seed wheat for Lovejoy, and informed him that he had rented him his farm, and he helped haul the wheat away, knowing it was furnished for seed; and the plaintiff testifies that Toombs requested him to let Lovejoy have the wheat, and represented that the latter could give him a first lien on the crop, and that he let Lovejoy have the wheat with the understanding that his lien for the seed was first. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff's lien was first if the seed was actually sown, and to this no exception was taken by the defendant's counsel, and the rejected instructions asked by them did not embrace the same proposition. It is unnecessary to decide in this case, therefore, the question whether the lien for seed grain takes precedence of a provision in a lease in the nature of a mortgage upon the crops, to be subsequently raised on the land, made before the purchase of the seed.

3. The principal questions, however, argued in this court, and those upon which the case turned in the court below on the motion for a new trial, are whether there was a compliance with the statute as respects the delivery of the seed wheat to Lovejoy, and the use thereof in seeding, so as to give effect to the seed grain note as a lien on the crop. It is claimed that the seed was not furnished until after the execution of the note, because the 200 bushels therein described were a part of a larger quantity stored in the same bin, and was not separated or hauled away at the time.

It is held in Kelly v. Seely, 27 Minn. 388, that the contract must be executed, and the sale completed, at the time the note is given. We have no doubt that upon the evidence, and for the purposes of the contract, the sale in this case must be deemed completed at the time of the execution of the note, and that, as between the parties, at least, the title passed. The transaction appears to have been bona fide, and the evidence, which was uncontradicted, tended to prove that the wheat in the bin of which the 200 bushels was a part was all of the same kind, and Lovejoy had the same right to take that amount from the bin, and remove it, as he would if it had been separated. He was given permission to haul it away by the load and the plaintiff was in the mean time to be the bailee of the same. It was unnecessary to put the parties to the extra trouble of handling it twice in the granary, or to remove it all in one day. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that it was the intention of the parties that the title should presently pass; and in such cases it is a question of intention to be gathered from the circumstances. Weighing or measuring is not absolutely essential to a complete sale, except when necessary in order to define the subject matter. Winslow v. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14.

It might be more conclusive or satisfactory, but, if the evidence was sufficient to show the intention of the parties, and the vendee had the absolute right to take away the amount sold at the time, it is sufficient. Burrows v. Whitaker, 71 N. Y. 291; Hatch v. Standard Oil Co. 100 U. S. 124 (35 L. ed. 554).

Accordingly, though the authorities are not uniform, we think the rule is quite well established that, upon a sale of a specific quantity of grain, its separation from a mass, indistinguishable as to kind, quality or value, of which it is a part, is not necessary to pass the title, where the intention to do so is otherwise made manifest. Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 330; Russell v. Carrington, 42 N. Y. 122; Loddell v. Stowell, 51 N. Y. 75; Chapman v. Shepard, 39 Conn. 418; Hurf v. Hires, 40 N. J. L. 581-586; Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 244; 6 Am. Law. Rev. 450-458; 2 Schouler, Pera. Prop. § 258; 1 Benj. Sales, Corbin's notes, § 395, etc.

It was competent for the parties to make themselves tenants in common of the wheat in a particular bin by the sale of a part, and in such case the plaintiff might sever and take his own at any time. His legal rights were as well defined and complete as if his portion had been measured out and placed in a separate bin on plaintiff's premises, and in his care. Channon v. Lusk, 2 Lana. 211.

Of course the rule above stated would not apply where the basis for it is wanting; that is to say, except where the mass is ascertained, and is of uniform quality and value.

4. It is also contended that the exchange of a portion of the 200 bushels by the vendee, and his failure to sow the amount named in the note, were fatal to his lien under the rule established in Kelly v. Seely, supra.

But in that case the transaction appeared to be fraudulent. The note did not express the amount delivered or sold, as the statute required, and "None was to be furnished or received until after the execution of the note, and nearly half of it (at least) was not furnished or received at all. The amount of wheat stated in the note was then never furnished or received, and consequently the note does not state the amount furnished or received."

But that is not this case. Here the sale was made and note given in good faith. The note does express the amount sold and received, and there was, as we have seen, a sufficient delivery of the grain at the time the note was given. Of course, the vendor ran the risk of a subsequent diversion of it to other purposes. But the fact that by mutual agreement a part of it was exchanged for other seed wheat, which took the place pro tanto of the amount exchanged therefor, did not render the contract of no effect.

As the plaintiff on this appeal only claims a lien upon the product of the identical wheat delivered and sown, we are not called upon to decide the question whether his lien also extended to the crop raised from the wheat substituted for that furnished by him. We are satisfied, however, that the mere fact that the vendee failed to sow the entire quantity purchased did not deprive plaintiff of his lien upon the crop grown from that portion of seed sold and actually sown. Otherwise, miscalculation as to the amount needed, or destruction or waste of some of the seed furnished, might destroy the security for the whole.

This case does not fall within the rule in Kelly v. Seely, as properly understood and applied; and the verdict is amply supported by the evidence.

The order granting a new trial is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions to render judgment for plaintiff upon the verdict.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

NEW YORK & CHICAGO GRAIN &
STOCK EXCHANGE, Appt.,

CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE et al.

(.....III.....)

1. The doctrine that when private property is devoted to a public use and becomes affected with a public interest it ceases to be jure privati only and is subject to public regulation, applies to the furnishing of market reports to the public by the Chicago Board of Trade.
2. The Chicago Board of Trade cannot after having so conducted its affairs for a long term of years as to create a standard market for agricultural products, and in concert with telegraph companies built up a system for the instantaneous and continuous indication of that market, until such system has become impressed with a public interest, be allowed to discriminate between persons, and say that one shall and another shall not receive the market reports, when all are equally willing to conform to reasonable rules on the subject and pay for the information.
3. Hence, held, that the Chicago Board of Trade, and the telegraph companies acting in connection with it, have no right to refuse to furnish the New York & Chicago Grain & Stock Exchange, an Illinois corporation organized for buying and selling grain, with the regular telegraphic "ticker" market quotations—it appearing that such Exchange was willing to conform to the regulations of the Board of Trade in reference to furnishing such quotations, and to pay for the same, and that it was not engaged in a gambling or "bucket shop" business.

APPPEAL by plaintiff, from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court of Cook 3 L. R. A.

County, dismissing a bill for an injunction. Reversed.

The bill was filed by the New York & Chicago Grain & Stock Exchange against the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, the Western Union Telegraph Company, and the Gold & Stock Telegraph Company, to restrain the defendants from removing telegraphic instruments and severing the wire connecting plaintiff's place of business with the "ticker" circuit, by which market quotations were transmitted.

The facts, and questions presented, are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bisbee, Ahrens & Decker, for appellant:

Whenever private property of whatever kind is used in such a manner as that the public interest is affected by it, then reflexively the property or franchise or whatever it may be, is also affected with a public interest and ceases to be jure privati.

Hale, De Portibus Maris; Munn v. Ill. 94 U. S. 113 (24 L. ed. 77); Hockett v. State, 2 West. Rep. 764, 105 Ind. 250; State v. Nebraska Teleph. Co. 17 Neb. 126; Pensacola Teleph. Co. v. St. Louis etc. R. Co. 10 1st ed. Rep. 210, 869.

The information and news of the changes and fluctuation of the market as gathered by the Board of Trade is itself a species of property (Kiernan v. Manhattan Quotation Teleph. Co. 50 How. Pr. 194), and, however transferred by the Board of Trade to the telegraph company, and however transmitted by the tel-ograph company, is property which from its very nature the public has an interest in.

Having procured this market information by whatever means, and having set it in motion over their circuits throughout the country, the defendant telegraph companies cannot depart from the objects and purposes of their own incorporation so far as to exercise the dangerous right of discriminating and monopolizing under any circumstances whatever. The general rule in regard to all such corporations is that they cannot discriminate against anybody, and devices that may be adopted to justify or protect or cover such an exercise of authority should be construed by courts as void, being against public policy.

Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 743; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346.

People v. Chicago Board of Trade, 45 Ill. 112, 80 Ill. 134; Pitcher v. Chicago Board of Trade, 11 West. Rep. 38, 121 Ill. 412.

Under the rules of the Board of Trade, the market news and statistics are collected and compiled at the expense of the members and are their private property in their associated capacity.

Kiernan v. Manhattan Quotation Teleg. Co. 50 How. Pr. 194.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118 (24 L. ed. 77), relied on by appellant, simply reaffirmed the principle that where property is voluntarily devoted by its owner to such a public use that it "becomes affected with a public interest," the legislative power of the State may regulate this public use—not destroy the property itself, nor compel its owner to part with it, or with any interest in it—which principle bears no analogy to the question in this cause as appears from the opinion of Chief Justice Waite, where it is said: "Here is no attempt to compel these owners to grant to the public an interest in their property, but declare their obligations if they use it in this particular manner." See also opinion of Chief Justice Breen, in the same case in this court—Munn v. People, 69 Ill. 89.

That the Board of Trade has the legal right to control its own market news and statistics, gathered and compiled at its own cost and expense from funds contributed by its members; and to determine what telegraphic dispatches touching the same it will send directly from the floor of its exchange during business hours; and to whom they shall be sent; or whether it will send any such dispatches whatever, see—

Metropolitan Grain & Stock Exchange v. Chicago Board of Trade, 15 Fed. Rep. 847; Morris Grain & Stock Exchange v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 23; Bryant v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 826.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The objects of the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago are: "to maintain a commercial exchange, and to promote uniformity in the customs and usages of merchants; to inculcate principles of justice and equity in trade; to facilitate the speedy adjustment of business disputes; to acquire and to disseminate valuable commercial and economical information; and generally to secure to its members the benefits of co-operation in the furtherance of their legitimate pursuits."

The association existed for some years prior to the 18th day of February, 1869, as a mere voluntary and unincorporated society of persons engaged in the grain, produce and commission business; and at that date it was incorporated by a special Act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, and was given power and authority to do and carry on business such as is usual in the management of boards of trade or chambers of commerce, and the specific powers enumerated in the Act of incorporation. Among the express powers delegated was authority "to establish such rules, regulations and by-laws for the management of their business and the mode in which it shall be transacted as they may think proper."

The growth and progress of the association in commercial influence has been commensurate with that of the city in which it is located. The initiation fee for admission to it is $10,000; and it has some two thousand members. It maintains an exchange hall, upon the floors of which, between certain prescribed hours of each business day, the business of its members is transacted. It has been said, and with much show of reason, that the floors of this exchange hall stand in the gateway of commerce. The members of the board meet thereon to buy and sell; their trading is by open à la cote bidding, and when a purchase and sale is made memorandums thereof are taken by both parties to the transaction.

Four fifths of the grain and provisions produced in the States and Territories of the Northwest are bought and sold in this market, and the business there done is so vast in its proportions that it fixes the market prices of grain, breadstuffs and meats for the extensive territory that is tributary to Chicago, and seriously affects and to a considerable extent controls the values of the necessities of life throughout the United States and the civilized world.

For many years prior to August, 1883, the Board of Trade permitted the Western Union Telegraph Company, by its agents and servants in that behalf, to occupy and use its exchange hall, and there collect and transmit, without any restrictions whatever, reports on the dealings, fluctuations and changes of the market on the board. This information was sent by telegraph throughout the country, and delivered without discrimination to all persons who desired and would pay for the same. There were numerous customers of this commercial news department of the business of the telegraph company, and they were scattered over the land, wherever the business of buying and selling grain and provisions was followed. The Western Union Telegraph Company then had and still has a lease upon and control of the Gold & Stock Telegraph Company, which latter corporation, in turn, had and has a monopoly of the telegraphic instruments known as "tickers."

Telegraphic circuits were established by the Western Union Telegraph Company in Chicago and in other principal cities; and by means of Morse instruments and these tickers market information passed to every office and place of business connected by wire with one of these circuits, and was automatically registered, so that every merchant or dealer provided with these instrumentalities, wherever his place of business might be, was instantaneously and from minute to minute and from hour to hour, during the business sessions of the Board of Trade, informed of all fluctuations and changes in the market prices of grain and other products as they occurred.

On the 29th of August, 1883, the Board of Trade amended its standing rules by adopting what is known as section 20 of Rule 4, which is as follows:

"The board of directors shall provide an efficient corps of market reporters whose duty it shall be, under such regulations as may be prescribed for their government, to ascertain the current market prices of such commodities as are dealt in by members of the association during the hours for trading prescribed by these rules, the reporting of which may be desired by any considerable number of correspondents, and also all changes which may occur in the same from time to time; such reports to be frequently communicated by telegraph to such approved correspondents in the City of Chicago, or elsewhere, as may desire the same and are willing to pay necessary charges for compiling and transmitting them by telegraph under such arrangements as may be made by the board of directors with any telegraph company for the performance of the service of transmission. The forwarding of such reports to any particular individual, firm or corporation shall be only on the condition that it is an accommodation service in which the Board of Trade assumes no responsibility beyond reasonable care in their compilation, and one that may be performed at the pleasure of the board, or if performed may be discontinued or withheld with or without previous notice. Any individual, firm or corporation, before being supplied with the reports herein provided for, shall make an application for the same in such form or manner as may be authorized by the board of directors, or by a committee appointed by it for that purpose before any reports are forwarded to the applicants. A list of all correspondents to whom such reports are sent shall be kept on file in the office of the secretary of the board, and shall be subject to the inspection of any member desiring to do so."

Since the adoption of this rule, the board, under a contract or arrangement with the Western Union Telegraph Company, has employed a corps of market reporters who collect and transmit from the floor of the exchange, over a wire owned by it, the occurrences on the floor of the exchange, showing the fluctuations and changes of the market right along, just as they transpire, during the day, to the central office of the said telegraph company. From this office such information is immediately retransmitted over the ticker circuits in the city, and over telegraph wires, to different points.

The expense to the board of its corps of market reporters is $10,000 a year, and the telegraph company pays to the board $750 a month, making $9,000 per annum for the market quotations; and the telegraph company collects compensation from the persons receiving the dispatches or connected with the ticker circuits.

The board furnishes to the telegraph company, from day to day, a list of the names of the approved correspondents, some 1800 or 1400 in number, to whom and to whom only the market reports are to be transmitted, and they are sent to these designated parties only. The theory of the Board of Trade and of the telegraph companies is that this commercial information, starting with the opening of business in the morning and giving the transactions on the floors of the exchange and the fluctuations and changes in the market from minute to minute and hour to hour until the close of the business day, is a private telegraphic message sent by the board to each of the persons designated in the list furnished in the morning; and on this theory the name of an officer of the board is added to the information collected and sent to the telegraph company, as evidence that the matter which has been sent in sections during the day is a telegraphic dispatch sent by authority of the Board of Trade as its own private message.

The appellant corporation, the New York & Chicago Grain & Stock Exchange, is organized under the Laws of the State of Illinois for the purpose of doing business in buying and selling grain on commission, and on the 29th of April, 1885, its place of business was at No. 140 Monroe Street, Chicago; and it had in use at said place, in its business of buying and selling grain on commission, one Morse instrument and two tickers, which were connected with the wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and by means of which the market information in relation to the changes and fluctuations of the market on the Board of Trade of Chicago was transmitted and delivered to it instantaneously and continuously during business hours; and which information it was using in and about its business.

At and before the time of the filing of the bill of complaint herein, the appellant, thus being in receipt of the market information in respect to the transactions on the board of trade, demanded the continuance of such information and offered to pay for the same and submit to all reasonable requirements in relation thereto. Appellees, however, insisted upon their right to remove the telegraphic instruments and sever the wire connecting its place of business with the ticker circuit. They threatened and were about to deprive appellant of the use of the wire and instruments and withhold from it the market reports; and thereupon appellant exhibited this bill of complaint, and upon the ground that the contemplated conduct and proceedings of appellees, the board of trade and said telegraph companies, would be disastrous to its business and would produce irreparable injury and damage, obtained a preliminary injunction in the Circuit Court of Cook County.

At a subsequent term of the court the cause was heard on bill, answers, replications and proofs; and the court found that appellant was not entitled to the relief prayed for in its bill, and said bill was dismissed for want of equity, and a decree rendered against appellant for costs. This finding and decree was afterward affirmed in the Appellate Court of the First District; and the cause is now here on appeal from the judgment of the latter court.

The contention of the Board of Trade is that it is strictly a private corporation, and that both the individual and aggregate business of its members is essentially private business, and that the market news and statistics collected and compiled at the expense of the association are the private property of the association, and that it has a legal right to control such market news and statistics, and determine what telegraphic dispatches touching the same it will send directly from the floor of its exchange during business hours, and to whom they shall be sent, or whether it will send any such dispatches whatever.

The Board of Trade is a private corporation, and it was incorporated for the purpose of affording facilities to its members in doing business with each other. In their transactions upon the floors of the exchange they deal as principals with each other, but in respect to the outside world they are brokers and commission merchants for the producers, consumers, shippers and merchants whom they represent. For many years the board has so used its franchises, and its members have so conducted their business, as that it has become of vast commercial influence and fixes the market values of grain and agricultural products for a large territory, and the fluctuations in prices upon its floors powerfully affect the market prices of the necessities of life throughout the country and the world.

The great power and influence which the board possesses in dictating market values is owing to the vast aggregation of products which are drawn to its portals for a market and are bought and sold upon its floors, and which pay tribute and toll, in the shape of commissions, to its members. The great bulk of this business, though in form and as between the members the mere private and individual dealings of such members, is in reality the business of the numerous producers, consumers, merchants and shippers for and on behalf of whom these members deal. A potential factor in attracting this accumulation of business to the halls of the exchange, and in vesting the board with this power to regulate and determine the market prices of grain and provisions, is the fact that many years ago the board admitted and invited the telegraph companies, which are quasi public corporations, to the floors of the exchange, and permitted and encouraged them to gather market quotations, showing the changes and fluctuations in the prices of the various products as they occurred, and send instantaneous information from the floors of the board, by means of telegraph lines and instruments, to all the principal towns and cities, and by means of ticker circuits to the places of business of all persons desirous of such information; which information was furnished to all persons and corporations without discrimination who were willing to receive and pay for the same.

In this way the business of the country in buying and selling agricultural products has been brought under the control of the market values for such products as fixed and determined on the Board of Trade; and the business of dealing in such products has been brought to conform to the method of receiving instantaneous and continuous market reports inaugurated and for years persisted in by the Board of Trade and the telegraph companies.

This market news is a species of property; and if the statistics with reference to the individual business of the members of the association and the aggregate business of its members had from the start been gathered and compiled at the expense of its members and for their sole use, it may be it would have been strictly private property held in trust by the board for the use and benefit of such members and wholly free from any public interest therein. But the board did not so exercise its franchises and so conduct its business, but admitted the telegraph companies to the floor of its exchange and permitted and encouraged them from day to day and year after year to gather these statistics of the dealings on the board and telegraph them immediately as they were made, throughout the land to whomsoever would pay for such information until the business of the country had adapted itself to these means and appliances, and the point was reached when the quotations upon the board were puissant to determine the market values of the products of the country; and all persons dealing in such products could not without the knowledge and benefit of these immediate quotations intelligently and safely so deal.

The facts that the Board of Trade is a private corporation and that the dealings between its members are private business, such as is transacted between dry goods, grocery and commission merchants, and that the statistics of these dealings collected as we have stated are private property, are not conclusive that such statistics are not charged with a public interest and that there is no duty due the public in respect thereto.

In the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118 [34 L. ed. 77], the Supreme Court of the United States recognized and followed the doctrine that when private property is devoted to a public use and becomes affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only, and is subject to public regulation. The court there said: "Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created."

Assuming that these market quotations and reports are property, and the private property of the Board of Trade, yet if they have been so used by the board and by the telegraph companies with the knowledge and consent of the board as to become affected with a public interest, then they are subject to such public regulation by the Legislature and the courts as is necessary to prevent injury to such public interest.

The doctrine in question has application both to the property of individuals and of corporations, and it is therefore immaterial that any such corporation may be a mere private corporation. If the interest is public, then it is necessarily to all alike, common to all and upon equal terms. The doctrine, as applied to the matter of these quotations, would forbid that a monopoly should be made of them by furnishing them to some and refusing them to others who are equally willing to pay for them and to be governed by all reasonable rules and regulations, and would prevent the Board of Trade or the telegraph companies from unjustly discriminating in respect to the parties who will be allowed to receive them.

The market information here involved is not collected by the board merely for the use of the members of the association. For many years it was gathered, disseminated by the telegraph companies, and sent to all alike who would pay for it, wholly regardless of any question of membership in the board.

The change that has been made by section 20 of Rule 4, in respect to this commercial news department, seems to be more colorable than substantial, and appears to be intended merely to enable the board to make a monopoly of such news.

At first the telegraph companies by their paid agents gathered the statistics and telegraphed them from the floors of the exchange. Now, the board appoints and pays the agents who collect the statistics and transmit them to the central telegraph office of the Western Union Telegraph Company, from whence they they are distributed to the approved correspondents; but nine tenths of the expense of this service of collecting the market reports is refunded to the board by the telegraph company.

The question here is not one of withholding altogether instantaneous quotations and information respecting the prices at which grain and provisions are being sold upon the market of the exchange, nor one of discriminating between its own members and such persons as are not members in giving such information. Before the board itself assumed to control the sending of this news, no discrimination was made in distributing it between those who were and those who were not members of the board; and since the change was made a very large proportion of the approved correspondents are not members, and the rule contemplates that persons other than members should be such correspondents.

The question is, Can the board so conduct its affairs for a long term of years as to create a standard market for agricultural products, and, acting in concert or combination with the telegraph companies, build upon a great system for the instantaneous and continuous indication of that market and its fluctuations, until the public and all persons dealing in such products conform their business to this system, and until by the usage and custom of merchants, thus advanced by the methods adopted by the board and telegraph companies, such instantaneous quotations become necessary to the successful and safe transaction of business, and until such system has become impressed and affected with a public interest, and then be allowed to discriminate between persons and parties, and, where all alike are willing to conform to reasonable rules and requirements and pay for the information desired, say that one shall and another shall not have such information.

If the board has such right, and these corporations are lawfully permitted so to do, then they have the power to create monopolies and dictate who shall deal in the agricultural products of the country, and at will impoverish or enrich merchants, shippers and producers.

It is vain to say that the ordinary newspaper reports of the state of the market are all that are necessary to legitimate dealers in grain and provisions; the business of the country has outgrown such condition and this very largely through the methods adopted and introduced by appellees themselves. The fact that fourteen hundred persons, firms and corporations are in receipt of these instantaneous market reports and are willing to pay therefor the large fees and charges demanded of them for the receipt of the same, is proof positive that a business advantage is gained by immediate knowledge of the condition of the market. The persistent efforts of the Board of Trade itself to control these market reports are an indication of their estimate of their value.

There is no question involved in this case of gambling contracts or of so called "bucket shops." There is no evidence in the record tending to show that appellant is engaged in a gambling business or dealing in puts and calls, and it is admitted that the business it is doing is not in violation of law.

We think the case made by the bill of complaint and the proofs brings it within the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Munn v. Illinois, supra; and in our opinion it was error in the circuit court to dismiss the bill for want of equity and error in the appellate court to affirm the decree of dismissal. The judgment of the Appellate Court and the decree of the Circuit Court are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to enter a decree as prayed for in the bill.

ERROR to the Quarter Sessions of Warren County, to review a judgment for the defendant, on a verdict directed by the court, on the trial of an indictment for selling "vinous, spirituous, malt and brewed liquors, and various admixtures thereof," without a license. Reversed.

The indictment was under the Act of May 18, 1887 (Pub. Laws, 108) which makes it unlawful "to keep or maintain any house, room or place, hotel, inn or tavern, where any vinous, spirituous, malt or brewed liquors, or any admixtures thereof, are sold by retail, except a license shall have been previously obtained," and imposes a penalty upon "any person who shall hereafter be convicted of selling or offering for sale any vinous, spirituous, malt or brewed liquors or any admixture thereof, without a license."

Messrs. J. W. Dunkle, Dist. Atty., Geo. H. Higgins, Ex-Dist. Atty., and D. I. Ball, for the Commonwealth, plaintiff in error:

Under such a law as this of 1887, an indictment charging the sale, without a license, of vinous, spirituous, malt and brewed liquors would undoubtedly be sustained and a conviction warranted, by proof of a sale of either whisky, brandy, gin, ale, beer or wine.

State v. American Foreite Powder Mfg. Co. 9 Cent. Rep. 496, 50 N. J. L. 75.

It is the duty of the court to say, as matter of law, whether a particular liquor of well known use and character, as, for instance, whisky or beer, is within or without the statute; but in respect to "compounds, preparations in which the alcoholic stimulant is present, which are not of established name and character, and which may be . . . mere substitutes for the usual intoxicating beverages . . . the question is one of fact and must be referred to a jury."

Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 751, 87 Am. Rep. 284.

Messrs. George N. Frazine and James W. Wiggins for defendant in error:

In the construction of a penal statute words of doubtful import should be construed not in a comprehensive, but in a restricted, sense—a popular and common sense, not a scientific, technical or peculiar one.

Dunham v. Kirkpatrick, 101 Pa. 86; Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Moore, 2 Whart. 477; Gibson v. Tyson, 5 Watts, 84; Robertson v. French, 4 East, 185; 1 Bl. Com. *59.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether cider is a vinous or spirituous liquor. It certainly is not malt or brewed; and as the Act of 1887, under which the indictment in this case is framed, defines only three or four kinds of liquor as those which require a license to validate their sale, the only inquiry arising is whether cider, which the defendant did sell, is a vinous or spirituous liquor.

The learned court below charged the jury that there was no evidence that it was intoxicating, or that it had an intoxicating effect, and therefore the defendant could not be convicted. Without stopping to refine upon the meaning of the word intoxicating, or the degree of alcoholic admixture which is necessary to render any liquor intoxicating, it is only necessary to say that the intoxicating quality is not the one which is prohibited by the Act; and hence an issue upon that question does not arise under the indictment. If, however, any liquor which is sold without license is either vinous or spirituous it comes within the prohibition of the Act. But the question whether cider is vinous or spirituous is not a question of law to be decided by the court, but a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

Of course if there is no evidence on the trial that a liquor is either vinous or spirituous, malt or brewed, it would be the duty of the court to say so to the jury and direct an acquittal for that reason. But if there is evidence on that subject, more than a scintilla, it is for the jury, and not for the court, to decide upon it.

Cider is defined by Worcester to be: "A fermented liquor made from the juice of apples; formerly used for all kinds of strong liquors except wine," and by Webster: "A drink made from the juice of apples. (Note.) The word was formerly used to signify the juice of other fruits and other kinds of strong liquor, except wine, but it is now appropriated to the juice of apples before and after fermentation."

Certainly in common acceptation cider is not understood to be either a vinous or a spirituous beverage; yet when fermented it doubtless contains a percentage of alcohol sufficient to bring it within the fair meaning of the term vinous; and although not the product of distillation, it may, when mixed with spirituous liquor, and sold in that condition under the name of cider, be regarded as "spirituous" within the meaning of the prohibition.

The evidence on the trial was very weak indeed. No skilled person having knowledge of the chemical composition of cider was examined, and there was no direct evidence as to whether the liquor sold as cider was vinous or spirituous. There was not even any direct evidence whether the cider sold by the defendant was fermented, but there was some testimony that persons using it felt the effects of it, the same as if they had been drinking whisky or beer. We think there was evidence sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether the cider sold by the defendant was a vinous or spirituous liquor.

We attach no importance to the argument adduced from a consideration of other Acts of Assembly. This is a criminal statute and must be strictly construed. If the article sold was a vinous or spirituous liquor, the defendant was guilty; if not, he was innocent, and should be acquitted; but whether it was or not was a question for the jury, and not for the court.

We do not mean to intimate that the mere unfermented juice of the apple is in any circumstances to be regarded either a vinous or spirituous liquor; but we do not know and cannot say, as matter of law, that its character may not be so changed by fermentation as to bring it within the meaning of the term vinous. Of course an admixture with spirits might render the compound spirituous.

Judgment reversed, and new venire awarded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MONTROSE PICKLE CO., Appt.,
v.
DODSON & HILLS MFG. CO. et al.

(.....Iowa.....)

Garnishment process served within the State upon a resident common carrier will not reach property not actually within the State but in course of transportation by the carrier to a point without the State.

(December 18, 1883.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Keokuk Superior Court (Bank, J.), discharging a garnishee. Affirmed.

Statement by Rothrock, J.:

This is an action upon an account for merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the Dodson & Hills Manufacturing Company, defendant. An attachment was issued, upon the ground that the defendant was a nonresident of the State; and the Diamond Jo Line of steamers, a corporation, was garnished in the action, upon the claim or supposition that it had property in its possession, belonging to the defendant, which was liable to attachment. The garnishee answered, denying that it had any property in its custody subject to the writ.

Issue was taken upon the answer of the garnishee, and a trial was had by the court, and a judgment was rendered discharging the garnishee. Plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Anderson & Davis for appellant.

Messrs. Craig, McCrary & Craig for appellees.

Rothrock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time the action was commenced the plaintiff was a resident of this State. The defendant was a nonresident of the State, and a resident of the State of Missouri. Service of the original notice, and of the notice of garnishment, was made personally on the defendant in St. Louis, in that State. The defendant made no appearance in the action, and a default was entered against it, and what appears to have been a personal judgment was rendered upon the default.

It is not important to determine the effect of the judgment rendered upon service of the original notice out of the State. It is not a material question in the case.

The Diamond Jo Line of steamers is an Iowa corporation, with its principal place of business at the City of Dubuque. It is a common carrier of freight and passengers upon steamers to and from all points on the Mississippi River between St. Paul, Minn., and St. Louis, Mo. On the 30th day of September, 1887, said steamer company received on board of one of its boats at Alexandria, Mo., some 500 or 600 barrels of pickles, for transportation to St. Louis. The property was shipped by the Dodson & Hills Manufacturing Company, at Alexandria, to the Dodson & Hills Manufacturing Company at St. Louis. The pickles were loaded on the steamer on the forenoon of that day. On the same day, and while the steamer, with the property in dispute on board, was on its way down the river to its destination, the garnishment notice was served on the steamer company at Dubuque, and one of its agents at Keokuk.

The question to be determined is whether the property was liable to attachment by garnishment. The superior court held that the garnishee was not liable, because the property was not within the jurisdiction of that court; that the defendant's title thereto was not doubtful; that it was capable of manual delivery, and, if within the jurisdiction of the court, it should have been levied upon and taken into custody by the officer executing the writ of attachment; and that it was not the subject of garnishment. This is the sole question presented to this court for determination.

The ground of the attachment was that the defendant was a nonresident of this State. An attachment issued upon this ground avails nothing, unless the defendant has property or debts owing to him within this State. Without such property or debts, there could be no service of the attachment, either by actual levy or by the process of garnishment. It is not claimed by appellant that any jurisdiction of the property could be obtained by seizing it outside the State. The contention is that, as the garnishee is a resident of the State, the situs or location of the property in question must be held to be in this State. This rule has been held to apply to debts owing by the garnishee to the defendant. Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 346.

That was a case of garnishment of the wages of a railroad employé. The garnishee was held to be a resident of this State, and there was no contract that the wages due were to be paid in the State of Nebraska, where the employé resided and the garnishee had its principal place of business. It appears to us that the right to garnish the steamer company, and hold it for the value of the property in question in this case, presents a very different question. The law of attachment in this State does not contemplate that property not actually within the State, but located in another State, shall be the subject of garnishment. We need not cite the various sections of the statute upon the subject of attachment and garnishment. Its whole scope and tenor leads to the conclusion that the claim made by counsel for appellant cannot be sustained.

NOTE.—Garnishment on property in transit, ineffectual. Garnishment is ineffectual to bind property in the hands of an agent or servant (Fowler v. Pittsburgh etc. R. Co. 35 Pa. 22); or when held by a mere bailee, for his possession is that of the owner. Hall v. Filter Mfg. Co. 10 Phila. 370. In such cases the property should be attached by direct seizure. Id.; Wade, Attachm. 325. Where a public carrier is summoned as garnishee in respect to goods held for transportation in an action against the consignor the presumption is that they are the property of the consignee; hence the carrier should not be held as garnishee. Bingham v. Lamping, 28 Pa. 340. See Ill. Cent. R. Co. v. Cobb, 48 Ill. 402; and compare Walker v. Detroit etc. R. Co. 49 Mich. 440. It is otherwise held in a case of money in the hands of an express company. Adams v. Scott, 104 Mass. 184.

The argument of the appellant is grounded upon the thought that when the garnishment notice is served the relation of debtor and creditor at once arises between the garnishee and the defendant. It is true the statute provides that a judgment may be rendered against the garnishee if he does not deliver the property to the sheriff. This is a right given to the garnishee. He may at any time, after answer, exonerate himself by placing the property at the disposal of the sheriff. Code, § 2986.

If property in a distant State may be reached by process of garnishment, in order to avail himself of this right the garnishee must transport the property to the sheriff holding the writ, and deliver it to him. The garnishee cannot be deprived of this right; and as he is an innocent party, he cannot be compelled to bring the property within the jurisdiction of the court.

The facts in this case are as good an illustration of the fallacy of this claim as can be given. The steamer company had taken this property upon one of its boats, and was under way, bound under its contract of affreightment to deliver the same at St. Louis. To avail itself of its right under the above statute, it would be required to ship the goods back to Keokuk, make its answer, and deliver the property to the sheriff. The law imposes no such obligation upon a garnishee; and yet, under the claim made by appellant, the garnishee must either do this or become the debtor of the defendant for the value of the property. The law puts no such hardship upon a garnishee. It is very different where a debt is garnished. It is a debt first and last. In such case the process of the law does not practically compel the garnishee to become a debtor against his consent.

This identical question was determined by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in the case of Bates v. Chicago Railway Company, 60 Wis. 296. In an elaborate opinion, in which many of the authorities cited by counsel in this case are reviewed, it was held that personal property under the control of the garnishee, but situated out of the State where suit is brought, cannot be reached by the process of garnishment. In that case, as in this, the property was in actual transit, and out of the State, when the garnishment notice was served. We do not think it necessary to do more than refer to that case, and the authorities therein cited. It appears to us in its reasoning to be eminently sound, and that no other conclusion could have been fairly reached; and the rule adopted has peculiar force when applied to an attempt to garnish a common carrier while transporting goods outside the State where the suit is commenced.

As was said by Chief Justice Breese in Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Cobb, 48 Ill. 402: "When the property has left the county, and is in transit to a distant point, though on the same line of railway, it would be unreasonable to subject the company to the costs, vexation and trouble of such process, merely because it had received that to be carried which the law compelled it to receive and carry."

It will be understood that we do not determine the question as to the right to garnish a carrier of property, where the same is within this State.

Affirmed.

APPPEAL by defendants, from a judgment of the District Court of Hennepin County (Young, J.), in favor of the plaintiff, as guardian of an insane person, in an action on the bond of a former guardian. Affirmed.

*Head note by the COURT.

NOTE.—Private corporation may be trustee. It seems to have been considered formerly that no corporation could hold property subject to a use or trust in favor of another; but this view is not wholly obsolete. Vidal v. Girard, 48 U. S. 2 How. 187 (11 L. ed. 205); Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 334. It is not necessary that the authority to assume a trust be conferred by express words, but it may be implied whenever the trust is in the furtherance of § 2 L. R. A.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Rossman for appellants.

Mr. Wm. J. Hahn for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the plaintiff, as guardian of Robert Chambers, an insane person, upon the bond of his former guardian, to recover money due his estate. The principal question is as to the constitutionality of the provisions of "An Act to Authorize the Organization of Annuity, Safe Deposit and Trust Companies" (Gen. Laws 1888, chap. 107, § 9, subd. 4), granting to such corporations power to act as trustee, assignee, receiver, executor of a will, administrator of an estate, guardian of the person or estate of a minor or guardian of the estate of any lunatic, imbecile, etc., and authorizing any probate or other court to appoint and commission any such corporation, authorized to do the general objects of the corporation. Vidal v. Girard, 48 U. S. 2 How. 189 (11 L. ed. 205); Chapin v. School Dist. No. 2, 35 N. H. 445; Phillips Academy v. King, 12 Mass. 548; Robertson v. Bullions, 11 N. Y. 243. Property is devised or granted to a corporation, partly for its own use and partly for the use of others. The power of a corporation to take and hold the property for its own use carries with it, as a necessary incident, the power to execute that part of the trust which relates to others. Re Howe, 1 Paige, 214.

business in this State, as such trustee, etc., in all cases where such court could lawfully appoint and commission a natural person; and providing that in such cases no bond, oath or other qualification should be necessary to enable such corporation to accept such appointment.

The contention of counsel seems to be that the Legislature has no right to grant to any corporation the power to act in any such fiduciary capacity. His argument deals in much criticism and denunciation of the statute, some of which might have some weight if addressed to the Legislature; but he entirely fails to point out any provision of the Constitution with which it conflicts. The sum of his argument is that such a statute is in derogation of the common law, or conflicts with prior statutes, and is impolitic. But none of these considerations go to the question of the validity of the Act. With our preconceived ideas on the subject, it might seem somewhat inappropriate to intrust the person of a minor to the custody of a corporation; but perhaps experience will prove that the objections to this are largely artificial and imaginary.

But this question does not arise in this case. While the statute authorizes these corporations to act as guardians of both the persons and estates of minors, it only authorizes them to act as guardians of the estates of insane persons. This action pertains solely to the estate of the ward, and the fact that the probate court has assumed to appoint the plaintiff guardian of both his person and estate will not, although unauthorized as to the former, affect the validity of the appointment as guardian of the estate.

To the appointment of corporations, organized for that special purpose, under well guarded statutes, to the position of trustee of a trust, executor of a will, administrator or guardian of an estate, or other place of trust, involving the custody and management of property only, there can be no possible objection on either constitutional grounds or considerations of policy. The common-law grounds upon which it was held that corporations could not act in any of these fiduciary capacities were purely artificial. The reason given by Blackstone why a corporation aggregate could not act as an executor or administrator is that it could not take the necessary oath; but even at common law, in England, this technical difficulty was evaded by the corporation naming an agent, called a "syndic," to whom letters were issued. Moreover, it is, of course, entirely competent for the Legislature to dispense altogether with an oath in such cases.

Another reason often assigned why a corporation could not act as a trustee was that, as a court of equity often enforced a trust by laying hold of the conscience of the trustee, therefore, inasmuch as a corporation has no conscience, it is not qualified to act as trustee. The reason most commonly given why a corporation could not act as trustee, executor, guardian, or in other such fiduciary capacity, was that such an appointment involved a personal trust, and therefore a corporation lacked one of the essential requisites of a good trustee—personal confidence. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 42.

But at least as to trusts, technically so called, this doctrine has long since been exploded, even at common law, as too artificial. Fidal v. Girard, 43 U. S. 2 How. 187 [11 L. ed. 205].

And there are now numerous instances in which corporations have been expressly empowered by statute to administer estates, and neither the validity nor policy of such legislation has ever before, to our knowledge, been questioned. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 357.

In fact, in many of the States, particularly the older ones, this is fast becoming the favorite method of administering estates and executing trusts. The facts that such corporations have perpetuity of existence; that they are less liable than natural persons to sudden fluctuations of fortune; that, being organized for that special purpose, they can administer estates more efficiently and economically; and that, in case of large estates, it is often difficult to find a natural person who is both able and willing to accept the trust, and give the necessary bonds—have suggested the necessity and created the demand for such organizations.

The statute is criticised because it does not require the corporation to take an oath or give a bond, as in the case of natural persons. But this is purely a question for the Legislature. If they deem the securities deposited with the state auditor, and the other safeguards placed by the statute around the organization and management of such corporations, to insure the faithful execution of all trusts imposed upon them as an equivalent for the bond and oath required of natural persons, they have the undoubted power to so provide.

Other objections are made to these provisions of the Act which would not be entitled to notice, except for the earnestness with which they are urged by counsel. For example, it is urged that they amount to legislative interference with the constitutional powers of the probate court, to which is given jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship. It need only be suggested, in answer to this, that the jurisdiction of the courts pertains to the execution of the laws, and not their enactment. This statute neither appoints any guardian or administrator, nor compels the courts to appoint any particular person. It merely provides that a certain class of persons shall be qualified to act in those capacities.

The suggestion that the Act is in conflict with section 33, art. 4, of the Constitution of the State, is equally untenable. This is not a special or private law, giving special or exclusive privileges, immunities or franchises to a particular corporation, but a general law for the organization of corporations for certain purposes, and defining their powers. There is nothing in the point that these provisions of the Act are not specified in its title. They are all germane to the subject there expressed, which is the organization and incorporation of annuity, safe-deposit and trust companies. This section of the Act is but an enumeration of the powers granted to such corporations; and it was never before heard that, in a general law for the organization of a particular class of corporations, the powers granted to them should be detailed in the title of the Act.

The contention that the plaintiff failed to establish a cause of action, because it did not prove the insanity of Chambers or the regularity of the proceedings in the probate court appointing it his guardian, is predicated upon an entire misconception of the status and probative force of the records of that court. In a collateral action, the letters themselves are conclusive of the regularity of the proceedings resulting in their issuance, as well as of the insanity of the person upon whose estate they were issued. Moreland v. Lawrence, 28 Minn. 84; Pick v. Strong, 20 Minn. 308; Davis v. Hudson, 29 Minn. 27. Order affirmed.

Charles W. ROCKHOLD, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CANTON MASONIC MUTUAL BENEVO-LENT ASSOCIATION.

(....DL....)

1. It is ultra vires a corporation created "to give financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans and heirs or devisees of deceased members," and declared by statute not to be an insurance company, to contract for "endowment insurance" payable to a member on his arriving at a certain age.

2. The plea of ultra vires is maintainable by such a corporation as a defense to an action for such endowment insurance, by a member charged with knowledge of the want of power to make such contract and whose payments of assessments to the corporation had not been retained by it to increase its property, but had been paid to those entitled thereto.

3. The beneficiary certificate containing such unauthorized agreement for endowment insurance will be valid in so far as it is payable to the beneficiaries on the death of the member; and when the member has not seasonably rescinded the contract and the benefits of the beneficiaries thereunder have intervened, he cannot recover from the corporation assessments paid by him, none of such assessments having been for endowment insurance.

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Second District, to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court of Peoria County, in favor of the plaintiff in an action of assumpsit. Affirmed.

The action was brought by Charles W. Rockhold against the Canton Masonic Mutual Benevolent Society, for the benefit contracted to be paid him on his arriving at the age of seventy years.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCulloch & McCulloch for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Daniel Abbott and H. R. Benson for defendant in error.

Scholsfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions are presented by this record. First, Was the clause in the policy in suit whereby defendant in error assumes to promise to pay to plaintiff in error "one dollar for each member of Division A," etc., within the power vested in defendant in error by its charter, and therefore obligatory upon it when the policy was delivered? Second, If it was not within the power vested in defendant in error by its charter, and therefore not obligatory upon it when the policy was delivered, has the promise since become obligatory upon the defendant by subsequent acts of the parties? They will be considered in the order stated.

First. The familiar rule is: a corporation, public or private, possesses and can exercise no other powers than those specifically con-

NOTE.—Social incorporations; benefit societies. In construing charters of social incorporations the object is to discover the intention of the parties; and to this end, and to carry out the objects of the organization, a liberal policy has been generally adopted. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 816-833; Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 43. When incorporated, benefit societies are not different in law from other corporations which have no capital stock and are not formed for the pecuniary profit of the stockholders. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 577-725. An association, the purpose of which was to endow the wife of each member with a sum of money equal to as many dollars as there are members of the association, to be raised by assessments on them, is not a "benevolent society." It is not intended to bestow any benefit or help without what was thought to be an equivalent. State v. Trubey, 37 Minn. 97; Foster v. Moulton, 35 Minn. 453; State v. Citchett, 37 Minn. 13; Com. v. Wetherbee, 106 Mass. 143; Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 51. A person who deals with corporations must, at his peril, not only notice the terms of their charters, but also all the general legislation of the State creating them, by which business with corporations is affected. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 642, 818. The laws and regulations determine the rights of the members and the association, and may be enforced by the parties and beneficiaries, according to their respective rights as therein provided. *Arthur v. ferred in this charter, or such as are incidental or necessary to carry into effect the purpose for which the corporation was created.

Among other corporations which may be organized under chapter 32, Rev. Stat. 1874, are corporations not for pecuniary profit. The provisions in that respect, pertinent here, are found in sections, 29, 30 and 31.

Section 29 provides that the certificate that shall be filed by the promoters of the corporation, with the Secretary of State, shall state, among other things, "the particular business and objects for which it is formed."

Section 30 provides that, upon filing this certificate, the Secretary of State "shall issue a certificate of the organization of the corporation, society or association, making a part thereof a copy of all papers filed in his office in and about the organization thereof, and duly authenticated under his hand and seal of state . . . Upon complying with the foregoing conditions, the corporation, society or association shall be deemed fully organized and may proceed to business," etc.

Section 30 invests corporations thus created with the usual attributes and powers of corporations, and concludes thus: "Associations and societies which are intended to benefit the widows, orphans, heirs and devisees of the deceased members thereof, and where no annual dues or premiums are required, and where the members shall receive no money as profit or otherwise, shall not be deemed insurance companies."

The organization of the defendant in error was in strict pursuance of these statutory provisions. The certificate filed by the promoters with the Secretary of State declared the purpose for which the corporation is formed to be "to give financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans and heirs or devisees of deceased members."

This is the measure of the powers vested in the defendant in error. The certificate of the Secretary of State could not, and it does not assume to, extend the corporate powers to any other purpose or object.

The policy or certificate in suit, so far as material to be read in this connection, is as follows:

"This Certificate of Membership Witnesseth: That the Canton Masonic Mutual Benevolent Society, in consideration of the representations made to it in the application for membership, and the sum of $5 to it in hand paid by Charles W. Rockhold and the sum of $1.80 to be paid by the said Charles W. Rockhold within ten days after due notice has been served upon him of the death of a member of this society, or upon his arriving at seventy years of age, or after he has been a member in good standing for twenty-five consecutive years, each member shall be assessed and shall pay to the secretary of the society a sum according to the class of which he is a member,—Do promise and agree to and with the said Charles W. Rockhold, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, well and truly to pay or cause to be paid to the said Charles W. Rockhold, or to his wife if living, if not, to his children, or to his legal representatives, the sum of $1 for each member of Division A, within sixty days after due notice and satisfactory evidence that he is a beneficiary member, or of his death."

It is so manifest that the bare statement of the fact must be satisfactory, that the promise to pay a sum of money to a person upon his arriving at a given age is not included within or incidental to a promise to pay a sum of money to his widow or his children or his legal representatives upon his death. They are, upon the contrary, as distinct and independent as undertakings can be. The former is a species of life insurance known as "endowment insurance" (Bliss, Life Ins. § 6, p. 7; Briggs v. McCullough, 36 Cal. 542); while the latter, under the provision of the statute quoted, is not to be deemed insurance.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the clause in question was ultra vires the defendant in error, and therefore was not obligatory upon it when the policy or certificate in suit was issued. State v. Central Ohio Mut. Relief Assn. 29 Ohio St. 399; and People v. Nelson, 46 incorporated benefit society can invoke the doctrine of ultra vires to avoid a contract must depend upon the general rules of law applicable to corporations. Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 235. By-laws of a corporation in contravention of the statute under which it is organized are ultra vires and of no effect. American Legion of Honor v. Perry, 1 New Eng. Rep. 715, 140 Mass. 580. The by-laws of such associations are to be construed with reference to the statute. Elsay v. Odd Fellows Mut. Relief Assn. 2 New Eng. Rep. 697, 142 Mass. 324.

How regarded under the various state statutes. An association being intended only for the benefit of widows, orphans, heirs and devisees of deceased members, no annual dues being required, and the members receiving no money as profit, or otherwise, while it is an insurance company, is such a one as under the Statutes of Illinois is exempted from depositing a guaranty fund; and this is so, although the members are subject to assessment for annual expenses, and although the officers, who are also members, are paid for their services. Commercial League Assn. v. People, 30 Ill. 168. An association which pays half the total amount of the policy at the expiration of two thirds of the life expectancy of the member, and which, having no capital, depends solely upon a system of voluntary assessments and contributions, need not conform to the Deposit Laws of New York. People v. Mutual Endowment & Accident Assn. 27 Hun. 543, 17 Am. L. Rev. 138. An association to relieve the sick and to pay to members over seventy-five years old a certain benefit, does not come under the general insurance laws. Supreme Council Order of Chosen Friends v. Fairman, 10 Abb. N. C. 162, 62 How. Pr. 380. Individuals associated together by no other tie than that of mutual indemnity, having paid officers, giving premiums for new members, and in which the sole condition of membership is health and probable duration of life, are engaged in insurance, and must conform to the Insurance Laws of Missouri. State v. Citizens Ben. Assn. 6 Mo. App. 163, 6 Cent. L. J. 491; State v. Merchants Exchange Mut. Benev. Society, 72 Mo. 146. An incorporation "for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members, and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families or heirs of deceased members," was held not subject to the Insurance Laws of Ohio. State v. Mutual Protection Assn. 26 Ohio St. 19. Hirschl, Fraternities & Societies, 13. The National Mutual Aid Association, organized under the Laws of Ohio, is not included in the Act of Pennsylvania which taxes foreign insurance companies. Com. v. National Mut. Aid Assn. 94 Pa. 481. Under the peculiarities of the Iowa Statutes, an association, though having as its sole object the insurance of its members, was held not obliged to conform to the general insurance laws. State v. Iowa Mut. Aid Assn. 59 Iowa, 125; Hirschl, Fraternities & Societies, 14. An agent of the Connecticut Mutual Benefit Company was held properly convicted of the offense of soliciting life insurance without first obtaining authority. Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149.

N. Y. 477, are directly in point and conclusive as to this question.

Second. This court has held that while the contract of a corporation remains wholly executory, the corporation may interpose the plea of ultra vires as a defense to a suit for its enforcement; but where the contract has been fully performed by the party contracting with the corporation, and the corporation has received the benefits of such performance, it cannot invoke the doctrine of ultra vires to defeat an action brought against it on such contract (Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 415; Dorst v. Gale, 83 Ill. 136; Bloomington Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Blue, 8 West. Rep. 642, 120 Ill. 121); and counsel for plaintiff in error correctly insist that this last quoted rule is conclusive of the present question.

But it will be seen that the present case is totally different from the cases cited. The question there was between the corporation and a third party, in regard to money received by the corporation which, in legal presumption, tended to increase the property of the corporation. Here the question is between the corporation and one of its constituent members who is charged with full knowledge of the want of power in the corporation to make the particular contract. The assessments paid by the plaintiff were not paid to the defendant to be retained by it to increase its property, but to be paid out by it to other persons entitled thereto by virtue of beneficiary certificates or policies, and, since there is no evidence to the contrary, it is to be presumed this was done. No action therefore will lie by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover this money back. Murphy v. Bidwell, 52 Mich. 487.

The beneficiary certificate or policy is valid as a certificate or policy payable to the widow or children of the plaintiff upon his death, and void only as a certificate or policy payable to him after being a member in good standing for twenty-five years or upon arriving at seventy years of age. Farmers & T. Bank v. Harrison, 57 Mo. 503; Bank of Wooster v. Steens, 1 Ohio St. 235; Vanatta v. State Bank, 9 Ohio St. 27; Utica Ins. Co. v. Cadwell, 8 Wend. 302; Beach v. Fulton Bank, Id. 583.

Whether plaintiff might have rescinded the contract, and recovered back the premium paid, is not important to inquire, since to have done so, he must have acted promptly before the rights of third parties intervened. He has never offered to rescind the contract, but, upon the contrary, it is expressly agreed between the parties as follows:

"That said plaintiff has since the time of receiving said certificate paid all assessments, Nos. 1 to 51 inclusive; such assessments amounting in the aggregate to $165.60, the same being all assessments for which said plaintiff was liable by virtue of holding said certificate and being a member of said society. But in no case has said defendant corporation exercised the power of paying, or collecting benefits to be paid, to living members of said society; and in no case has the plaintiff been required by said society to pay any such assessments; the defendant believing it had no power to make any such assessments."

Moreover, on the 28d of November, 1881, a little more than five years before plaintiff in error became seventy years of age, he was notified by the defendant in error that it has been instructed by the State Auditor that it had no authority to insert the clause in question in the policy or certificate; and that, in consequence of such instruction, no more policies or certificates would issue with the clause in question. And it is agreed that of the 1836 members of class A, to which plaintiff belongs, only 597 members held certificates or policies, at the date when plaintiff in error became seventy years of age, with the clause in question; and that the policies or certificates of the remaining 1239 members were to be paid only to the widows, orphans and heirs of deceased members. And so, instead of attempting to rescind the contract, he has acquiesced in and abided by it with full knowledge of the extent of its validity.

It is true, as contended by plaintiff's counsel, that his rights under the contract could not be changed without his consent. But inasmuch as, at most, his rights were only to have the contract carried out as one to pay, at his death, to his widow and orphans, or to rescind that contract, it is plain that his rights have not been changed or altered by any act of the corporation.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

ATCHISON, TOPEKA & SANTA FE R.
CO., Appt.,
v.

Mark SCHNEIDER et al.

(....Ill....)

1. Under the Eminent Domain Act of Illinois it is not intended that the right given the jury to personally examine the premises is to be construed as permitting them to disregard the sworn testimony in fixing the assessment of damages.

NOTE.—Eminent domain; rule of damages. When an entire lot of ground is taken, upon which the owner is engaged in business, the cost and inconvenience of removing the business are proper elements of damage. Chicago etc. R. Co. v. Hook, 6 West. Rep. 697, 118 Ill. 587; St. Louis etc. R. Co. v. Capps, 67 Ill. 607.

Party entitled to assessment by jury. In condemnation proceedings either party is entitled to have a jury and the introduction of evidence and mode of conducting the trial after the jury is impaneled are according to the rules of practice in trials at law. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Slee, 10 West. Rep. 154, 123 Ill. 57. The compensation may be assessed by the same or different juries as to separate tracts of land described in the same petition. Concordia Cemetery Asso. v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co., 10 West. Rep. 573, 121 Ill. 200. It is proper to allow the party to be sworn, to hear evidence and to assess damages as to other parties. Concordia Cemetery Asso. v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co., 10 West. Rep. 573, 121 Ill. 199.

New trial. The circuit and county courts are always open to condemn property under the Eminent Domain Act, and when engaged in a trial in vacation they have and exercise the same judicial powers in vacation as when in session, and may grant new trials. Centralia & C. R. Co. v. Rixman, 10 West. Rep. 600, 121 Ill. 215; Bowman v. Venice & C. R. Co., 102 Ill. 429.

3. The rule as to the assessment of damages for property taken under the Eminent Domain Act is that where there is a conflict of evidence and the verdict is consistent with all the facts and circumstances in the case, it will not be set aside merely because the court may regard the weight of evidence in the record against it; but when it clearly appears that the amount fixed is wholly inconsistent with and contrary to all the proofs, it is the duty of the court to interfere and resubmit the case to another jury.

4. Evidence of average monthly profits of the business conducted on the premises sought to be condemned under the Eminent Domain Act is admissible when limited to the question of the loss which would be incurred by the suspension of business during the time necessarily consumed in moving.

5. A new trial as to the assessment of damages should not be refused for the reason that the railroad corporation seeking to acquire the property had entered thereon on giving bond pending appeal as provided by the statute, and had made such changes therein as would prevent a new jury viewing it as it was when the proceeding for condemnation was begun.

APPEAL by petitioner, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County (Tutbill, J.), upon a verdict assessing the amount of damages for property sought to be acquired by petitioner for railroad purposes, under the Eminent Domain Act. Reversed.

The facts and questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams & Thompson for appellant.

Mr. W. P. Black for appellees.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by appellant against appellees, under chapter 47 of our statute, to condemn certain lots on State Street in the City of Chicago for railroad purposes, on which appellees held leases. On the lots were two buildings numbered 574 and 578, the first held by Schneider, at a rental of $60 per month, and the other by Hickey at $110 per month. Both leases expired April 30, 1889.

The building occupied by Schneider is a two story frame the lower story being used by him for the manufacture and sale of cigars, and the upper one sublet for a dwelling, at $30 per month.

The other building is a three story brick with basement. Hickey's lease covered the basement, and first and second stories in which he kept a saloon.

At the time of the hearing, June 14, 1888, these leases had about ten and one half months to run. The jury having heard the evidence produced by the respective parties, as to the value of these leasehold interests, and having examined the premises, made their report, giving to petitioners the right to take and appropriate the property, and allowing each of said appellees the sum of $1,200, "as compensation for their respective leasehold interests" and the sum of $1,300 to each "as compensation for inconvenience and cost of removal from the premises."

Appellant prayed an appeal, which was allowed on its filing bond in the sum of $10,000, which bond was duly presented and approved, whereupon appellant moved for an order, allowing it to enter upon and use the said premises pending the appeal, but the motion was denied. Appellant then paid the amount of the judgments to the county treasurer, and on presentation of his receipt therefor the court granted the order of entry.

A reversal is urged here mainly upon the ground that the verdict of the jury is unauthorized by the facts appearing in the record.

At the instance of appellees the court instructed the jury as to the measure of compensation as follows: "The jury are further instructed that in determining the amount of compensation to be awarded to the defendants, respectively, in this case, they may properly take into consideration all evidence tending to show the actual value of the leasehold interest to the respective defendants, of which it is proposed to deprive them; the actual loss to be suffered by these defendants, respectively, from the loss, destruction or depreciation of the improvements placed by them in the properties specially adapted to the conduct of their business, if any shown by their evidence, the reasonable costs of removal, and of refitting in other localities for the further conduct of business as shown by the evidence; and also any injury that the jury may find from the evidence will result to said defendants respectively by reason of the unavoidable interruption of their business, incident to their removal from their present site and their establishing in new locations during the period of such interruption, if any shown by the evidence."

Substantially the same rule was announced in instructions asked by appellant. No controversy can therefore be raised here as to that question; and, accepting it as a fair legal guide to the jury in fixing the amount which appellees should be paid as just compensation for being deprived of their property, it is impossible to escape the conviction that the verdict in this case on which judgments were entered is the result of prejudice, inadvertence and mistake.

In the first place, it must strike the impartial mind as remarkable that under leases so essentially different as to the property leased, the amounts of rent reserved and the uses to which the buildings were appropriated, the leasehold interest should be of precisely the same value and that the cost and inconvenience of removal in each case should be exactly the same. But the evidence, instead of explaining or reconciling this apparent inconsistency, only makes it more glaring and leaves no doubt that the amounts were arbitrarily fixed by the jury regardless of the proofs.

Appellant introduced four witnesses as to the value of the leasehold interests, each of whom testified that the rent reserved viz.: $60 in the one case, and $110 in the other, was the full rental value of the premises, and that neither was worth more than the said amounts agreed to be paid.

Appellees both testified in their own behalf, but neither contradicted appellant's witnesses on that subject, and only one witness introduced by them does so, and he only as to the lease of Hickey, which he says in his judgment is worth $200 per month, or a bonus of $90 per month.

Appellant also introduced two witnesses as to the cost of removal. One of these swears that the cost to Schneider to move his fixtures, and put them up in another building, replacing what might be necessary with new material, would be $235.40, and to Hickey $161. The other estimates the cost to Schneider at $263.50 and to Hickey at $148.50. While the evidence of appellees, and witnesses introduced by them, on this element of damages would justify a finding of much larger sums than those fixed by either of said witnesses, it is impossible to so construe their evidence as to sustain the finding of $1,800, reported by the jury. In fact, by their own testimony Schneider's expense for furniture and fixing up his establishment was only between $700 and $800, and that of Hickey about $1,200; in which last amount he admits is included the cost of his moving into the building and a pool table for which he paid $375.

The verdict of the jury is not only contrary to the weight of the testimony but manifestly against all the evidence; and this is not denied or controverted by counsel for appellees. It seems, however, that it was sustained below, on the theory that the jury might legally base its report as to the amount of compensation to be paid, on their personal examination of the premises without regard to the testimony of witnesses; and this view is now urged in support of the judgment below and is thought to be sustained by decisions of this court.

While it is true that we have frequently held that the personal examination by the jury, in such cases, is in the nature of evidence and is to be considered by them in connection with all other evidence in the case, and that an assessment will not be set aside merely because it may differ in amount from the preponderance of the evidence appearing in the record, it has not been held by this or any other court, so far as we are aware, that all the evidence may be ignored and the amount fixed directly contrary thereto.

In Mitchell v. Illinois Railroad & Coal Company, 85 Ill. 567, it is said: "As to the damages sustained, the evidence is conflicting. Under the statute the jury had a right to view the premises and draw their own conclusions from such observations as well as from other testimony offered in the case."

In Chicago Railroad Company v. Hopkins, 90 Ill. 323, after stating that the evidence was conflicting, and upon that preserved in the record the inclination might be to hold the assessment too large, but that the jury personally examined the locus in quo, it is said: "It is the evident intention of the law that such personal examination by the jury is in the nature of evidence, to be considered by them; and to what extent they were influenced by such examination in their assessment, it is impossible to tell. The result of the personal investigation may have been such as to have fully justified the assessment made, even if it was clear that the preponderance of the evidence preserved in the record was against so large an amount."

In Green v. Chicago, 97 Ill. 373, we said: "Inasmuch as the value of the land taken is purely a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the particular circumstances in each case, it is believed no general rule can be laid down applicable alike to all cases. . . . Where in any case the different theories and processes, submitted by witnesses for ascertaining the value of property taken, lead to widely different results, and the opinions of the witnesses themselves are conflicting and wholly irreconcilable, and there is sufficient evidence upon which the verdict may be sustained, the court ought not to disturb it, unless it is manifest from all the circumstances in the case that the jury adopted a false theory in arriving at their conclusion; in which event the verdict ought to be set aside."

So in McReynolds v. Burlington Railroad Company, 106 Ill. 156, it was again said: "The opinions of witnesses here were extremely conflicting. The jury went upon the premises and saw for themselves the situation;" and what was said in Chicago Railroad Company v. Hopkins, supra, is repeated with approval. To the same effect is the language used in Chicago Railroad Company v. Blake, 2 West. Rep. 815, 116 Ill. 166.

While there is language used in the instruction commented upon in Kinman v. Chicago Railroad Company, which would seem to go farther, and authorize the jury to fix the amount independent of the sworn testimony, yet the instruction, taken as a whole, was thought to be in accord with the decisions above referred to, and was approved on their authority. The oath which the jury is required to take by section 8, as well as the language used in section 9, of the Eminent Domain Act, clearly shows that the sworn testimony shall not be disregarded in fixing the amount of the assessment; and the rule deducible from all the decisions of this court is that where there is a conflict of evidence and the verdict is consistent with all the facts and circumstances in the case, it will not be set aside merely because the court may regard the weight of evidence in the record against it; but when it clearly appears that the amount fixed is wholly inconsistent with, and contrary to, all the proofs, it is the duty of the court to interfere and resubmit the case to another jury. In this view of the law it was error to overrule appellant's motion for a new trial.

It is also urged as a ground for reversal that the court below refused to admit evidence of actual rentals derived from similar premises, in the near vicinity of those in question. The evidence fails to show that the property inquired about was similar and in the near vicinity to that of appellees. There was therefore no error in refusing the testimony offered.

Both Hickey and Schneider were allowed, over objection by appellant, to state their average monthly profits during the year preceding the hearing, and this is also urged as error. It appears from the record that this evidence was held competent as tending to prove, with other testimony, the loss which would be incurred by the suspension of business during the time necessarily consumed in moving; and thus limited, we see no objection to it.

The case of Chicago, S. F. & O. R. Co. v. Phelps, 15 West. Rep. 281, decided and the opinion filed at Ottawa in June last, is decisive of the right of appellant to an order permitting it to enter upon the premises sought to be condemned, on filing its appeal bond in conformity with the order granting an appeal, and the court below erred in refusing to make it; but as the same purpose was accomplished by paying the money to the county treasurer, the judgment would not be reversed for that error.

Counsel for appellees maintains that by actually taking possession of the buildings in question, and especially by a removal of one of them, and permitting the other to stand vacant and fall into ruin, appellant has put it out of the power of the court to grant a view of the premises as they were when occupied by appellees, and therefore another trial cannot be had, as contemplated by the statute, and appellant should for that reason be held to have waived its right to insist upon a reversal and new trial.

Assuming that the facts exist as stated (of which there is no proof in the record), and that the question is fairly before us for decision, we have no hesitancy in holding the position untenable. Section 18 of the Act, as construed in Chicago Railroad Company v. Phelps, supra, gives appellant "the right to enter upon the use of the property" pending the appeal. Section 12 of the same Act gives the right of appeal. The position of counsel amounts to saying that the exercise of one of these rights is a waiver of the other; whereas, by the very terms of the statute they are concurrent. A personal examination of premises to be condemned by the jury may be desirable in most cases, but is not essential to a trial under the statute.

An attempt is made to justify the amounts found by the jury by assuming that something was allowed to each of appellees for the goodwill of their business. It is a sufficient answer to this position to say that all evidence on that subject offered by appellees was excluded by the court below; besides, the report of the jury shows that no such allowance was made.

There is no view of this record, that we have been able to discover, which will justify an affirmation of the judgment below. It is clear that the sum of $2,500 to each of appellees for the unexpired term of their leases and cost and inconvenience of moving is unreasonable and unauthorized by the proof—is largely in excess of just compensation. The judgment of the Circuit Court will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

The statutory provision in reference to wills devising real estate in this State, executed by a nonresident and probated in another State, that an exemplified copy of such will or of the record thereof shall be presumptive evidence of the will and of the due execution thereof, does not render such will effectual to pass real estate in this State unless executed in accordance with the laws of this State.

(January 23, 1889.)

APPEAL by plaintiff, to the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, from an order of Special Term denying a motion to require purchaser to complete purchase in a partition suit. Affirmed.

The question presented is stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edw. H. Rockwell for appellant.
Mr. C. L. Westcott for respondent.

Van Brunt, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The objections to the title in question are made because of defects in the execution and probate of the will of one John N. Williams, through whom the title was derived. John N. Williams died in South Carolina, where his will was made, executed and witnessed by three persons and admitted to probate in accordance with the Laws of South Carolina; and an exemplified copy thereof was filed and recorded in the surrogate's office in the County of New York, and certificates of the Judge of the Court of Probate and various lawyers of South Carolina were attached and recorded with the will—showing that it could not be removed from the records of that State, and hence could not be produced here.

Upon the admission of the will to probate in South Carolina but one witness appeared and was examined as to its execution, and there was no proof either as to the absence of the other witnesses or of their handwriting, or any secondary proof whatever in reference to said witnesses. There was no proof, nor did the attestation clause state, that any witness signed such will at the request of the testator. It is clear that, under the circumstances, the will was not executed or proven according to the Laws of the State of New York.

But it is claimed that, in view of the peculiar legislation authorizing the recording of wills admitted to probate in another State or Territory, these objections cannot prevail.

The law of this State, as it stood when the will was recorded (Laws 1864, chap. 811, as amended by Laws 1872, chap. 680),* provided that where any real estate situate in this State has been, or shall hereafter be, devised by any person residing out of this State, and within any other State or Territory of the United States, and the will of such person shall have been finally admitted to probate in such other State or Territory, and filed and recorded in the office or court where the same shall have been admitted to probate, an exemplified copy of such last will and testament, or of such record thereof, and of the proofs, may be recorded in the office of the surrogate of any county in this State where any real estate so devised is situated—which record in said surrogate's office, or an exemplified copy thereof, shall be, in cases where the original cannot be produced, presumptive evidence of said will, and of the due execution thereof, in all cases or proceedings relating to lands so devised.

The objection made by the plaintiff certainly has some support from the language of this provision, but in the construction of this portion of the law we must have regard to the intention of the Legislature and the objects sought to be attained. It is apparent what the intention of the Legislature was, namely: to allow an exemplified copy of the will and proofs, which have been recorded in another State or Territory, where the original could not be produced, to have the same effect as though the original had been so produced.

It certainly was not the intention to give greater effect to the exemplified copy of a will and the proofs than would be given to the will itself. If such a construction is to be placed upon this section, then we would have this peculiar condition of circumstances: that a will executed in South Carolina according to its laws but not according to the Laws of the State of New York, devising real estate in New York, would be effectual because of the Laws of South Carolina that a will which is probated must be filed and cannot be removed from the record for the purpose of production in New York; whereas, a will made in North Carolina according to the Laws of North Carolina, admitted to probate in North Carolina, but not executed according to the Laws of New York, would not be effectual to pass the title to real estate in New York because the Laws of North Carolina authorize the taking of the will off the files for the purpose of probate elsewhere. Such a condition of affairs was never contemplated; and all that was intended by the Legislature was that the exemplified copy of the record should be as effectual as the production of the original in those cases where, in consequence of the law of the residence of the testator, the original could not be produced. It was never intended to change the requirements of the law of this State in regard to the descent of real estate.

It is true that the language of the section is that the exemplified copy, in cases where the original cannot be produced, shall be presumptive evidence of the will and of the due execution thereof. But it is only presumptive evidence; and where upon an examination of the record itself it is apparent that the will has not been executed in such a manner as to comply with the laws of this State in reference to the transmission of real estate, the presumption is overcome, and no longer exists.

The claim upon the part of the appellant, that the record is of more value than the original, shows the falsity of the position; and the construction of the section does not necessarily depend upon any such absurd rule.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the will not being executed in accordance with the laws of this State so as to pass real estate, no title to the devisee thereunder passed and the order appealed from should be affirmed, with $10 costs and disbursements.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI.

George D. BARNARD & CO.

v.

KNOX COUNTY, Missouri.

(....Fed. Rep. ....)

The provision of the Missouri Constitution (art. 10, § 12), that "No county shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year," is to be construed as referring to that class of debts which it is optional with the county court or other governing body of the county to incur, and not to compulsory obligations cast on the county by operation of law.

(February 6, 1890.)

ACTION on county warrants, submitted on agreed statement of facts. Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE.—Constitutional inhibition against counties contracting debts. The inhibition against contracting debts in a political subdivision of the State, exceeding the income of the current year, does not apply to claims against a county for keeping and transporting prisoners by the sheriff of another county. Potter v. Douglas County, 2 West. Rep. 489, 87 Mo. 240. The county court has no power in any year to contract a debt of the county in excess of the revenues of the county for such year, unless authorized thereto by two thirds of the voters of the county voting at an election held for that purpose; and warrants issued to pay such a debt are void, although the debt was created for remodeling and building additions to the county court house. Book v. Earl, 8 West. Rep. 240, 87 Mo. 248. The evident purpose of the framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it was to abolish in the administration of county and municipal government the credit system and establish the cash system, by limiting the amount of tax which might be imposed by a county for county purposes and limiting the expenditures in any given year to the amount of revenue which such tax would bring in to the treasury for that year. Section 12 is clear and explicit on this point. Book v. Earl, 8 West. Rep. 242, 87 Mo. 248. The limitation imposed upon county indebtedness by section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution. 2 L. R. The material facts are set forth in the opinion.

Messrs. Taylor & Pollard for plaintiff.

Messrs. Geo. Balthrope and W. C. Hollister for defendant.

Thayer, D. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on forty-nine county warrants issued during the years from 1882 to 1886 both inclusive, in payment for books and stationery sold and delivered to Knox County at the instance and request of various county officers, and for public use.

The defense is that when the warrants sued upon were issued by the County Court of Knox County, the county court had drawn warrants in excess of the total revenue of the county for the years during which the warrants were respectively issued, and that the debt sued for was for that reason contracted in violation of section 12, article 10, of the Constitution of the State of Missouri, which provides that "No county . . . shall be allowed to become indebted in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

The case has been submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the books and stationery in question were furnished for public use at the instance and request of the Probate Judge, the clerks of the county and circuit court, and the sheriff and collector of the county, and that the same "were suitable and necessary for the officers in their official capacity, to whom they were sold."

It also appears that the total warrants issued by Knox County each year from 1882 to 1886, both inclusive, exceeded the revenue derived for the respective years from the highest rate of taxation which the law permits, to wit: fifty cents on each $100 of valuation; but that deducting the warrants drawn on the "pauper fund" and "road and bridge fund," the warrants drawn in any one of said years did not exceed the revenue for said year.

Judgment must be rendered for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed in each count (that is for the amount of the warrant described therein and interest at 6 per cent per annum from the date of the alleged presentation) for two reasons:

In the first place there is nothing in the agreed statement to show that the indebtedness sued for was illegally contracted, even if it be conceded that the constitutional inhibition (§ 12, art. 10, supra) applies or has reference to such an indebtedness.

The only fact admitted by the agreed case is that warrants were issued each year from 1882 to 1886 inclusive, in excess of the total county revenue for the respective years, provided warrants drawn on the "pauper and road and bridge funds" are taken into account, and not otherwise. But whether when the several items of indebtedness sued for were contracted, and the various warrants were drawn, the limit of legal indebtedness had then been reached, and the county had exhausted its power to contract further indebtedness, is not shown.

The stipulation falls short of establishing the facts alleged in defendant's special plea.

In this State, as is well known, county courts are required to subdivide the total county revenue into five different funds, and each fund must be devoted to the payment of the particular class of expenses for which it is set apart, and to no other. Warrants drawn by the county court must also specify the fund on which they are drawn. Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 6818-6821, both inclusive.

By section 5370, Revised Statutes of Missouri, county treasurers are required to keep a record of warrants presented against the respective funds, and to pay them out of the funds on which they are drawn in the order of presentation, with the proviso that warrants issued to pay for "services that are usual, and for all expenses necessary to maintain the county organization," must be paid in preference to warrants that are otherwise drawn—that is, to pay for services or expenses that are of an unusual character.

It is evident, therefore, that when a county incurs an indebtedness exceeding its income or revenue for the year, and some part of it is for that reason invalid, it must be that part (if any) which may be appropriately termed an extraordinary indebtedness, or that part which was contracted after the limit of legal indebtedness had been reached. The debt sued for in this case was not an unusual debt for a county to contract. On the contrary it was an obligation such as the county was compelled to incur annually. Its officers could not discharge their official duties without suitable books and stationery. Therefore it is important to know when the various items of indebtedness sued for in this case were contracted, and to what extent the county had incurred liabilities up to that time. Without such proof—and the agreed case is silent on that point—the court cannot say that the county had exhausted its power to incur further debts, when a single item of the bill sued for was sold and delivered.

It will certainly not be presumed that the defendant contracted a debt in violation of law. The burden of showing such fact rests on him who alleges it.

In the second place it must be held that the indebtedness now under consideration is not within the purview of the section of the Constitution above quoted (§ 12, art. 10), because it was an indebtedness which the various county officers who contracted it were bound to incur in the proper discharge of their official functions. It is made the duty of the various officers at whose instance the books and stationery involved in this case were supplied "to provide suitable books and stationery," at the expense of the county, for the transaction of business in their several offices. Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 623, 624, 1061, 1184, 5376.

The debt was contracted by those officers, and not by the county court.

In the case of Potter v. Douglas County, 2 West. Rep. 489, 87 Mo. 240, it was held that the constitutional prohibition now in question was leveled against a county becoming indebted through the action of the county court, the ordinary contracting agent of the county; and that it had no application to an obligation cast on the county for the transportation of a prisoner to an adjoining county, and for his board whilst there confined in jail, inasmuch as the law made it the duty of the sheriff to take prisoners to an adjoining county and there confine them when there was no jail in the county where the offense was committed.

In Rollins v. Lake County, 84 Fed. Rep. 845, Judge Brewer held that a provision in the Constitution of the State of Colorado, very similar to the one now under consideration, did not forbid a county of that State from becoming indebted for witness', jurors' and sheriff's fees in excess of the amount limited by the Constitution, because the laws of the State made it obligatory on counties to pay all such fees.

It seems, therefore, that it is settled, both in this State, and in this circuit, that constitutional provisions limiting the amount of county indebtedness that may be incurred are to be construed as having reference to that class of debts which it is optional with the county court or other governing body of the county to incur, and that they are not to be taken as having reference to compulsory obligations cast on the county by operation of law, as where a county is required to pay the ordinary expenses attending the maintenance of courts and the enforcement of the laws within the county, or where particular officers are required to provide, at the expense of the county, the necessary supplies for the proper discharge of the duties of their office.

As experience has heretofore shown that counties and municipalities generally become embarrassed by lavish expenditures which they were under no legal obligation at the time to make, or that might at least have been deferred to a more convenient season, the construction adopted in the cases above cited is both reasonable, and will most likely result in accomplishing the purpose had in view by the law maker.

Judgment will accordingly be entered for the plaintiff.

DORSET MARBLE CO. et al.

(...Vt....)

One who indorses a note in blank, whether by writing his name above or below that of the payee, is liable, prima facie, as a maker, and may be sued as such.

HEARD at the March Term of the Windham County Court, 1897, Powers, J., presiding. Judgment for the plaintiff, and exceptions by the defendants. Affirmed.

The action was assumpsit; plea the general issue. The defendants were sued as the joint makers of three promissory notes. The notes were executed by the Dorset Marble Company, and made payable to the order of J. H. Goulding, Treas. On the back of each note was written in blank the name of J. H. Goulding, Treas., and underneath his name were written, also in blank, the names of the defendants Hawley, Hollister and Gleason.

Mr. F. G. Swinington, for defendants:

The indorsements are regular. There is no ambiguity on the face of the notes, and the plaintiff was not misled. It accepted the notes with the defendants' indorsements, precisely in accordance with the real obligation which they intended at the time of indorsing; and parol testimony should not be allowed to contradict it.

Stevens v. Parsons (Maine) 6 New Eng. Rep. 644, 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 707, 707 a, 707 b, 709.

The notes were first indorsed by the payee; afterwards by the indorsers, underneath the name of the payee. The legal presumption is that the indorsers are second indorsers, and no parol evidence is admissible to contradict it.

Mr. L. M. Reed, for plaintiff, cited—

Flint v. Day, 9 Vt. 345; Nash v. Skinner, 12 Vt. 219; Strong v. Riker, 16 Vt. 554; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355; Hunt v. Adams, 5 Mass. 358.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below found, from testimony not objected to, that the defendants, Hawley, Hollister and Gleason, indorsed the notes, before they were used in any manner, for the sole purpose of giving additional security to them, and so procuring them to be discounted by the plaintiff, understanding among themselves and with the maker that the latter was the principal debtor, as the fact was, and they were accommodation indorsers, with the right to demand and notice that indorsers are entitled to; but that the plaintiff had no notice that they claimed to stand as indorsers and not as original promisors.

The plaintiff claims that this finding makes them original promisors, and is conclusive of the case. But without determining whether that is so or not, we put the case on the ground that the defendants take, and treat it as standing solely on what is disclosed by an inspection of the notes themselves in respect of the nature of the obligation, that the law presumes that the defendants intended to assume when they indorsed the notes.

Taking this ground, the defendants claim that as their names are indorsed under the name of the payee, and not over it, making them what are called regular, instead of irregular, indorsers, the law conclusively presumes that the obligation they intended to assume is that of second indorsers, and that parol evidence is no more admissible to vary a contract implied by law than to vary a written contract.

There is great diversity of holding in this country, as to the nature of the obligation the law presumes a third party to have intended to assume when he indorses in blank commercial paper. But it is not necessary to examine the law of other jurisdictions much, for it is well settled in this State, by a long line of decisions; and although some of them may be obnoxious to criticism as anomalous and illogical, yet they have been so long acted upon by our citizens that they cannot now be disturbed without danger of injustice; and besides, it is often of more consequence that the law should be stable than that it should be logical.

The cases on this subject, for present purposes may be conveniently divided into two classes, namely: those of regular, and those of irregular, indorsements. In the case of irregular indorsements—that is, indorsements in blank by third persons above the name of the payee, or when the payee does not indorse at all—there is very little diversity of holding. By such indorsements it is pretty generally held, nothing else appearing, that the party intended to assume an absolute undertaking, and usually that of maker; but that this presumption may be rebutted by showing a contract for a different undertaking.

But in the case of regular indorsements—that is, indorsements in blank, of third persons, under the name of the payee—a different rule pretty generally prevails; and such indorsements are held to impose only the obligation of second indorsers; and parol evidence is not received to vary that obligation, because it is said that there is no ambiguity arising from a regular indorsement in respect of the nature of the obligation intended to be assumed, as there is from an irregular indorsement—for on the face of the paper a regular indorser is liable as second indorser; and that it is no more competent to vary the legal effect of a written instrument by parol evidence than it is to vary its express terms.

But in this State no distinction has ever been made in this behalf between regular and irregular indorsements, but they have alike been held, prima facie, to impose the obligation of maker.

In most, if not all, of the cases before Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 855, the indorsements were irregular, which brings the cases in line with a great majority of the cases in other jurisdictions. But in Sylvester v. Downer the defendant's indorsement was regular; that is, his name was written in blank under the names of the payees. This seems to be so from the case, but we have a copy of the note before us, which shows it to be so. Downer was sued as sole maker of the note, and although it is true that the evidence tended to show, and the jury found, that he intended to assume an unconditional obligation to pay the note according to its tenor, yet the court adverted to that fact only as putting at rest all pretense that it was not understood that he assumed the obligation his signature imported, and said: "The note, on being produced, showed his name indorsed upon it, and also that of the payees of the note. This, according to the decisions of this court, repeatedly made, imposed upon the defendant the obligation of the maker of the note, with this difference only, that, his undertaking being in blank, as between the parties to it, it was susceptible of being controlled by oral evidence of the real obligation intended to be assumed at the time of signing."

In Pitkin v. Flanagan, 23 Vt. 160, the payee's name was indorsed first in position in the bill of exchange, then the defendants', and then the plaintiff's, all in blank. The plaintiff had the bill to pay, and sought to recover the whole of it of the defendants, on the ground that as their names stood before his on the bill they were liable to him as prior indorsers. But the court held that the position of their names made no difference, and let in parol evidence of the circumstances.

The result is the defendants are held as makers, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. Relief in equity may be had before plaintiff has established his rights at law, where the material facts out of which his rights arise are admitted; and if there is a doubt as to his rights, it is one of law only.
2. Executors, by paying taxes and selling a portion of the estate in coal, which is reserved from the sale of the surface of the ground, but who are not in the actual occupancy or possession of the property, and have no interest therein except a simple power of sale, are in no such possession as to prevent a seisin of the owner sufficient to support a claim of curtesy by her husband after her death.
3. Where a tenant by curtesy has had a share of property allotted or delivered to him in severalty in partition, other parties to the partition who did not in these proceedings raise the question of his right cannot afterwards deny that he was a life tenant.

4. A devise of coal mines and mining privileges, separate from the estate in the surface of the land, includes the use of the surface so far as necessary for mining purposes, and the use of a pit mouth thereon, although testatrix in her lifetime had granted a right of way for a tunnel which had been constructed and could be used for taking the coal to market.
5. In partition of coal between owners who do not own the surface, mining privileges pass as appurtenant or incident to the coal without express words, and include the use of a pit mouth which is not within the lines of either purport, but which is close to one of them, where it was the manifest intention to divide all the good merchantable coal.
6. A tenant for life, when not precluded by re-

8. Damages are not recoverable by the owner of a coal mine, in a suit for an injunction, from the fact that one of the defendants had driven away from the mine a person who had a contract with the plaintiff, without any limit as to time, to take coal at a certain price per bushel, and who had cleaned out the entry to the mine, for which plaintiff had paid nothing, where it does not appear that plaintiff may not still mine and sell the coal and get a higher price for it.

(November 25, 1888.)

APPEAL by defendants, from a decree of the Common Pleas of Allegheny County, in equity, granting an injunction as prayed for by plaintiff. Affirmed.

The bill was brought by Edward P. Swift against J. S. Rankin, Louisa Rankin his wife, and Charles P. Rankin, to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiff's operating a certain coal mine. The case was sent to a master, James C. Doty, Esq., who submitted the following report:

From the evidence submitted, the master finds the facts as follows:

1. That Margaret Giffin died in April, 1872, seised in fee simple of a certain tract of land, with coal therein, situate in the Township of Lower St. Clair, Allegheny County, having by her will, which was duly probated April 12, 1872, before the register of said county, and is of record in his office in Will Book, Vol. 15, page 464, devised to her daughter, the defendant Louisa Rankin, wife of the defendant Dr. J. S. Rankin, for her life, with remainder to her children, should she leave any, a part of said land, excepting and reserving from the devise all the bituminous and stone coal under the same, with mining privileges, and having by the same will devised the residue of her estate, which included the coal and mining privileges excepted and reserved as aforesaid, to her daughters, Emily Giffin and the said Louisa Rankin in fee simple, subject to certain charges since fully paid, and certain powers of sale given her executors.

2. That the said Emily Giffin intermarried with Edward P. Swift, the plaintiff, and died August 13, 1873, intestate, having had by said plaintiff one child, her only issue, who died soon after his mother, in infancy.

3. That afterward, by proceedings duly had in the orphans' court of said county, at No. 1 June Term, 1879, in partition, for partition of the residue unsold of the real estate of the said Margaret Giffin, deceased, so devised as aforesaid to the said Emily and Louisa, the said residue unsold was divided into two purparts, designated respectively "A" and "B;" and the purpart designated "A," embracing, inter alia, 30 acres and 106 <sup>44</sup>/<sub>100</sub> perches of said coal under the land devised as aforesaid to the said Louisa Rankin for life, as shown by a plot or draft attached to the alias inquisition taken in such proceedings, was allotted and delivered to said plaintiff in severalty for his life; and the partition so made was duly confirmed by the said orphans' court.

4. That in the coal so allotted and delivered to plaintiff as aforesaid, and underlying the land so devised as aforesaid to the said Louisa Rankin for life, a mine with an entry or pit mouth on the land so devised to her, was open and was worked by the said Margaret Giffin, or by her licensee, for many years before and until her death, and by her devisees, the said Emily and Louisa; or by their sufferance or license, in the lifetime of the said Emily; and during all the time aforesaid the coal mined therein was hauled from the said entry or pit mouth to the public road through and over the land so devised as aforesaid to the said Louisa Rankin for life.

5. The said pit mouth is located on the land so devised to the said Louisa Rankin for life, with remainder to her children as aforesaid, and neither on the surface over purpart A or purpart B, but about sixty feet from the line of purpart A, as shown by the said draft in said partition proceedings.

6. That plaintiff recently began and proceeded, by his servants, in a careful and workmanlike manner, to mine his said coal in his said mine, and to haul the same when mined from the said pit mouth, by a way long ago, and in the lifetime of the said Margaret Giffin, used for said purpose; but the defendant Charles P. Rankin, by force and threats, stopped plaintiff's workmen from mining and hauling the coal as aforesaid, and still keeps them from their work aforesaid, and threatened and attempted, and still threatens, to blow up and destroy the said entry to said mine.

7. That the said Charles P. Rankin is the lessee of the said Louisa Rankin, his mother, and is engaged in working her coal mine, and in interfering with the plaintiff and his servants, as aforesaid, in the use of the pit mouth, he claimed to be protecting and defending his rights as such lessee and the defendants all still maintain their right to prevent plaintiff and his workmen from using the pit mouth for mining or hauling away the coal allotted to him in the partition proceedings.

8. That by deed dated July 10, 1871, and recorded in the recorder's office, in and for said county, in Deed Book, Vol. 276, page 311, the said Margaret Giffin granted, inter alia, to Joseph Keeling a right of way through the coal under the land, a part of which was devised to Louisa Rankin, for life, to be used as a lateral railroad; that the tunnel and lateral railroad were made and built by Keeling through said coal; and thus the coal could have been mined and taken to market.

9. That Margaret Giffin, by her will, authorized and empowered her executors, as soon after her decease as it could be done to advantage, to sell at public or private sale, as they might deem best for the interest of her estate, all her goods and estate, real, personal or mixed, wherever found, not theretofore disposed of, including the coal (except three acres reserved) under the tract of land of which she died seised, and a portion of which was devised as aforesaid.

10. That the executors, as such, exercised some supervision and control of the coal, paid taxes thereon, and sold a portion thereof; but they were not in the actual occupancy or possession of the property, and under the will they had no beneficial interest therein, but a simple power of sale.

11. That by articles of agreement, dated August 20, 1874, the said executors of Margaret Giffin, deceased, granted to Joseph Keeling & Co. the right and privilege to drive an entry or drain for the purpose of drainage through the coal unsold belonging to the estate of the said Margaret Giffin, deceased.

12. That on June 29, 1877, plaintiff commenced a proceeding in the orphans' court of said county, at No. 163 June Term, 1877, to compel the executors of Margaret Giffin, deceased, to sell the balance of the coal then unsold, but his application was finally refused upon the ground that there was no absolute direction in the will of said decedent to sell the realty.

The first question is as to the jurisdiction. Has a court of equity jurisdiction of a case like this?

The plaintiff in his bill claims the right to mine coal in a certain mine, and to haul the same when mined from a pit mouth and by a way alleged to have been long used for that purpose. He sets forth particularly the facts upon which he relies to support his right. He then avers that, in partial exercise of his rights in the premises, he began and proceeded, by his servants, in a careful and workmanlike manner, to mine his coal in the said mine, and to haul the same when mined from the said pit mouth, by said way; but that the defendant Charles P. Rankin, acting in confederacy with the other defendants, and with others to him unknown, assaulted his workmen when so mining and hauling his coal, and by force and threats stopped them from work, and still keeps them from their work, and threatened and attempted, and still threatens, to blow up and destroy the entry to said mine; by which wrongful acts and threats he has suffered great injury, and if they be not restrained, will suffer great and irreparable loss and injury.

This would seem to be a very proper case for equitable relief unless the objection that plaintiff's rights must first be established at law is well taken. Cases are very numerous to the effect that the right of complainant ought to be admitted or established at law before granting an injunction. But if the right of the plaintiff be clear, it need not first be established by a suit at law. Hacke's Appeal, 101 Pa. 245.

In one sense, the rights of the plaintiff are here denied. But the material facts out of which his rights arise are admitted. If there is a doubt as to his rights, it is one of law, not of fact. On a question of mere law the courts are bound to have an opinion, whatever may be the difficulty of making it up. Brightly, Eq. Jur. § 308.

A trial at law necessarily implies that there are some facts disputed and to be tried. In this case, all the material facts are admitted; there could be nothing for a jury to do, even if it were an action at law; the question would be legal, and for the determination of the court. The court, therefore, has jurisdiction of the cause, in the opinion of the master.

The question to be determined upon the merits is, Has the plaintiff the right to enter upon the premises of defendants for the purpose of mining the coal allotted to him in the proceedings in partition? Has he a right to mine the coal, and, if so, can he use the pit mouth in so doing?

The plaintiff has a life estate in the coal. It is claimed that Mrs. Swift never was in possession, that the executors under the will of Margaret Giffin had control of the coal until after Mrs. Swift died, and that plaintiff, therefore, is not tenant by the curtesy. But the land was not devised to the executors. They had no estate or beneficial interest in it. They had simply a power of sale, if they thought best. They paid the taxes, and sold some of the coal, but the ownership was in Mrs. Swift and Mrs. Rankin as tenants in common, and the executors had no such possession as would defeat plaintiff's claim as tenant by the curtesy. It is not necessary to entitle a husband to claim by the curtesy, that there should have been what is considered in England an actual seisin of the wife or husband during the coverture. Chew v. Southwark, 5 Rawle, 160; Buchanan v. Duncan, 40 Pa. 82.

But if there is any doubt as to the tenancy by the curtesy, plaintiff is life tenant of his deceased child. Besides, Mrs. Rankin and her husband were parties to the partition proceedings, and should have raised the question then, if they denied that plaintiff was life tenant.

But another objection is made to plaintiff's claim. The pit mouth is located on land devised by Margaret Giffin to Louisa Rankin for her life, with remainder to her children. But all the coal under the land so devised, "with mining privileges," was excepted and reserved. The residuary clause of Margaret Giffin's will gave to her daughters Emily and Louisa all that remained of her estate after paying certain legacies, expressly including the coal under the farm, a portion of which was devised as above stated. There was no reference in the will to "mining privileges" save in the clause containing the exception and reservation mentioned above. Margaret Giffin in her lifetime granted a right of way for a tunnel through the coal under the land to Keeling, said tunnel to be used as a lateral railway, and Keeling had made the tunnel, and thus the coal could be mined and taken to market through the tunnel. Defendants contend that the "mining privileges" referred to in the will, and which were excepted and reserved in the devise to Louisa Rankin and her children, had reference solely to this right of way previously granted to Keeling, and did not include the pit mouth or entry, or any other use of the surface for the purpose of mining coal. But, it seems to the master, this would be a very narrow construction. The terms would embrace much more. The surface and the coal were made separate estates by the will. The coal would be unavailable without mining privileges. The testatrix must have intended to reserve all mining rights and privileges, and that these should be enjoyed and possessed by the owners of the coal. The use of the surface, then, so far as necessary for mining purposes, and the use of the pit mouth, passed to Mrs. Swift and Mrs. Rankin by the will of their mother.

Again; it is said that plaintiff acquired no right to use the pit mouth for mining purposes under the proceedings in partition. No reference is made to any mining privileges, or to the pit mouth, in the proceedings. This was perhaps either an oversight or it was deemed unnecessary. Nor is the pit mouth within the lines of either purpart A or purpart B. But the mouth of the pit is about sixty feet from purpart A, which was allotted to plaintiff. It was the manifest intention to divide all the good merchantable coal. The line stops where such coal ends. The out crop extends a little distance beyond to the pit mouth. The merchantable coal is separated into two purparts of equal size and value. In the judgment of the master, the mining privileges, including the use of the pit mouth, passed as appurtenant or incident to the coal without express words. It is a well settled rule that when anything is granted, all the means to obtain it are granted also, and all shall pass inclusive, together with the thing, by the grant of the thing itself. Noy's Maxims, 198; Hovell v. McCoy, 8 Rawle, 356.

An analogous rule would apply in this case. But, if not, then the mining privileges, and the use of the pit mouth as a part thereof, still remain undivided, and the plaintiff has the right to them as tenant in common.

But defendants say that plaintiff has no right to mine the coal allotted to him for life, because he is not life tenant of the surface. It is conceded that where the wife dies in possession of lands with open mines on it, and her husband comes into possession of the estate immediately on her death, he may continue to work the mines, because the law looks upon the open mines as yielding a product for the estate, as theretofore, and as estovers in connection with the estate, for its support and maintenance. But it is contended that where the open mines do not underlie the estate of the life tenant, and there is no estate to support estovers, that then no estovers can be claimed.

The defendants in their answer do not aver that they are remaindermen. Probably Mrs. Rankin had an estate in remainder, and the defendants are acting in the interest of those in remainder. But the issue is not directly as to the right of the tenant for life to mine the coal as against the remaindermen. However, the argument of counsel is largely upon that question, and whether properly raised or not, the master will consider the case in that aspect.

The mine was open and worked when the life estate commenced, and the pit had long been used for mining purposes. The attempt here is to prevent the life tenant from mining any part of the coal. The question is not whether those in remainder might not, in a proper action, restrain him from working more than what might be deemed his just proportion, or make him account for part of the profits, if he did so. In Irwin v. Covode, 24 Pa. 162, it is suggested that probably such relief might be afforded.

The rule is well settled that a tenant for life, when not precluded by restraining words, may not only work open mines, but may work them to exhaustion (Shoemaker's App. 106 Pa. 892; Westmoreland Coal Co's App. 85 Pa. 844; Kier v. Peterson, 41 Pa. 357; Neel v. Neel, 19 Pa. 828; Irwin v. Covode, 24 Pa. 162); and it is settled law 2 L. R. A.

that the rents of an open mine are income, and go to the tenant for life. Cases cited above; and see Went's App. 106 Pa. 301; McClintock v. Dana, Id. 886. The latter two cases also rule that, when land is chiefly valuable for coal mining purposes, although the mines are unopened, the power to lease the real estate includes the power to lease the coal lying under the surface. A life tenant of land, whereof the timber is the intended source of profit, may cut it for profit. Willard v. Willard, 56 Pa. 119. Where the mines are severed from the surface, the ordinary rules respecting waste have no application. Bainbridge, Mines, 53.

In Neel v. Neel, supra, it is said: "As to all tenants for life, the rule has always been that the working of open mines of all sorts is not waste. The tenant for life has the usufruct of the whole land, and takes the whole profit that can be derived from it in following out the use made of it by the donor . . . And the tenant for life is not at all limited by the extent of the use made of the property by the author of the gift . . . It is sufficient that he opened them (the pits) and derived any profit from them, even if it were only fire-bots. The fact of his opening the pits made the coal a part of the profits of the land, and the right to them will pass as such by a devise of a life estate. If he meant otherwise, he should have said so; not having said so, this is the legal inference of his intention . . . And the tenant for life may work them, even though the working of them may have been discountenanced before the death of him through whom the estate comes."

In Irwin v. Covode, supra, the court says: "As yet the Legislature have prescribed no limitation to the use which a tenant for life may make of open mines. In virtue of their common-law powers the court might doubtless restrain unskillful mining and wanton injury to the inheritance, but not such proper mining as is subject to no other objection than its liability to exhaust the mine. The profits of coal mines depend much on expensive preparations for working them, and in order to compensate this necessary investment, as well as to compete successfully with rival operations, a large amount of coal must be mined and sold. To deny a tenant for life the right to mine largely, would be to deny him the right to mine profitably—to shut him up to mining for his own fuel merely . . . Nor are such improvements necessarily injurious to the remainderman, for the estate is liable to fall in at any moment, and when it comes to him he takes it with all that has been added to develop and improve it." Should the tenant for life exhaust lands so held, and leave them mined on the hands of those in succession, "It would be no more than occurs in every life estate in chattels which perish with the using. So long as the estate is used according to its nature—in formam doni—it is no valid objection that the use is consumption of it; and it is no fault of the tenant that it is not more durable."

A life estate in personal property, to which reference is made, is in many respects analogous to the usufruct of movables under the civil law: the person entitled to such use having the right to enjoy and use all the movable effects, according to their nature, things to be consumed become his property; things not to be consumed, may be put to the use for which they were designed, without abusing them, and after the time for such use had elapsed, to be yielded in the condition they happen to be after the usufruct has expired. Holman's App. 24 Pa. 174.

The above quotations are not made to support the general principle, which is so well settled, but in order that the reasoning of the court upon the subject may be seen, and because much of the language used might be applied to the present case. They answer many objections urged against life tenants' right to mine coal.

In considering the question, respect must be had to the nature of the property. The whole value is in the coal. It was the intended source of profit. The estate descended to the life tenant as an open mine. If he cannot work it, it is of no use to him. It came to him from his wife without any restriction or limitation. Mrs. Swift was the owner of the coal in fee. She might have disposed of it by will as she chose. She might have limited plaintiff's rights as she saw fit. But when she did not see proper to restrain the gift, why should it be done? Not having done so, the obvious inference is that she intended him to take what the law gave to a life tenant of open mines. She must have expected him to derive some profit from the mine. Who can say that those in remainder were any more the objects of decedent's bounty than the life tenant? In the absence of any expression by her, or of a restriction upon her gift to him, it must be presumed that she meant him to enjoy the profits of the open mine while he lived.

Every tenant for life is entitled, of common right, to take reasonable estovers—that is, wood from off the land, for fuel, fences, agricultural erections and other necessary improvements. 4 Kent, Com. 73.

So he is entitled, through his lawful representatives, to emblements, or the profits of the growing crops, in case the estate determines by his death, before the produce can be gathered. From their nature we cannot conceive of estovers or emblements without land to support them. So also, in all the cases that have been discovered by the master where it was decided that the tenant for life might work open mines, he has also been life tenant of the surface as well as the coal. It is argued, therefore, that a tenant for life cannot work open mines unless he is also tenant of the surface. But why should it make any difference? He takes the coal not as estovers. He takes the mine for life, to use it, according to its nature, as a source of profit. The cases do not limit the amount of coal he may mine. He may mine to exhaustion. His right to mine is not affected by the comparative value of the coal and the surface.

In Williard v. Williard, supra, where the timber was the chief value, he was allowed to cut the timber. When the textatrix severs the surface from the coal, and gives a life estate to one, that would evidence an intention that he should derive some benefit from it. That is practically this case. There does not seem to be any substantial reason for not applying the general principle with regard to the right of life tenants to work open mines. The objection as to the injury to the remaindermen by allowing life tenants to work open mines, has been answered repeatedly. In some instances those in remainder might be gainers, for the life estate may determine after expensive preparations for mining have been made, and before any coal has been taken out. If it is hard on them in some cases, it does them no injustice; and, if a contrary rule was applied, it would be very hard on the tenant for life.

The foregoing was written under the impression that the plaintiff was willing to forego his claim for damages, and that, therefore, it covered the whole case. But it seems the master was in error. The plaintiff insists upon a decree for damages, as well as for an injunction; and, if he has suffered damages, the court will decree on account thereof as incidental to the main relief. Bispham, Eq. Secur. 478; Allison and Evans' App. 77 Pa. 221.

Upon this branch of the case the facts are as follows:

Plaintiff had a contract with Henning to take out coal, for which he was to pay plaintiff one half cent per bushel in the pit. There was no limit as to time, nor as to the amount of coal to be mined. Henning was to take out all the coal he could sell in the neighborhood, but he was not required to mine any specified quantity, or for any specified time. Under the contract, Henning set some men to work to clear out the entry and the drain, and to put the pit in proper shape to take out coal. Henning was to clear out the pit mouth under the bargain, and to take the expense of the clearing out of the coal. After the clearing was done, he put a man, Lorsen, in to dig coal, and a man, Boehmert, to haul it. They worked for nearly two days. The work was stopped by Charles P. Rankin on the second day. None of the other defendants interfered with the work. No mining had been done in the pit since the men were stopped. Because they were interfered with, Henning could get no one to go there and work. The expense of clearing up and wages for the work done amounted to about $30, which Henning paid. The plaintiff never paid him back, nor was he asked for it, or spoken to about it. The pit would average about fifteen coal cars a day. A car holds about thirty bushels. If Henning had not been interfered with, he probably would have taken out that quantity. At the time the mining was stopped, four hundred bushels per day could have been mined and sold in the neighborhood.

Upon these facts, it seems to the master that the plaintiff ought not to have a decree for damages. None could reasonably be asked against any of the defendants excepting Charles P. Rankin. The other defendants did not stop the work. Charles P. Rankin neither mined nor destroyed any of the coal. The coal still remains unmined. The plaintiff may still mine and sell it, and he may get a higher price for it than under his contract with Henning. The plaintiff paid nothing for cleaning the entry, nor as wages to the men. There is no means of determining how long Henning would have worked, nor how much coal he would have taken out. It would depend on many contingencies—as his success in working the mine; the wages of miners and laborers; the state of the market; facilities for transportation; demand for the coal; the supply of natural gas; the abundance and scarcity of money; and the state of the country. Dependent on such a list of contingencies, it would be impossible to extract a rule for measuring the damages. If any damages have been sustained by plaintiff, they are so uncertain that they cannot be ascertained.

The master is therefore of opinion, upon the whole case, that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree restraining the defendants from interfering with him, and his workmen, in using the pit for the purpose of mining and hauling away his coal, with costs, but not for the payment of any damages sustained by him.

The defendants filed exceptions to the report, which were overruled by the court, and a decree rendered and entered in accordance with the report; whereupon defendants appealed.

ERROR to the District Court of Franklin County (Benson J.), brought by defendant below to review a judgment in favor of the plaintiff below in an action for breach of covenant. Reversed.

Statement by Valentine, J.:

This was an action brought by Mary E. Stewart, art, in the District Court of Franklin County, against Frank A. Baker, to recover damages for an alleged breach of certain covenants contained in a general warranty deed executed by Baker and wife to the plaintiff for certain land situated in that county. A jury was waived, and the case was submitted to the court upon the following agreed statement of facts:

"(1) That Joshua Baker, being the owner in fee simple of the said land in controversy, on the 28d day of November, A. D. 1877, together with his wife, Elizabeth, conveyed the same by deed of general warranty of that date to Frank A. Baker and Alice Baker, which said deed was duly recorded May 9, 1881; (2) that at the time of said conveyance said Frank A. Baker and Alice Baker were husband and wife, and resided in the State of Kansas; (3) that prior to the third day of October, 1881, the said Alice Baker died, leaving surviving her as her heirs at law her said husband and two children born of said marriage, to wit: Mary E. Baker, born in 1877, and Annie A. Baker, born in 1880, both of said children now residing with their

NOTE.—Conveyance to husband and wife; common-law rule as to estate. At common law, if an estate is granted (Rogers v. Benson, 5 Johns. Ch. 481) to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants, nor tenants in common, for husband and wife being considered one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties; both are seized of the entirety, per tout and not per my. Neither can dispose of any part of the estate without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor. Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 423; Torrey v. 14 N. Y. 482. See Jackson v. This is based upon the principle that husband and wife are only one person in law, and have no separate existence, and no separate title to lands; and their rights and interests are identical; that a conveyance to both of them is a conveyance to one person. Miller v. Miller, 9 Abb. Pr. N. B. 446; Sutliff v. Forgy, 1 Cow. 69-75. No interest in such an estate could be sold on execution for the debts of the husband or wife; but the conveyance creating it may be set aside for fraud. Hulett v. Inlow, 37 Ind. 412, 25 Am. said father; (4) that on said third day of October, 1881, the said Frank A. Baker and Okie Baker, his wife (said Frank having remarried) conveyed by deed of general warranty the lands in controversy to the plaintiff, Mary E. Stewart, which deed was duly recorded on the third day of October, 1881; (5) that no conveyance, by order of the court or otherwise, has ever been made or obtained to divest the interest of the said minor children in said lands, if any interest said children inherited from their said mother, Alice Baker. And it is agreed that the only question in this case is, Upon the death of said Alice Baker, did the surviving husband, Frank A. Baker, inherit the entire estate, or did the said children of Alice Baker inherit any interest in said premises?"

Upon this agreed statement of facts the court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the sum of $800, and costs of suit; and to reverse this judgment the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court.

Mr. William H. Clark for plaintiff in error.

Mr. C. B. Mason for defendant in error.

Valentine, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears that on November 28, 1877, Joshua Baker and his wife, Elizabeth Baker, who owned certain real estate in Franklin County, conveyed the same by a general warranty deed to their son, Frank A. Baker, and his wife, Alice Baker, which deed was duly recorded. Afterwards, and before October 3, 1881, Alice Baker died, leaving surviving her her husband and two children born during the marriage.

Upon these facts, and some others not necessary to mention, the main question arising in the case, and the one now presented to this court, is whether, on the one side, the foregoing deed conveyed the foregoing real estate to Frank A. Baker and his wife as tenants in common, or whether, on the other side, it conveyed it to them as joint tenants or tenants in entirety. If the deed conveyed the land to Frank A. Baker and his wife as tenants in common, then the decision of the court below is correct, and must be affirmed; but if it conveyed it to them either as joint tenants or as tenants in entirety, then such decision is admitted to be erroneous.

The real question, stated more explicitly, is this: At the death of Alice Baker, who took the foregoing real estate? Did Frank A. Baker, as the survivor of the two, and as one of two joint tenants or tenants in entirety, take the whole of the estate, or did he, as a tenant in common with his wife, take only the one half thereof, and leave his wife's heirs to take the other half? No question has ever been presented in this case as to who had the right to control the property during the joint lives of Frank A. Baker and his wife, or whether either or both together could have legally sold the same, or any interest therein, during that time. These matters, however, will be considered to some extent hereafter.

We suppose it will be admitted that a deed might be executed to a husband and wife which would convey to them, if the language of the deed explicitly said so, any one of the foregoing estates—that is, an estate in common, or a joint tenancy, or a tenancy in entirety; for such has always been the law, and property owners can generally convey their property just as they please.

Walker, J., however, in the case of Smith v. Smith, 30 Ala. 642, 648, used the following language: "The reason why, under a conveyance to husband and wife, they did not take either as joint tenants or tenants in common, is that they were, according to the principles of the common law, incapable of so taking."

Mr. Bishop, in his work on Married Women (vol. 2, § 285), criticises this language as follows: "Let us pause to say that the majority of legal persons would probably deny this proposition of the learned judge; because, as we saw in the first volume [vol. 1, §§ 616, 618], husband and wife, if they were joint tenants or tenants in common before marriage, continue to be the same after marriage, and do not become tenants by the entirety of the estate, which shows them to be capable of holding as tenants in common or as joint tenants; and it is perhaps the better doctrine at the common law that a conveyance to them after marriage may, by express words, create in them either of these two tenancies."

Mr. Washburn, in his work on Real Property (vol. 1, *425), uses the following language: "It is always competent, however, to make husband and wife tenants in common, by proper words, in the deed or devise by which they take, indicating such an intention."

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries (vol. 4, *363), uses the following language: "It is said, however, to be now understood that husband and wife may, by express words, be made tenants in common by a gift to them during coverture." See also McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78, 80.

Certainly, a husband and wife may be made tenants in common by a separate deed to each, converting to each a separate moiety of the estate. This may also be accomplished by a separate conveying clause as to each in the same deed; and certainly no good reason can be given why the same thing might not be accomplished by any express words in a single deed executed to the two together, showing the intention of the parties to be that the husband and wife should take the estate as tenants in common. But it would require express words or words strongly implying such an intention. Without such words the estate conveyed would be an estate in entirety.

We suppose it will also be admitted that the deed in the present case would at common law have conveyed the property in entirety to Frank A. Baker and his wife, Alice Baker, and would not have conveyed it to them as ordinary joint tenants, or as tenants in common. We suppose it will also be admitted that, if the deed in the present case conveyed the estate to Frank A. Baker and his wife, either in entirety or as joint tenants, then that Frank A. Baker, as the survivor of the two, was, at the death of his wife, entitled to the land, and the defendant in error, plaintiff below, should not recover in this action. But if the deed did not so convey such estate, and conveyed the same to Baker and wife purely, solely and entirely as tenants in common, then the plaintiff in error, defendant below, was not, at the death of his wife, entitled to the land, and the defendant in error, plaintiff below, should recover in this action. Almost all authority is in favor of the theory that such deed conveyed an estate in entirety to Frank A. Baker and wife, and that he, as the survivor of the two, was, at the death of his wife, entitled to the entire estate. On the side of the defendant in error, cases are cited from Iowa, Illinois, and New Hampshire which are relied on as supporting the opposite view of the case. But these cases were decided under special statutes, and therefore are not authority at all. Under such statutes there could not be any joint tenancy or tenancy by entirety, but only a tenancy in common, and therefore the decisions in those States could not have been otherwise than as they were. The Statute of Iowa upon this subject reads as follows: "Sec. 1939. Conveyances to two or more, in their own right, create a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intent is expressed." McClain, Ann. Stat. Iowa 1882, § 1939.

The Statute of Illinois upon this subject reads as follows: "Sec. 5. No estate in joint tenancy in any lands, tenements or hereditaments shall be held or claimed under any grant, devise or conveyance whatsoever, heretofore or hereafter made, other than to executors and trustees, unless the premises therein mentioned shall expressly be thereby declared to pass, not in tenancy in common, but in joint tenancy; and every such estate, other than to executors and trustees (unless otherwise expressly declared as aforesaid) shall be deemed to be in tenancy in common." Starr & C. Stat. Ill. 1885, p. 571, chap. 30, ¶ 5.

The Statute of New Hampshire upon this subject reads as follows: "Sec. 14. Every conveyance or devise of real estate made to two or more persons shall be construed to create an estate in common, and not in joint tenancy, unless it shall be expressed therein that such estate is to be held by the grantees or devisees as joint tenants, or to them and the survivor of them, or other words are used clearly expressing an intention to create a joint tenancy. Sec. 15. Joint heirs shall be deemed tenants in common." Gen. Laws N. H. 1878, p. 825, chap. 185, §§ 14, 15.

It seems to be admitted that at common law the deed in the present case would convey an estate in entirety to Frank A. Baker and his wife; but it is claimed that the rule of the common law has been changed by our statutes. No statute, however, has been referred to, nor can any statute be found, that enacts directly that such a deed should not convey such an estate. Indeed, there is no statute that pretends in direct terms to change or modify the common law in any particular with respect to such a deed. It is claimed, however, that the Married Woman's Act by indirection or impliedly, changes or modifies this rule of the common law.

Now, how such Act changes or modifies the rule of the common law in this regard it is difficult to understand. That Act was passed by the Legislature, presumably, for the benefit of married women, and not to take away from them any of their rights or privileges.

Now, nine tenths of the married women of this country are younger than their husbands, and the life tables, wherever they state the expectancy of life for males and females separately, show that the expectancy of life for women is greater than that for men of the same age and health. See, especially, Dr. William Farr's tables in any volume of the American Almanac from 1879 up to the present time. Hence, in the great majority of instances, married women must survive their husbands. Now, if the Married Woman's Act transforms an estate in entirety into an estate in common, then it will, in a great majority of instances, divest married women of one half of their estates. Without the Act, a married woman, holding with her husband an estate in entirety, would, when he dies (if she survives him), take the entire estate; but with the Act, if it is to be construed as the defendant in error would desire to have it construed, she would take, under such circumstances, only one half of the estate, and must lose the other half. As will be shown hereafter, however, this Act has nothing to do with the estate which either the husband or the wife shall hold, but only with the possession, control and enjoyment by married women of their own separate property, of estates which they in fact own.

For the purposes of this case it will be admitted, and it is our opinion, that, under the statutes of this State relating to married women, they have all the rights, powers and privileges that married men have, and may control their separate property, and buy and sell and trade and traffic, to the same extent that married men may, and with like effect and consequences. But none of these things affect this case. It will be admitted that Alice Baker, while living, had the right to control the real estate in question to the same extent that her husband, Frank A. Baker, had. But that does not affect this case in the least. It does not determine what estate of inheritance passed from Joshua Baker and wife to Alice Baker or to Frank A. Baker. It only determines that each had during their joint lives an equal right to control the estate that did in fact pass. The estate that did in fact pass was an estate for life to each of them, with a contingent estate in fee simple, or of inheritance to each of them, the latter estate depending upon the contingency as to which should outlive or survive the other. So long as each lived each had the right to possess and enjoy the entire estate; but when one died, the other took the entire estate. Undoubtedly, such an estate could have been created by the deed from Joshua Baker and wife to them, if the deed had expressly said so; and under all the authorities the deed that was actually executed would at common law have conveyed just such an estate as conclusively and certainly as though it had expressly said so. And nearly all the authorities hold that the statutes relating to married women, and giving to them the right to control and manage their own separate property, do not in the least affect the question as to what estate passes by a deed to a husband and wife, or what either shall take on the death of the other, and these authorities hold that such estate is still one of entirety. Among the authorities to this effect we would cite the following: Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106, 109; McCurdy v. Canning, 64 Pa. 39, 41; Kip v. Kip, 83 N. J. Eq. 218; Buttler v. Rosenblath, 8 Cent. Rep. 353, 42 N. J. Eq. 651; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 891, 412 et seq.; Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 222; McDuff v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 531; Fisher v. Provin, 25 Mich. 347; Robinson v. Eagle, 29 Ark. 202; Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152; Zornlein v. Bram, 1 Cent. Rep. 66, 100 N. Y. 13; Marburg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402; Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362. See also 2 Bishop, Married Women, §§ 284-289.

In the case of Buttler v. Rosenblath, 8 Cent. Rep. 353, 42 N. J. Eq. 651 (decided in 1887), it is decided as follows: "(1) A conveyance of land, since the passage of the Married Woman's Act of 1852, to husband and wife, does not create a tenancy in common. (2) That Act endows the wife with the capacity, during the joint lives, to hold in her possession, as a single female, one half the estate in common with her husband. The right of survivorship still exists as at common law. (3) To constitute a tenancy in common between husband and wife there must be in the conveyance an expression of an intention to do so."

In the case of Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106, 109, Mr Justice Strong, who was afterwards one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language: "But it is said the Act of 1848, by destroying the legal unity of the husband and wife, has converted such an estate into a tenancy in common; that is, that such a deed conveys a different estate from that which the same deed would have created if made prior to the passage of the Act. To this we cannot assent. It mistakes alike the letter and the spirit of the statute, imputing to it a purpose never intended. The design of the Legislature was single. It was not to destroy the oneness of husband and wife, but to protect the wife's property by removing it from under the dominion of the husband. To effectuate this object she was enabled to own, use and enjoy her property, if hers before marriage, as fully after marriage as before. And the Act declared that if her property accrued to her after marriage, it should be owned, used and enjoyed by her, as her own separate property, exempt from liability for the debts and engagements of her husband. All this had in view the enjoyment of that which is hers, not the force and effect of the instrument by which an estate may be granted to her. It has nothing to do with the nature of the estate. The Act does not operate upon rights accruing to her until after they have accrued. It takes such rights of property as it finds them, and regulates the enjoyment; that is, the enjoyment of the estate after it has vested in the wife. And the mode of authorized enjoyment is significant. It is to be as her separate property is enjoyed, as property settled to her separate use. The Act, therefore, no more destroys her union with her husband than does a settlement of property for her separate use. To a certain extent she is enabled, but no more than is necessary, to protect her property after it has been acquired. We have held that she can convey her lands only by joining in deed with her husband. Pettit v. Fretz, 88 Pa. 118. This is a clear recognition of the existing unity of the two. It need not be repeated that no greater effect is to be given to the Act of 1848 than its language and spirit demand. It is a remedial statute, and we construe it so as to suppress the mischief against which it is aimed, but not as altering the common law any further than is necessary to remove that mischief. To hold it as operating upon the deed conveying land to a wife, making such deed assure a different estate from what it would have assured without the Act, is to lose sight of the legislative purpose. Were we to do so, it would become, in many cases, a means of divesting her of her property, instead of an instrument of protection. In the present case, if it has converted the estate granted to Diver and his wife into a tenancy in common, it has taken from her her ownership and enjoyment of the entirety during her husband's life, and her right of survivorship to the whole."

The case of Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 222, is a late case, and equally explicit upon this subject. And see, also, the latest New York cases upon this subject.

As we have before stated, the question as to who had the control of this property, or how it should be controlled while Alice Baker was alive, is not a question in this case. The only question in this case is, Who took the property after her death? But suppose that this question shall, nevertheless, be considered. The right or privilege or power of the husband, at common law, to control the use of the wife's real estate, was never any part of the estate held by either, but was always simply a right or privilege or power growing out of and founded upon the marriage relation. At common law the husband has such right of control over all the wife's real estate, and not merely over such of her real estate as was held by the two in entirety. Now, cannot this right to control of the wife's real estate be changed by statute without abolishing or destroying the nature of the estate held by the husband or the wife, or both—the inheritance? Nearly all the authorities say that this may be done. May not the common law upon any given subject be amended or altered by statute without wholly destroying the entire common law upon that subject? May not the common law on any subject be altered in part, and left in force in part?

The common law, in this State, has probably been so amended that the husband and wife have an equal right to control all the land which they own in entirety, but in other respects the estate of entirety is probably precisely the same as it was before the statutes relating to married women took effect. With this change in the right of the husband to control the real estate owned by his wife, or by him and her in entirety, the estate of entirety has become more like the ordinary estate of joint tenancy, though it is not yet strictly like such an estate. It does not matter in this case, however, which of these two estates the present is or was. If it was either an estate in entirety or an estate in joint tenancy, then the claim of the defendant in error is untenable. The claim of the defendant in error is tenable only upon the theory that the estate in the present case was one of pure tenancy in common.

It is also urged, faintly, but still urged, that the statutes relating to descents and distributions have transformed the estate in entirety into an estate or tenancy in common. How this has been done, however, is not made plain. It is difficult to understand just how any person may transmit to another, by death or otherwise, more than such first-mentioned person ever owned. Only a descendible estate can pass to an heir. In estates in entirety held by a husband and wife each owns a life estate in the entire property, but the statutes relating to descents and distributions do not pretend to affect such estates. They do not enact that a life estate shall pass to an heir; and of course such an estate cannot. Each (the husband or wife) also owns a contingent estate in fee simple in the entire estate, based upon the survivorship of one as to the other. The survivor takes the whole estate, and the heirs of the other take nothing. The one who dies first renders it utterly impossible for the contingency of survivorship on that one's part, the contingency upon which that one's inheritable estate is founded, ever to take place, and renders it utterly impossible for that one ever to obtain any inheritable interest in the property, or any interest which could by any possibility be transmitted to heirs. By that one's death that one's contingent inheritable estate is ended and determined, and ended and determined before any absolute inheritable estate ever became vested in him or her; and hence that one, at his or her death, could have nothing which could be transmitted to heirs.

There have always been laws in all the States with reference to descents and distributions; and yet it has never been supposed that such laws prevented or hindered the creation of estates in entirety. Nearly all the courts hold that estates in entirety may still exist, and may be created by an ordinary deed of general warranty to the husband and wife, and such estates are no more against our present laws in Kansas relating to descents and distributions than such estates have always been against all other laws concerning descents and distributions in this and other States. So far as the homestead is concerned, our laws concerning descents and distributions recognize the right of the survivor, either the husband or the wife, and in whose-ever name the title may be vested, to occupy such homestead, and the whole of it after the death of the other. See Act Concerning Descents and Distributions, §§ 2, 28.

The homestead is a kind of "community" property. No other statutes have been referred to as abolishing estates in entirety, and we think there are none.

Under the facts of this case we think that Frank A. Baker, as the survivor of his wife, Alice Baker, is entitled to the entire estate, and that no part of the estate passed to her heirs.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded; with the order that judgment be rendered in favor of the defendant below, and against the plaintiff below, for costs.

Johnston, J., concurring.

Horton, Ch. J., dissenting:

At common law, where real property was conveyed to the husband and wife by deed, both husband and wife were seised of the estate thus granted per tout, et non per my (by the whole, and not by a part), as one person, and not as joint tenants or tenants in common. The survivor became sole seised of the entirety of the estate. The reason why, under a conveyance to husband and wife, they did not take, either as joint tenants or tenants in common, was that they were, according to principles of the common law, incapable of so taking. The authorities fully sustain this statement of the reasons on which the common-law rule, prescribing the effect of a conveyance to husband and wife, is founded.

Littleton, after stating the rule, says that "The cause is, for that the husband and wife are one person in law." 2 Co. Litt. 187 a.

Blackstone says that "Husband and wife being considered as one person, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety." 2 Bl. Com. 182.

Chancellor Kent says: "They are not properly joint tenants nor tenants in common; for they are but one person in law, and cannot take by moieties." "This species of tenancy arises from the unity of husband and wife." 2 Kent, Com. 182.

So with the adjudged cases. They all proceed, not on any supposed intention of the parties to the conveyance, but on the sole ground of the incapacity of husband and wife, who are regarded as one person in law, to take, "during coverture, separate estates in property which is conveyed to both of them." Green v. King, 2 W. Bl. 1211; Jackson v. Stevens, 16 Johns. 115; Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed (Tenn.) 692; Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 617; Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397; Rogers v. Benson, 5 Johns. Ch. 437; Pollard v. Merrill, 15 Ala. 174; 4 Kent, Com. 362; 1 Greenl. Cruise, 863, §§ 44, 45; 1 Thom. Co. Litt. note, p. 741; Bell, Husband & Wife, 396; Bredon's Case, 1 Coke, *76 b, 193, note (Thom. & F. ed.).

In accordance with this view it has been held, and upon reasoning entirely conclusive, that husband and wife cannot at common law, by any words in a grant to them, during coverture, be made either joint tenants or tenants in common. Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 397; Johns- ton v. Hart, 6 Watts & S. 319; Dias v. Glover, 1 Hoffm. Ch. 71.

Therefore the statement in the opinion that, under the rule of the common law, a deed might be executed to a husband and wife which would convey to them an estate in common, or in joint tenancy, is not only not admitted, but is against the great weight of authority; and I might say against all reported English cases, but a single one, upon which text writers and one court, in attempting to defend estates in entirety, have built largely. See Stuckey v. Keefe, supra, and the authorities there cited.

As a strong illustration that estates in entirety are not applicable to our society and institutions, I cite Dias v. Glover, supra. In that case the conveyance was made to "J. C. and P. C., his wife, as tenants in common and in equality of estate, and not as joint tenants." Notwithstanding the purpose and intention of all the parties to the conveyance, it was decided that, under the common law, the conveyance was not permitted to have any operation in creating a tenancy in common. The words "as tenants in common" and "entirety of estate, and not as joint tenants," were rendered nugatory by the incapacity of the husband and wife, under the common law, to take as tenants in common.

One of my objections to establishing or recognizing estates in entirety in this State is that it is not in consonance with our laws that the intention of the parties to a conveyance to a husband and wife cannot have any operation. The adoption of estates in entirety determines the incapacity of husband and wife to take either as joint tenants or tenants in common. 2 Kent, Com. 182; 4 Kent, Com. 362.

There are citations in the opinion, from Bishop, Washburn and Chancellor Kent, attempting to support the rule that even at common law it is competent to make husband and wife tenants in common by proper words in the deed or devise by which they take.

The case of McDermott v. French, 15 N. J. Eq. 78, is also referred to for the same reason.

The citation from Bishop is based upon Wales v. Coffin, 18 Allen, 218, and the New Jersey case of McDermott v. French, supra, and one English case [Webb v. Russel, 3 T. R. 393] referred to in 1 Preston on Estates, 182, and also in 2 Preston on Abstracts, 41.

The Massachusetts case decides "That, by common law, a deed or devise to husband and wife creates one indivisible estate in them both, and the survivor of them, not because of their supposed incapacity to hold in moieties, but because, such being presumed to be the intention of the parties, the law holds the estate to be limited accordingly." This last conclusion of the decision is contrary to Blackstone and all the other common-law authorities. The English case in 2 Preston on Abstracts, 41, is the authority for the citation from Kent. Washburn gives as his authority the New Jersey case only. The New Jersey case is founded upon the citation from Kent and the English case in Preston.

The assistant vice-chancellor, in Dias v. Glover, supra, very conclusively questions the solidity of Mr. Preston's opinion. He observes: "It is true that Mr. Preston says (1 Prest. Est. 182): 'In point of fact, and agreeable to natural reason, the husband and wife are distinct and individual persons, and, accordingly, when lands are granted to them as tenants in common, thereby treating them without any respect to their social union, they will hold by moieties, as other distinct and individual persons would do." He cites 1 Inst. 187b, only. I find nothing in the place referred to bearing upon this position, unless it be the rule laid down that if a man makes a lease to A, and to a baron and feme—that is to A for life, to the husband in tail, and to the feme for years—in this case it is said that each has a third part in respect to the severalties of their estates.

"In Mr. Preston's work on Abstracts (vol. 2, p. 41) he states this position more reservedly: 'And even a husband and wife may, by express words (at least, so the law is understood), be made tenants in common, by a gift to them during coverture.'"

Therefore the citations from Bishop, Washburn, Kent and the New Jersey report are virtually based upon the single English case which is contrary to all the English and common-law decisions, and is not held by Vice-Chancellor Hoffman as good authority. If it be conceded that a conveyance can be made to husband and wife, under the common law, by proper words, so as to create them tenants in common, then the reason on which the rule of an estate in entirety was founded has ceased to exist, and, there being no reason for the rule, such estate should not be adopted or recognized: "for," says Blackstone, "husband and wife being considered as one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety per tout, et non per my."

Again; as one of the reasons for the recognition of estates in entirety, it is suggested in the opinion that such a rule is beneficial to married women, because the life tables show the expectancy of life for women is greater than for men of the same age and health. In this case the wife, Mrs. Alice Baker, died before her husband, and it will be no satisfaction to her children to be informed that they are denied the right to inherit any part of the estate their mother had in her property in her lifetime, because, as a general rule, estates in entirety do not take away from married women their rights or privileges. This denial of inheritance, in my opinion, is in conflict with chapter 33, Compiled Laws 1885, being the Act relating to descents and distributions. Section 28 of that chapter reads:

"All the provisions hereinbefore made in relation to a widow of a deceased husband shall be applicable to the husband of a deceased wife. Each is entitled to the same rights or portion in the estate of the other, and like interests shall in the same manner descend to their respective heirs. The estates of dower and by curtesy are abolished." And section 29 reads: "... Children of a deceased parent inherit in equal proportions the portion their father or mother would have inherited if living." See also the other sections of said chapter 33.

But I do not accept the conclusion announced, that estates in entirety are beneficial to married women on account of the life tables. While some of these tables show that the expectancy of life for women, including married and single, is greater than that for men, all of the tables show that from the age of ten to thirty-five the female rate of mortality exceeds the male. 10 Chambers' Encyclopedia, 2.

It is also shown, by the experience of assurance officers, that, while female annuitants are longer lived than male, female assured lives are no better. Id. The majority of women who ever marry are married before they reach the age of thirty-five, the greater number under thirty. Therefore the life tables do not show conclusively that the expectancy of life for wives is greater than that for men. The ratio of male to female mortality differs considerably at different ages.

A very large number of decided cases are cited as supporting estates in entirety. These authorities, however, are not to be accepted as conclusive in this State: First. The Constitution and Statutes of Kansas are more liberal than those of many States in recognizing the rights and privileges of women. Second. The courts generally have been very slow in conceding the wife to be the companion and equal of the husband, and entitled to enjoy equally with him the rights of property.

Under the ancient doctrine of the common law, where estates in entirety originated, the husband and wife were not only one person in law, but the very being or legal existence of the woman was suspended during the marriage, or at least was incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing, protection and cover she performed everything, and is therefore called, in law French, a feme covert—femina viro cooperta; and was said to be covert baron, or under the protection and influence of her husband, her baron or lord; and her condition during her marriage was called her coverture. 1 Cooley, Bl. 8d ed. 442.

In this State a husband and wife are two independent persons, and the husband has no more immediate interest or control over the property of the wife than any other person. Our system of marriage literally implies the equality of the husband and wife; the integrity and individuality of each; the mutual obligation in which love and duty find no bondage; the division of labor; and the multiplication and sharing of happiness.

"Marriage involves neither the assumption of indebtedness, nor the acquisition of property. A married woman may contract and be contracted with concerning her separate real and personal property; sell, convey and incur the same; sue and be sued without reference thereto—in the same manner, and to the same extent, and with like effect, and as freely as any other person may in regard to his or her real or personal property. She may purchase property from her husband, perform labor and services on her sole and separate account. She has the same control of her person and property as her husband. She has the same right as to the nurture, education and control of her children, and also the same rights in the possession of the homestead. Knaggs v. Mastin, 9 Kan. 532; Tallman v. Jones, 18 Kan. 488; Going v. Orns, 8 Kan. 85; Larimer v. Kelley, 10 Kan. 298; Butler v. Butler, 21 Kan. 526. She may participate in all city elections, attend caucuses, nominate candidates, and vote for such persons and principles as her judgment dictates. In fact, in Kansas a woman is in nearly all matters accorded civil and political equality with man. She is not his servant, nor his slave." State v. Walker, 86 Kan. 311. See chapter 62, Comp. Laws 1885.

Then again, this court heretofore has been fearless in disregarding doctrines founded upon circumstances peculiar to England, but not applicable to the society and institutions of this country.

In Simpson v. Munde, 3 Kan. 172, as far back as 1865, this court wiped out the "indescribable myth" known as the "English Vendors' Lien," although the great weight of authorities, under the common law, recognized and enforced it.

In Norris v. Corkill, 82 Kan. 409, notwithstanding the numerous decisions of various States that the husband is liable for the torts of his wife, under the common law, this court held that, considering the liberal provisions of the statutes regarding married women, the common-law rule was changed, and that the husband was not liable for slanderous words spoken by his wife.

In Butler v. Butler, 21 Kan. 521, the writer of that opinion inclined to the belief that, notwithstanding the great weight of authority under the common law, a voluntary conveyance by a woman, just prior to her marriage, without the knowledge of the husband, was not a fraud upon his marital rights. This upon the ground that the rights and privileges of married women have been so changed by the laws of the State from the common law that the reason for any such rule failed, and therefore the rule itself ceased.

The case of Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106, in which the opinion was written by Mr. Justice Strong, afterwards one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, is strongly relied upon. That decision, however, is founded upon the case of Pettit v. Fretz, 33 Pa. 1118, where the Married Woman's Act of Pennsylvania is so construed as not to give the wife the absolute right to dispose of her estate as a feme sole. To show that the decision is not applicable to our State, I merely quote a part of the opinion: "If the Married Woman's Act of April 11, 1848, were literally interpreted . . . we could not fail to see that it would work a repeal of our old statutes of conveyancing, which the Legislature had exhibited no intention to repeal; that it would change the law of actions; that it would expose wives continually to the hazards of barter and business, without that aid and protection which the common law entitled her to receive from her husband; that it would dethrone him from the headship of the family, take her thoughts and time from the care of the family, and introduce confusion and discord, which would in their turn entail upon the public evils tenfold greater than those which the statute was intended to remedy . . . The marriage relation is the foundation of our social organization. If we are not to stand by the 'ancient landmarks,' while the Legislature leaves them untouched—if, taking the words of the enactment, we are to run them out into all possible constructions, however attenuated, and however remote from the great central idea—we shall substitute a judicial system of concubinage in Pennsylvania for the common-law relation of marriage; for so soon as the material interests of the relation are severed at all points, and for all purposes, marriage will become a mere partnership of convenience, to be formed and dissolved like other partnerships when the partners think they can do better for themselves." Therefore the decision of Diver v. Diver, when construed in connection with the decision of Pettit v. Fretz, supra, therein referred to, is no authority for this court to follow.

This court, unlike the Pennsylvania Courts, has never dwarfed or limited by construction the statutes respecting the rights of married women, for fear "that it would dethrone the husband from the headship of the family, take the thoughts and time of the wife from the care of the family, and introduce confusion and discord, which would in their turn entail upon the public evils tenfold greater than those which the statutes were intended to remedy." The statute concerning the common law reads: "The common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions and the condition and wants of the people, shall remain in force in aid of the General Statutes of this State; but the rule of the common law that statutes in derogation thereof shall be strictly construed shall not be applicable to any general statute of this State; but all such statutes shall be liberally construed to promote their object." Section 3, chap. 119, Comp. Laws 1885.

In this State, as I have already shown, the statutes and decisions recognize the separate existence of the wife, her separate property, her separate contracts and her separate suits. Therefore the nice distinction created in the ancient books of estates in entirety are not, in my opinion, in line with our constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions and the condition and wants of the people. In the language of the old Massachusetts Statute (1785, chap. 62): "Tenancies in common are more beneficial to the Commonwealth and more in consonance with the genius of Republics." In 1 Swift, Syst. 272, Judge Swift remarks that the odious and unjust doctrine of survivorship was never adopted in his State. In my view I am supported by the decisions of many strong and able courts:

In Cooper v. Cooper, 76 Ill. 57, it was said that "Under the legislation of this State, giving married women the right to acquire property, and hold the same free from their husband's control, the reason for the rule which holds that a conveyance to husband and wife makes them tenants by the entirety, with right of survivorship, has ceased to exist, and they will, in this State, take and hold as tenants in common."

In Hoffman v. Stigers, 28 Iowa, 302, it was held that "Under our law joint tenancies, and in entirety, are not favored, and a conveyance to two or more persons in their own right creates a tenancy in common, unless a contrary intent is expressed. And this rule, under our statute, applies to a conveyance, whether by judgment or deed, vesting the estate in a husband and wife jointly." In the opinion in that case it was also said: "And as the courts in most of the States condemn entailments or perpetuities, so we do and should joint tenancies, or at least their common-law incident—the right of survivorship."

J. Clark v. Clark, 56 N. H. 106, it was decided that tenancies by entirety became inoperative by the passage of the Act of 1860 in relation to married women. In that opinion it was said: "It appears that the testator died in 1862, after the Act in regard to the estates of married women took effect, whereby married women, so far as their property not derived from their husbands was concerned, became practically endowed with the rights and subject to the liabilities of unmarried women. That mysterious joint tenancy, in which the subtle genius of the English real law so much delighted itself, where the tenants took not per my et per tout, but by entireties, could no longer arise. The existence of a married woman, so far as her property is concerned, is no longer by our law merged into that of her husband; but she has become a separate being, endowed, so far as her separate estate is concerned, with the powers and subjected to the liabilities of unmarried women."

In Walshall v. Gores, 36 Ala. 728, the syllabus reads: "At common law, under a devise to husband and wife during coverture, the entire estate vested in both of them as one person, and on the death of either continued in the survivor; but under the statutes of this State creating and regulating the separate estates of married women (Code, §§ 1981-1997), such devise creates the same estate in the parties as if it had been made before coverture. On the death of the wife intestate, her undivided moiety descends to her heirs at law, subject to the statutory rights of her surviving husband during his life; and on the subsequent death of the husband the wife's heirs become entitled to the possession of her undivided moiety." In that opinion it was said:

"Article 8, chap. 1, tit. 5, pt. 2, of the Code, relates expressly to separate estates of married women. Code, p. 880. The seventeen sections which compose that article embody the principles of a new policy with reference to married women, which was unknown to the common law. Smith v. Smith, 30 Ala. 648. One of the principles embodied in the provisions of the Code here referred to is that the distinct existence of the wife as a legal person is so far recognized as to enable her to take an estate separate from her husband. Code, §§ 1982, 1983," etc.

In Whittlesey v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 387, I find the following language: "But it is said that although this estate has all the incidents of a joint tenancy, yet that the relation of husband and wife is such that they cannot receive an estate by moieties, but that each must be seised of the entirety, and, of course, that no part of the property so held can be conveyed by one of them. And that such is the doctrine of the English books cannot be doubted. Husband and wife cannot take by moieties, during the coverture, and he has no power to sever the jointure, nor to dispose of any part of the land . . . And the reason given is that husband and wife are one. If that were the real reason, it is very difficult to see why a deed to the wife would not be, in effect, a deed to the husband and wife, and vice versa . . . But in Connecticut we cannot learn that it was ever recognized as a law of our State. On the contrary, so far as we are informed, deeds or devises of lands to husband and wife have been considered as vesting the estate conveyed in the same manner as to other persons. The wife having a separate existence, so as to be able to take by a deed to herself, her identity has not been considered as destroyed, from the fact that the conveyance was to her and to her husband, by one and the same instrument. Estates have been, as we believe, frequently, and, so far as we are informed, uniformly, settled upon that principle; and, although no adjudged case has been shown upon this subject, this practical construction is in such strict accordance with the common understanding, so conformable to the simplicity of our practice, and to the general principles of our law, and has been so long acquiesced in, as to afford high evidence of the question having been settled by the highest authority."

In Ohio it was held, in 1826, that joint tenancy never existed in that State, and that a devise made to husband and wife gives them the rights of tenancy in common. The court, in speaking of joint tenancy, says: "The reasons which give rise to this description of estate in England never existed with us. The right of survivorship is not founded in principles of natural justice, nor in any reason of policy applicable to our society and institutions; but, on the contrary, it is adverse to the understandings, habits and feelings of the people." Sergeant v. Steinberger, 2 Ohio, 305.

In Penn v. Cox, 16 Ohio, 30, it was held that the doctrine of survivorship did not apply where the land had been sold to the husband and wife, and that the Act regulating descents and distributions embraced the whole subject of descents, and was intended to provide for all cases. Wilson v. Fleming, 13 Ohio, 68.

In Meeker v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 262, it was decided that "Where, since the passage of the Act of 1860 concerning the rights and liabilities of husband and wife, lands have been conveyed to the husband and wife jointly, without any statement in the deed as to the manner in which the grantee shall hold, they are tenants in common."

Subsequently, in Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 153, that decision was overruled by a divided court. The reasons, however, given for that decision do not apply in this State; for in the opinion it is stated that, under the Statutes of New York, "The ability of the wife to make contracts is limited. Her general engagements are absolutely void, and she can bind herself by contract only as she is expressly authorized to do so by statute. A husband still has his common-law right of tenancy by the curtesy. Although section 7 of the Act of 1860 authorizes a married woman to maintain an action against any person for an injury to her person or character, yet we have held that she cannot maintain an action against her husband for such an injury; and so it was held, notwithstanding the Acts of 1848, 1849 and 1860, that the common-law disability of husband and wife growing out of their unity of person to convey to each other still existed. White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 383; Winans v. Peebles, 32 N. Y. 423; Meeker v. Wright, 76 N. Y. 262, 270.

It is believed, also, that the common-law rules as to the liability of the husband for the torts and crimes of his wife are still substantially in force." See, to the contrary, the decisions of this court already quoted, and, among others, Norris v. Corkill, supra.

It is claimed, however, that some of the decisions favorable to the view I maintain are not in point, because of express statutes concerning joint tenancy and tenancy in common. If I read these decisions correctly, several of them are made solely upon the ground that the statutes giving to the wife her separate property rescind or abrogate the rule that a conveyance to husband and wife makes them tenants by the entirety, with right of survivorship. Further than this, it has been expressly decided by courts adopting estates in entirety that statutes abolishing joint tenancy have no application to a joint estate of husband and wife, or an estate in entirety. Diver v. Diver, supra. In that case it was said: "Nor does the Act of March 31, 1812, which abolished survivorship among joint tenants, apply to such an estate [in entirety], for it is not a joint tenancy."

In Marburg v. Cole, 49 Md. 402, which is a decision sustaining estates in entirety, it was said: "The Code, art. 49, § 12, being the codification of the Act of 1822, chap. 162, provides that no instrument of conveyance shall be construed to create a joint tenancy, unless it is expressly provided that the property shall be held in joint tenancy. But, as we have seen, the estate conveyed to husband and wife in a deed like the one before us is not to them as joint tenants at the common law, and hence the statute just referred to does not affect or apply to such an estate as that conveyed to husband and wife. This has been expressly so held by this court, in the case of Craft v. Wilcox, 4 Gill, 504. Similar statutes to our own exist in a large number of the States of the Union, converting joint tenancies at the common law into tenancies in common, except where, in the instrument, it is otherwise expressly declared; and the invariable construction has been that they do not apply to or affect the peculiar estate taken by husband and wife under a deed to them jointly." 4 Kent, Com. 863.

I therefore, if the decisions adopting or sustaining estates in entirety are to be followed, the various statutes referred to in the opinion concerning joint tenancy and tenancy in common cannot have much force, because estates in entirety are founded upon the incapacity of the husband and wife to take separately, or by moieties, and in these statutes estates in entirety are not expressly stated. If the doctrine of estates in entirety be the proper one, then the statutes referring to conveyances made to two or more are not applicable to estates in entirety, because those estates are also founded upon the doctrine that husband and wife are one in law, and one only. Therefore conveyances to two or more do not apply to a conveyance made to husband and wife, if they are only one in law.

Again, at common law, the right to control the possession of the estate of the wife under such a conveyance, during their joint lives, is in the husband, as it is when the wife is sole seised. The husband, by that law, has, during coverture, the usufruct of all the real estate which his wife has in fee simple, fee tail, or for life. So, also, under the common law, the husband has the right to make a lease of the estate conveyed in fee to him and his wife, which will be good against the wife during coverture, and will fail only in the event of his wife surviving him.

This view of the common law is stated by Mr. Chief Justice Nelson, in Barber v. Harris, 15 Wend. 616. Where a deed of real estate is made to the husband and wife, "Each is seised of the entirety; but, being one person, there can be no moiety or separate estate between them, and the husband, therefore, cannot forfeit or alienate the estate, because the whole of it belongs to the wife as well as to him . . . During the life of the husband he undoubtedly has the absolute control of the estate of the wife, and can convey or mortgage it for that period."

Mr. Chief Justice Beasley, in Washburn v. Burns, 84 N. J. L. 18, announces the doctrine to be, "When an estate in land is vested in husband and wife as an entirety under the common law, the husband is entitled to the use and possession of the property during the joint lives of himself and wife. During this period the wife has no interest in or control over the property." See also Pray v. Stebbins, 1 New Eng. Rep. 521, 141 Mass. 219; Topping v. Sadler, 5 Jones (N. C.), 357; Jones v. Strong, 6 Ired. L. 867.

This view of the matter is contrary to the decision in Diver v. Diver, supra, but that decision upon the power of the wife to use and possess the property conveyed to her and her husband, during coverture, is in conflict with the majority of decisions recognizing estates in entirety.

If we are to follow precedent in preference to principle, and adopt the old law of Great Britain concerning estates in entirety, it seems to me that the weight of authority should also be followed to the effect that the wife has no interest or control over such estate during the joint lives of herself and husband. The ancient theory that husband and wife are one person in law, and one only, in view of our society and institutions, is, in my opinion, a mere fiction or myth, without any substance or reason, which it is useless and illogical to perpetuate. If husband and wife, in taking, holding and possessing property, are two persons, instead of one only, as our Constitution and laws recognize, and if husband and wife can take the estate by moieties, as our laws permit, then the reason for the existence of an estate in entirety has wholly ceased, and such estates should not be recognized in this State. Such an estate was called "an oasis in the desert of the common law," when that law conferred wealth and power upon the husband, and poverty and dependence upon the wife. But in the condition of things under our Constitution, laws and society, the excuse or reason for such estates is not to me apparent.

For the foregoing reasons I wholly dissent from the views expressed in the opinion, and also dissent from the judgment rendered. I think Frank A. Baker and Alice Baker, his wife, were tenants in common, and not tenants in entirety, of the premises conveyed to them by Joshua Baker on November 23, 1877, and therefore, that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES

v.

George K. TOZER.

1. An indictment under section 2 of the Interstate Commerce Act, for "unjust discrimination," need not aver by what particular device the defendant managed to discriminate in favor of a particular shipper.
2. Counts under the third section, for "undue and unreasonable preference" and for "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," need not allege that the service for which a different rate was charged was rendered "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions"—those words being only found in the fourth section, in relation to greater charge for shorter haul.
3. A count under the third section is sufficient if it shows with requisite certainty by any apt language that the accused has committed an act which gives one shipper or class of shippers an advantage, or subjects others to a disadvantage.

4. A count under the third section, charging the subjection of a certain locality to an undue prejudice, by charging its merchants a higher rate for transporting property to a certain point than was exacted from residents of a certain other locality, must show with precision that the lower rate was for transportation between the same points as the higher rate.
5. A count under the sixth section, alleging the allowance of a rate less than the established and published rate which "was in force on that day," sufficiently negatives the inference that the rate might have been reduced by the carrier without notice, as permitted by that section.
6. When an agent of a railroad is prosecuted under the Interstate Commerce Act, it is not necessary either to allege or prove that the particular unlawful act complained of was done under authority conferred by its principal or by its direction; it is sufficient to show that the ac-

ON demurrer to an indictment in five counts, under the Interstate Commerce Act. Demurrer overruled, except as to one count.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Wm. Thomas P. Bashaw, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Chas. Claiborne Allen for the United States, contra.

Thayer, D. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an indictment containing five counts founded on the Interstate Commerce Act approved February 4, 1887. 24 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 370.

A demurrer has been filed to the several counts which raises the various questions to be decided.

The first count charges the defendant, who is alleged to be an agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, with unjust discrimination in that he charged the Hayward Grocery Company or suffered and permitted it to be charged at the rate of forty-six cents per 100 pounds on sugars shipped from Hannibal, Missouri, to Helper, Kansas over the line of the Missouri Pacific Railway, whereas at or about the same date he charged the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad for transportation of sugar between the same points and over the same line, at the rate of only thirty-four cents per 100 pounds.

The particular objection made to this count appears to be that the count does not show whether the discrimination was accomplished by granting to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad a "special rate, rebate or drawback" or by some other device.

The point is obviously not well taken, as section 2 of the Act, under which the count is framed, makes it utterly immaterial how the discrimination was effected, whether by a special rate accorded to one shipper and denied to another, or by a "rebate, drawback or other device." The offense defined by the second section consists in an "unjust discrimination" no matter how it is effected, whether directly or indirectly; and for that reason it is unnecessary to aver in an indictment by what particular device the defendant managed to discriminate in favor of a particular shipper.

The second, third and fourth counts of the indictment are founded on the third section of

The second count charges that defendant willfully and unlawfully gave an undue and unreasonable preference and advantage to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company in that he charged the Hayward Grocery Company at the rate of forty-six cents per hundred for the transportation of one barrel of sugar from Hannibal, Missouri, to Helper, Kansas, and at or about the same time only charged the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company at the rate of thirty-four cents per 100 for the transportation of two barrels of sugar between the same points.

The fourth count charges the defendant with subjecting a locality, to wit: the City of Hannibal, to an undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, by demanding and collecting of divers merchants doing business in Hannibal, greater compensation for transporting property from Hannibal to Helper, Kansas, than he demanded and collected of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, "for the transportation of property, transported for divers persons in the City of Chicago . . . over the lines of railroad of said Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company and said Missouri Pacific Railway Company to said Town of Helper."

It is insisted that the second, third and fourth counts are each bad, because the pleader does not aver, in the language of the statute, that the service referred to as having been rendered for the parties named, and charged for at a different rate, was rendered "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

If these counts were framed under the fourth section, for violation of the long and short haul clause of the Act, in which section the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" are used to describe the offense—the point made would be well taken.

Co.* 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 375. The burden is on the carrier to justify any departure from the rules prescribed by the statutes. Re Southern R. & Steamship Assn. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 278.

But in framing a count under the third section it is not necessary to use the language last quoted. A count under the third section is sufficient if it shows with requisite certainty, by any apt language, that the accused has committed an act which gives one shipper or class of shippers an advantage, or subjects others to a disadvantage. The second and third counts of the present indictment clearly show that defendant charged and received of the Hayward Grocery Company a greater rate of compensation than he charged and received of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, for transporting the very same class of goods between the same points and over the same route. These counts are sufficient in law although the pleader does not aver that the service rendered to each party was rendered "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." The fact that it was so rendered sufficiently appears without that averment.

The fourth count in my opinion lacks the requisite precision of statement, and as it is demurred to on that ground, as well as on the ground last mentioned, it will be adjudged insufficient. It is uncertain whether the pleader intended to charge that defendant demanded of merchants doing business in Hannibal greater compensation for the transportation of goods from that city to Helper than he demanded of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company for the transportation of goods between the same points, or greater compensation than he demanded of the latter company for transporting goods from Chicago to Helper. The fourth count appears to be susceptible of either construction and for that reason, if for no other, the demurrer ought to be sustained.

The fifth count of the indictment is based on the sixth section of the Act and alleges in substance that the defendant on June 15, 1887, as agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company charged and collected of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad a less rate of compensation for the transportation of goods from Hannibal to Helper, than the "established and published" rate of freight charges over the Missouri Pacific Railway between those points.

To this count the objection is made that it is not averred that the Missouri Pacific Railway had not, on that date, reduced its published freight rate between Hannibal and Helper, as it was privileged to do under the sixth section, without notice.

This objection is not tenable for the reason that the pleader does allege that a given freight rate of forty-six cents per 100 pounds between the two points last named, had been "established and published" prior to June 15, 1887, and that said rate "was in force on that day" when the unlawful charge is said to have been made. This averment deprives the objection of the force it would otherwise have. It shows that no reduction in the established rate had taken place, and that the rate accorded to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad was not given in conformity with a general reduction in freight rates, but was an advantage allowed to it over other customers.

A further and final objection made to the whole indictment is that it does not show that the defendant as agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, had any authority to do the acts charged in the various counts.

This objection does not strike me with any force.

It is alleged in each count that defendant was agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company and had general charge of its freight office at Hannibal, Missouri.

Section 10 of the Interstate Commerce Act renders any agent of a railroad company that is subject to the provisions of the Act, amenable to the penalties denounced therein, if he either alone or with any other person or corporation willfully does any of the acts prohibited or declared to be unlawful.

When an agent of a railroad is prosecuted under the statute for an unlawful act, it is not necessary in my opinion either to allege or prove that the particular unlawful act complained of was done under authority conferred by his principal or by its direction. It is sufficient to show that the accused was in fact an agent of a railroad subject to the provisions of the Act, and that the wrong was committed under color of his office or agency. Whether in the particular matter complained of the agent exceeded his power, is certainly immaterial in a prosecution against the agent. If it has any bearing on the question at issue, the fact that the agent has exceeded his powers in violating the law ought to aggravate the offense rather than excuse it.

The demurrer is overruled as to all the counts except the fourth, as to which it is sustained for the reasons before stated.

ON defendant's exceptions. Sustained.

This was an action of tort to recover damages resulting from an alleged defect in the Warren Bridge, a public highway of the City of Boston.

At the trial in the superior court (before Blodgett, J.), the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant alleged exceptions.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Andrew J. Bailey for defendant.
Messrs. Francis S. Hesselstine and William H. Hart for plaintiff.

Morton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was tried upon the second count in the declaration, and the only question before us is whether the defendant is liable by reason of a defect in a highway. The facts are not in dispute. Warren Bridge is a part of a highway which the City of Boston is bound to keep in repair. Stat. 1874, § 259.

The plaintiff was intending to drive across the bridge. When he reached it, the gateman was in the act of closing the gate; seeing the plaintiff he opened the gate and beckoned him on. The plaintiff drove on and when his horse had put his fore feet upon the draw it was moved by the draw tender and the plaintiff and his horse and vehicle were thrown into the river.

The gates provided by the city were suitable and the gateman and draw tender were competent persons. To render the city liable the plaintiff must prove that he received an injury through a defect or want of repair or of sufficient railing in the highway or bridge, which might have been remedied or which injury might have been prevented by reasonable care and diligence on the part of the city and that the city had notice of the defect or might have had notice by the exercise of proper care and diligence on its part. Pub. Stat. 52, § 18.

We are of opinion that the facts of this case do not bring it within the letter or the spirit of this statute. The injury to the plaintiff was caused by the momentary negligence of the gateman or the draw tender, for which they may be liable, but for which the city is not liable. Novell v. Wright, 8 Allen, 186; McDougall v. Salem, 110 Mass. 21; French v. Boston, 129 Mass. 592.

It seems to us a misuse of terms to say that the injury happened through a defect in the street, of which the city had notice, and which it might have remedied by reasonable diligence.

The draw tender is required by law to open the draw for the passage of vessels. The law contemplates that it shall frequently be opened. The open draw, though it made the street dangerous, was not a defect under the statute. Nor can the city be held liable because at the moment when the plaintiff went upon the bridge the gateman opened the gate. If this was negligence on his part he may be liable. Novell v. Wright, supra.

But the city had supplied a sufficient draw and suitable gates, and had employed competent persons to manage them. The injury to the plaintiff was caused, not by any failure of the city to perform its duty, but, as we have before said, by a momentary negligence of the gateman. For this negligence the city is not responsible; and it cannot be indirectly held liable upon the theory that this negligence created a defect in the street which the city by reasonable diligence might have remedied. We are therefore of opinion that the instructions of the learned justice who presided at the trial were erroneous.

Messrs. Richardson & Hall for respondent, William C. Craig.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testator devised his dwelling house to his wife for her life, and added: "But on her decease I give and devise the same to my surviving children to be divided equally between them."

Five children survived the testator, but only two survived the wife; and the question is, whether the word surviving relates to the time of the testator's death, or to that of his wife's death. According to the natural use of language, it has reference to the latter event. It is placed in close connection with her decease. No reference is made to the time of his own death in any part of the will. The word surviving would be unnecessary and meaningless if he meant to give the remainder of the estate to all of his children.

The children surviving on her decease must be taken to be the devisees intended. See Denny v. Kettell, 185 Mass. 188, and cases there cited.

*Conversion of negotiable instrument.

Defendants, the payees and holders of a promissory note, desiring to raise money on it, wrote their names on the back of it, and applied to plaintiffs to discount it. Upon their request defendants left the note with them for the sole purpose of giving them an opportunity of ascertaining as to the solvency of the makers. Subsequently the plaintiffs refused either to discount the note, or to return it to defendants. Thereupon defendants brought suit against them to recover the value of the note thus wrongfully withheld, in which they obtained judgment, which plaintiffs paid. Held, that defendants were not liable as indorsers; that payment of the judgment invested plaintiffs with title to the converted property as of the date of the conversion, which was merely the obligation of the makers of the note, without any contract of indorsement by defendants—no such contract ever having been consummated.

(January 16, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs, from an order of the District Court of Hennepin County (Hicks, J.), overruling a demurrer to the answer in an action against defendants as indorsers of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts, and question presented, are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John H. Randall and A. J. Shores for appellants.

Messrs. Stocker & Matchan for respondents.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were sued as indorsers of a promissory note, which it was alleged they indorsed and sold to plaintiffs. The defendants answered that, wishing to raise money on the note by getting it discounted, they wrote their names on the back of it, and then applied to the plaintiffs to discount it; that, at plaintiff's request, they left the note with them for a day, for the sole purpose of affording them an opportunity to ascertain the solvency of the makers; that defendants subsequently demanded a return of the note, which plaintiffs wrongfully refused; that thereupon they brought an action against the plaintiffs for the value of the note thus wrongfully taken and held, in which they obtained judgment for such value, which the plaintiffs subsequently paid. From an order overruling their demurrer to this answer plaintiffs appeal.

The line of argument by which plaintiffs seek to hold the defendants liable is, in brief, as follows: payment of the judgment invested them with title to the property converted, of which they are to be deemed the purchasers, their title relating back to the date of the conversion; that, as defendants indorsed the note with a view of selling it as indorsed paper, if they had sold it in that form they would have been liable as indorsers; that by bringing their action for damages they elected to sell it, and the plaintiffs were compelled to become purchasers of it, that what defendants thus elected to sell, and the plaintiffs were compelled to purchase by payment of the judgment, was the property in the form in which it was converted, to wit: the note of the makers indorsed by defendants.

This argument is certainly ingenious, but, as it seems to us, unsound. The payment of the judgment neither created any new property, nor added any new force to the note, or to anything written upon it, but merely vested in the plaintiffs title to the converted property as it existed at the date of the conversion. All that plaintiffs converted, and hence all they acquired title to by payment of the judgment, was the note of the makers. True, it had the names of the defendants upon the back of it; but this did not constitute a contract of indorsement, for no such contract had ever been made. The fallacy in plaintiffs' argument consists in assuming that what they converted was the note of the makers, with defendants' contract of indorsement upon it. Literally, the word indorsement means merely to write on the back; but technically, as applied to a note, it means a contract to pay on certain conditions.

In this case no such contract was ever consummated. Had defendants brought an action of claim and delivery, all they would have recovered would have been the note of the makers, or its alternative value. In the action for conversion, all they could recover was the value of the paper as the obligation of makers; and hence that is all that the plaintiffs acquired title to by payment of the judgment.

Suppose, instead of a note, the property had been a horse, which defendants had offered to sell with a warranty, and the plaintiffs had obtained possession merely for the purposes of trial, and had subsequently refused to buy or to return the property, and defendant had brought an action for damages for the wrongful conversion. Could there be any doubt that the measure of damages would be the actual value of the horse, and not what it would have been if according to the proposed warranty?—Or would anyone claim that after payment of the judgment in such a case the plaintiffs could maintain an action on the proposed warranty? Clearly not, for the simple reason that the contract of warranty, like that of indorsement in this case, was never in fact entered into or consummated.

The cases where the execution and delivery of a promissory note were procured by fraud are not analogous. There a contract has in fact been entered into, although voidable on account of the fraud. By electing to sue for damages instead of rescinding, the maker elects to let the note stand as his contract. In the present case no contract whatever was ever made.

1. A complaint for injuries sustained by a traveler on a highway, alleging that he was injured without any fault or negligence on his part, sufficiently avers his freedom from contributory negligence—although it states that he was riding on an embankment thrown up by a railroad company along side the track for which an excavation had been dug in the highway, where such embankment was the only place of passage.
2. A railroad company which has made an excavation in a highway for its track, throwing up an embankment on which travelers may pass, and has failed in its duty to so restore the highway as not unnecessarily to impair its use, is liable for injury sustained by a traveler riding on such embankment, where his horse is frightened by the running of a hand car on the track, although, if the company had been free from fault respecting the highway, there might have been no right of action on account of the hand car.
3. Knowledge that there is some danger in attempting to ride along a highway on an embankment thrown up by a railroad company—which has failed to restore the highway to its proper condition—will not preclude a recovery for injuries sustained in consequence of the fright of a horse occasioned by the running of a hand car, where the traveler was using the only highway which led to or from his home; nor was plaintiff bound to use more than ordinary care.
4. An opinion as to rate of speed of a moving hand car on a specified occasion may be expressed by a witness who managed hand cars or assisted in managing them.
5. A physician speaking as an expert can testify as to the effect of a personal injury.

6. The refusal of instructions asked after the argument has begun is not error.

(January 2, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Greene County (Buff, J.), in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for a personal injury. Affirmed.

The complaint was in three paragraphs, each of which contained in addition to the allegations set out in the opinion, the following statement of the injury received by plaintiff:

"Whereby she was greatly injured in this: the tibia or shin bone in her left leg was fractured and broken near about one and one half inches above the ankle joint; the bones of the ankle and heel were wrenched out of place and dislocated, and the tendons lacerated and torn loose, so that such injuries will leave her a cripple for life; that three of her ribs were broken, and her spine was greatly injured, in such a manner as to be incurable; by reason of which injuries plaintiff became, and is now, and will be permanently, lame, crippled and sick, and has been ever since entirely disabled from attending to her business, and will be so disabled in future."

Each paragraph of the complaint was demurred to by the defendant, but the demurrers were overruled, and such overruling was assigned as error.

Defendant moved to strike out the following question and answer in the deposition of Dr. Crowder "for the reason that the same is immaterial and irrelevant, and because plaintiff has not sued for an injury occasioned by fracturing the fibula." Question. "State what in your judgment from the examination made, and your knowledge as a physician and surgeon, was the immediate cause of the injury." Answer. "I think the fibula had been fractured about two inches above the ankle joint, and the internal malleolus had been fractured from the tibia." Defendant also moved to strike out the following portion of an answer in the same deposition: "With the resulting inflammation of the pleura had obstructed the motion of the chest, so that the lower part of the left lung was not normally expanded in respiration;" and also a question and answer relating to a continued pain at the base of the brain, tenderness on pressure on the spine opposite the eighth rib, dilation of the pupils of the eyes at times, impairment of vision at times, loss of memory, and slowness of speech." These motions were denied.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint of the appellee is in three paragraphs. Each avers that the injury for which a recovery is sought was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that plaintiff was injured without any fault or negligence on her part. They each contain these allegations: "That the appellee lived with her father, who owned land not far from the appellant's railroad; that the only means of egress and ingress was a public highway; that the defendant constructed and built the last described line of railroad across, upon and along last described highway for a distance of three quarters of a mile west from the eastern terminus of said last described highway, and unlawfully, carelessly and negligently failed to construct its line of railroad so as not to interfere with the free use of said highway, and so as to afford security for life and property, in this: that the defendant dug an excavation some six feet deep and fifteen feet wide in the highway for a distance of 150 yards, and piled the dirt from said excavation along the sides thereof, making embankments some nine feet high for the distance of 150 yards, leaving no way for persons to pass along the highway except upon the embankment, with the railroad track between; and that the defendant unlawfully, carelessly and negligently failed and still fails in every particular to restore the highway thus intersected to its former state, or in a sufficient manner not to unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchise."

The second and third paragraphs each contains these allegations upon the subject of the defendant's negligence: "That on the 8th day of October, 1886, this plaintiff was lawfully riding her horse upon the highway so impaired, eastward to her home; that while she was so riding along it, between her home and the western highway running north and south, the defendant's agents approached along said railroad from the east in a hand car, and frightened plaintiff's horse, and, knowing the situation of plaintiff, but disregarding their duty, they negligently managed the hand car, in this: that after seeing the dangerous situation in which plaintiff was placed, they failed to stop said hand car, and thereby prevent plaintiff's horse from becoming frightened, and thus prevent plaintiff from being injured; that on account of such negligence, and the negligence of defendant in failing to restore the highway to its former state, or in a sufficient manner not to unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchises, this plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on her part, was greatly injured."

The first paragraph does not contain the allegations last quoted, but does contain, in addition to those already mentioned, the following averments: That on account of the defendant's negligence in failing to restore the highway, the plaintiff, "while riding her horse eastward to her home upon the highway so impaired, on the 8th day of October, 1886, without any fault or negligence on her part, was thrown from her horse" and injured.

The question whether the complaint shows that there was not contributory negligence on the part of the appellee cannot be decided without first ascertaining and determining what duty the appellant owed the public respecting the highway which it had changed from its former condition; for it is important to give due prominence to two essential facts: one is that the plaintiff was in lawful use of a public highway; and the other is that, for its own benefit, the appellant had changed the highway, and negligently failed to restore it to its former condition, thus making its use unsafe and dangerous.

Nor can this question be disposed of without giving just effect to the general averment that there was no fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff. This averment makes the complaint good upon the question of contributory negligence, unless the facts specifically pleaded clearly show that the plaintiff was negligent. We concur with appellant's counsel that, ordinarily, the specific facts will control the general averment if they make it clear that there was contributory negligence. Reynolds v. Cope-land, 71 Ind. 422.

It has, however, long been the rule in this court that unless the facts specifically stated clearly show that there was contributory negligence, the general averment will rescue the complaint from its assailant. In the case of Salem v. Goller, 76 Ind. 291, it was said: "The allegation that he was without fault, like the general averment of negligence, has a technical significance, and admits proof of any facts tending to show its truth."

The cases are collected in Ohio Railway Company v. Walker, 12 West. Rep. 781, 118 Ind. 196, and it was said: "The rule that the general averment is sufficient has been so long established, and so often approved, that we should feel bound to adhere to it even if we doubted its soundness; but we think its soundness can be vindicated on principle. It is in the nature of a negative fact, and an averment of such a fact cannot be made with the same particularity as an affirmative one. The elementary books, recognizing this, agree that in such case a general averment is ordinarily sufficient. It is evident that any other rule would be practically incapable of enforcement, for a negative fact can seldom be alleged except generally and by way of denial, since any other course would require a process of exclusion and elimination that would lead to an almost endless pleading. If the specific facts absolving the plaintiff from fault must be pleaded, then it would be necessary to enumerate every fact that might be considered as tending to charge him with fault, and negative its existence. In some cases this process of enumeration and exclusion would be practically impossible. In others it would lead to a prolixity of pleading that would do no good, but would produce uncertainty and confusion."

The question now in hand, therefore, comes to us, not as one of evidence, but as one of pleading, and therefore as one to be determined under the rule stated. For this reason the cases cited by the appellant which bear upon questions arising on the evidence and on the instructions are not relevant. Testing the complaint by the settled rule, it must be held to show that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, since the specific facts do not clearly negative the general averment. They do not, in truth, negative it in any respect, but, on the contrary, are consistent with it.

The two important facts to which we have referred—the place where the injury was received, and the duty of the appellant respecting the highway it had made unsafe—when assigned their due weight, fully and clearly relieve the plaintiff from any imputation of negligence, especially in this, when considered, as they must be, in connection with the explicit averment of her complaint that she was without fault or negligence. She was upon a public highway leading from her home, and there she had a right to be. She was, it is true, bound to exercise ordinary care in using the highway, but she was not bound to do more. She was not crossing a railroad track, where the rights and duties of the company and a traveler are reciprocal; but she was upon a public way, which the company had no right to use in operating its road, or to make unsafe.

The action is not, it is to be remembered, to recover for injuries received on a crossing, for the complaint proceeds upon a radically different theory. The cases of Indiana Railway Company v. Greene, 3 West. Rep. 888, 106 Ind. 279; Indiana Railway Company v. Hammock, 12 West. Rep. 297, 118 Ind. 1; and Cincinnati Railroad Company v. Butler, 1 West. Rep. 110, 103 Ind. 81—are not in point, for the reason that they were cases where the injury was received on a crossing, and not cases where the interference with a public highway and a negligent breach of duty caused the injury. Throughout this case this difference runs, exerting all through it a controlling influence.

Here the defendant negligently failed to perform a duty imperatively enjoined upon it by positive law. When we come to consider the question of the appellant's negligence, as we shall presently do, we shall state the nature and extent of that duty; but at this point we need only declare that the complaint avers and the demurrer confesses that a statutory duty respecting a public highway was violated, and that this wrong, concurring with another wrong, caused the plaintiff's injury. We do not, of course, decide that the negligent breach of a statutory duty not constituting a willful tort would make the defendant liable if the plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury for which she seeks a recovery; but what we do decide is that the character of the duty and the nature of the place where the injury was received are important factors in the solution of the legal problem.

If it were granted that the plaintiff had knowledge that she would be exposed to some danger in attempting to ride along the highway, made unsafe by the defendant's wrong, that fact of itself would not, in such a case as this, necessarily preclude a recovery. Knowledge is not always a bar to a recovery. It is not a bar in such a case as the present, for the plaintiff was not bound to refrain entirely from using the only highway which gave her access to her home or led from it.

We have many decisions upon this general subject. In one of them it was said: "The appellant, though he saw the engine, was not bound to anticipate all the perils to which he might be exposed in driving past it, or to refrain absolutely from pursuing his usual course on account of unseen and unknown, though probable, risks. Some risks, such as arise from obstructions in highways, are taken constantly by the most prudent of men; and where, as in this case, the party pursues the usual course, believing it to be safe, he is not guilty of contributory negligence. It was a question for the jury, and by their general verdict they have found upon this point in favor of the appellant, and with it this special finding is not irreconcilable or necessarily inconsistent." Turner v. Buchanan, 82 Ind. 147.

A later case contains this statement of the rule: "It is to be determined from the facts of the case whether the known danger is likely to subject the plaintiff to injury; and if it is, then he must be held guilty of negligence in encountering it. While, therefore, it cannot be held that one who does not go out of his way to avoid a known danger is not always guilty of contributory negligence, yet it must be held that he is guilty of negligence where he attempts to pass the danger, where there is such a probability of injury as would deter a reasonable man from assuming the risk of passing it. If the risk is great, or is such as a prudent person would not assume, then the person who does assume it is guilty of such contributory negligence as will preclude a recovery." Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pinchin, 11 West. Rep. 247, 112 Ind. 592.

The principle we assert was applied in a case in all its characteristic features the same as the present. We refer to the case of Evansville Railroad Company v. Carrener 12 West. Rep. 208, 118 Ind. 51.

There are numerous other cases in our reports asserting this general doctrine. Among them are Huntington v. Breen, 77 Ind. 29; Wilson v. Trafalgar & B. O. Gr. Road Co. 83 Ind. 326; Henry County Turnpike Co. v. Jackson, 86 Ind. 111; Nave v. Flack, 90 Ind. 205; Indianapolis v. Murphy, 91 Ind. 832; Louisville etc. R. Co. v. Phillips, 11 West. Rep. 119, 112 Ind. 59.

In a recent edition of a work of excellent standing it is said: "The fact of using a highway after obtaining such knowledge does not necessarily and conclusively establish negligence contributing to an injury resulting from a defect therein." 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 101.

In another work it is said: "And exposure to known danger [is] not always negligence." 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 86.

Very many authorities are cited in support of this proposition. To the authorities there collected may be added the later cases of Pa. Teleg. Co. v. Varnau, 15 Atl. Rep. 624; Gulf etc. R. Co. v. Gascamp (Tex.) 7 S. W. Rep. 227; R. Co. v. Arnold, 4 South. Rep. 259.

But while it is true that knowledge of danger does not necessarily defeat a recovery, yet in all cases it is an important factor, and in many the character of the knowledge and the nature of the danger may be such as to constitute contributory negligence. If the danger is so near and so great that a prudent man, knowing of its existence, would not assume the hazard of encountering it, then it does constitute such contributory negligence as will defeat a recovery. Gosport v. Evans, 11 West. Rep. 115, 112 Ind. 133; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pinchin, supra; Richmond v. Mulholland (Ind.) 18 N. E. Rep. 832; Eckerd v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 358; Fulliam v. Muscatine, 70 Iowa, 436.

It is quite clear that it cannot be said in this case that the danger was one which the plaintiff was bound to shun, or assume at her own peril all the risk attending the attempt to pass it. The case is not one of a plaintiff casting himself upon a known danger which a prudent person would not have encountered.

We come now to the question which, as we have seen, is intimately blended with the one we have already discussed, and that is the negligence of the defendant. The initial step in the defendant's wrong was the negligent violation of a mandatory statute. Section 3903 of the Revised Statutes of 1881 provides for the construction of railroads; and, in prescribing the duties and rights of a railroad company, declares that it shall have the right "to construct its road upon or across any stream of water, watercourse, road, highway, railroad or canal, so as not to interfere with the free use of the same, which the route of its road shall intersect, in such manner as to afford security for life and property; but the corporation shall restore the stream or watercourse, road or highway thus intersected to its former state, or in a sufficient manner not to unnecessarily impair its usefulness or injure its franchises."

This statute prescribes a plain duty. Indeed, the duty existed independent of the statute, but the statute makes it all the more clear and positive. The right to interfere with a highway is coupled with the duty to make it as safe as it was before it was disturbed, or at least to use reasonable care and skill to do so. This duty is violated if there is a failure to restore it to its former condition in all cases where the exercise of reasonable care and skill can effect a restoration. The rule which governs cases of this class is thus stated by a writer of acknowledged accuracy and ability:

"Whenever an act is authorized to be done in a highway that would otherwise be a nuisance, the person or company to whom the power is given is not only bound to exercise it strictly within the provisions of the law, but also with the highest degree of care to prevent injury to the persons or property of those who may be affected by such acts. Hence, where a railroad has been permitted to lay its track along or across a highway, it is bound to the use of every reasonable precaution to prevent injury to those passing along the highway, or crossing its track that is laid along or across the highway; and if it fails to exercise a proper degree of care—not only such as is provided by statute, but also such as is rendered necessary by the character of the obstruction and its location, having reference to a like reasonable exercise of care on the part of those approaching the obstruction—it becomes a nuisance to the extent of its injury to individual rights, and renders the company liable in damages for all the consequences." 2 Wood, Railway Law, § 271.

Possibly the rule is rather too strongly stated; but, strong as the statement is, many well considered cases give it adequate support.

Our own cases recognize and enforce a rule very much the same as that stated by the author from whom we have quoted, although it is perhaps not quite so strongly stated. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stout, 53 Ind. 143; Louisville etc. R. Co. v. Phillips, 11 West. Rep. 119, 112 Ind. 59; Evansville & I. H. R. Co. v. Carner, 12 West. Rep. 203, 113 Ind. 51.

In the case last cited it was said: "Leaving the highway in such a condition as to require the wheels of vehicles passing over the railroad track to be raised nine inches perpendicularly from the surface of the highway in order to pass over the top of the rails was prima facie a negligent interference with the free use thereof. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. State, 37 Ind. 489; Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 31 Minn. 283.

The facts in the complaint before us make a very much stronger case than the one from which we have quoted, and, as the injury is shown to have been caused by the condition of the highway, a strong case is made out. At another place in the opinion from which we have quoted it was said: "A defendant who, in violation of an express statutory duty, places or causes an obstruction in a public highway, will not be heard to say that he did not anticipate an injury which was the direct result of his unlawful act, when the person injured was without fault." Wabash etc. R. Co. v. Locke, 11 West. Rep. 877, 112 Ind. 404.

In harmony with the doctrine declared by the authorities we have cited is this statement in a text book: "Where one has a license to interfere with a highway, as where a railroad company is authorized to lay its track along, under or over a highway, the terms of the license, so far as it directs the manner of such interference, must be strictly complied with. Any other interference is a nuisance." 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 859.

This statement luminously exhibits the law, for it goes back to the fundamental principle that he who unlawfully interferes with a highway creates a nuisance, and is liable in damages to one who suffers a special injury.

It is established law that a complaint which charges negligence in general terms is good on demurrer. This was proved to be the rule by our own decisions, and by other authorities in a case recently decided—that of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Walker, 12 West. Rep. 731, 113 Ind. 196.

As all of the paragraphs of the complaint contained appropriate allegations charging the defendant with negligently failing to discharge its duty, they are good, irrespective of the negligence in running the hand car. The super-added act of negligence, even if it does not strengthen the complaint, certainly does not weaken it. By showing a second wrong, and continuing it with the first so as to form a continuous cause of action, the pleading was, as we believe, strengthened and not weakened. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 7 West. Rep. 396, 109 Ind. 179.

The wrong of the defendant in negligently failing to restore the highway is, as we have seen, of itself sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and the additional act of negligence in the management of the hand car, if not considered as adding strength to the complaint, cannot, at all events, detract from it; but we think that the fact that the defendant, by its own wrong, rendered the highway unsafe, made it necessary for it, in operating its road, to exercise care to prevent injury to one placed in danger by that wrong. We are not dealing with a case where the railroad company was not guilty of any breach of duty respecting the highway on which the plaintiff was traveling, but with a case where, in violation of a positive duty, it wrongfully interfered with a highway. Here the two wrongs blend in one concurring tort. If the appellant was free from fault respecting the public highway, we add, to prevent possible misunderstanding, we should have an entirely different case, and one in which it may be that no action would lie.

A man who has managed hand cars, or assisted in managing them, may express an opinion as to the rate of speed a hand car was moving on a specified occasion. Mr. Lawson says that on questions of speed "the opinion of an ordinary witness is admissible." Exp. Ev. 462.

The reason for the rule is that velocity or speed is a subject which cannot be placed before a jury by a statement of the observed facts. Bennett v. Meehan, 88 Ind. 566; Lohdaugh v. Birdsell, 90 Ind. 466; Carthage Turnp. Co. v. Andrews, 102 Ind. 138, 143; Louisville etc. R. Co. v. Jones, 7 West. Rep. 83, 108 Ind. 551; Salter v. Utica & B. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 631; Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 22 Am. Law. Reg. N. S. 117; Pulsome v. Concord, 46 Vt. 135.

Under the allegations of the complaint it was competent for the plaintiff to prove the nature and extent of her injuries. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Hecht, 17 N. E. Rep. 297.

It was entirely proper to permit a physician, speaking as an expert witness, to testify as to the effect of the injury. Louisville etc. R. Co. v. Wood, 13 West. Rep. 808, 118 Ind. 544.

It is not error to refuse instructions asked after the argument has begun. Bartley v. State, 9 West. Rep. 814, 111 Ind. 888, Terry v. Shindler, 88 Ind. 413, Jolly v. Terre Haute Draw-bridge Co., 9 Ind. 417.

We do not doubt the power of the trial court to order a new trial when the verdict is wrong upon the evidence. This court, however, it is hardly necessary to say, will not weigh the evidence to ascertain where the preponderance is, but it will accept as trustworthy that deemed so by the jury and the trial court. This rule is applicable here, and makes it our duty to sustain the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Mary VANOLINDER et al., Appts., vs.

John T. CARPENTER.

(.....Ill.....)

1. In construing a devise which assumes to give a life estate to the ancestor and the remainder in fee to the "heirs" of such ancestor (the word "heirs" being used in its technical sense as meaning all who are to take generally, and not as the equivalent of "children" or some other partial or restricted class of heirs), the intention to give only a life estate will not control, but under the rule in Shelley's Case (which is in force in Illinois) the ancestor takes the fee.

2. The opinion in Belalay v. Engel, 107 Ill. 123, disapproved and overruled in so far as it places the decision upon the intention of the testator to vest a fee in the legal representatives or legal heirs of the ancestors and not upon the intention of the testator to use the words "legal representatives" or "legal heirs" as synonymous with "children," and therefore as words of purchase and not of limitation.

(January 22, 1889.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Kendall County (Upton, J.), in a suit for the construction of the will of Hiram Bauder, deceased. Affirmed.

The will sought to be construed is as follows:

"I, Hiram Bauder, of the Town of Bristol, County of Kendall and State of Illinois, make this my last will and testament. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary Bauder, and to my daughters, Harriet Elizabeth, Nancy Catherine and Melissa, the use of all my property, after the payments of all debts (except what is hereafter disposed of by this will) to be divided among them as the same would be by law without a will, except that it is my will that

NOTE.—The rule in Shelley's Case stated. Where the ancestor, by any gift of conveyance, taketh an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited, either mediately or immediately, to his heirs, in fee or in tail, "the heirs" are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase. The remainder is immediately executed in possession, in the ancestor so taking the freehold. 1 Coke, 33 b; 1 Preston, Estates, 334; 4 Kent, Com. 213; Baker v. Scott, 22 Ill. 88; *Brislain v. The rule is that, when the word "heir" or "heirs" is used in the will, and there is nothing in the context explaining or controlling its use, or showing a different intention on the part of the testator, it must be interpreted according to its strict and technical import.

Thus construed, the word "heirs" includes and designates the persons upon whom the law would cast the inheritance in case of intestacy, and hold must be taken by the same instrument which contains the limitation to the heirs, and for this purpose a will and codicil will be deemed one instrument. To attract the rule in Shelley's Case the limitations to the ancestor, and to his heirs, must be created by the same instrument (Coape v. Arnold, 2 Bingle & G. 311, 4 DeG. M. & G. 374, Moore v. Parker, 1d. Haym. 37), but the remainder to the heirs. If given by different instruments the rule does not apply. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 668; Co. Litt. 200 h, Butler's note, 301; *Doe v. But a will and schedule to it, are considered as one instrument for the purpose of this rule. Hayes v. Foorda, 2 W. R. 488, 3 Jarman, Will, 110. A will and an annexed codicil are considered as constituting one instrument. So the rule applies, if instead of a grant of a remainder, there appeared in the same instrument a power of appointment to the heirs. Wms. Real Prop. 260; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 668; Hayes v. Foorda, 2 W. R. 488; Tud. Land, Cas. 488, 484; Co. Litt. 200 h, Butler's note, 301, Tillingham v. Coggeshall, 7 R. I. 308. When the remainder is created by different instruments the particular estate will not be enlarged into a fee, though all the other requisites for the application of the rule are present. Coape v. Arnold, 21 Eng. L. & Eq. 122. (3) The interest, devised to the ancestor, and limited to the heirs, must be of the same quality (Baker v. Scott, 22 Ill. 88, Ryan v. Allen, 9 West. Rep. 487, 120 Ill. 648); that is, both must be legal, or both equitable. 2 Minor, Inst. 342; Husband, Inst. 284; Stacey v. Mice, 27 Pa. 73, 31, Bacon's App. 57 Pa. 504, 514, Little v. Wilcox, 11 Cent. Rep. 850, 119 Pa. 439. The rule applies as well to personal property as to realty. Parish v. Parish, 1 Ala. 361, Cas. 518.

Rule applies to equitable as well as legal interests. The rule applies to equitable as well as legal interests; but the estate of the ancestor and the limitation to the heirs must be of the same quality, either legal or equitable. *Striker v. none of the real estate be sold or disposed of for their use except the wood land in the Big Woods, but be kept sacred for their heirs; and I give and bequeath to my adopted boy, William B. Duffet, $200 when he becomes of age, provided he lives with my wife and family till that time or till the family is broken up, which is my wish that he do so; and I bequeath to my mother, Clara Bauder, $25 a year from the income of my property during her natural life. It is my desire that my family remain together," etc.

Just after the execution of the will Bauder died, leaving his widow, Mary Bauder, and the three daughters mentioned in the will. A short time after the testator died, Melissa, one of the daughters, died, leaving no issue. Harriet Elizabeth married John T. Carpenter, defendant herein, about twelve or more years ago. Harriet died, leaving one child, a daughter, named Carrie C. Carpenter, who died in March, 1885, leaving no issue, but leaving a will, in which she makes her father, John T. Carpenter, sole devisee of all her property. The daughter, Nancy Catharine, married Leander Keck, in January, 1884, and is now living, and is one of the complainants herein. She has some three or four children living. Mary Bauder, the widow, is still living, and is also one of the complainants, under the name of Mary Vanolinder, she having remarried.

When Bauder, the testator, died, he left about $5,000 of personal property and some 400 acres of land in Kendall County, a house and lot and a block of land in Montgomery, in Kane County, and the timber land in the Big Woods, mentioned in the will, and being about forty acres. The timber land in the Big Woods was sold as allowed by the will, and the proceeds divided among the devisees by arrangement between them.

In 1863 Mary Bauder, the widow, and Harriet and Nancy, the surviving daughters, made a division of the real and personal estate of the testator between them as follows: Mrs. Bauder took one third of the personal and real estate out first; then they divided two thirds into three equal parts; then Harriet and Nancy deeded to Mrs. Bauder, in addition to the one third taken out by her, one sixth of the real estate; then they divided the balance between Harriet and Nancy equally; and the parties have occupied respectively according to that division.

Carpenter now claims that, by virtue of the will of his daughter he has a present estate of inheritance, and a present right of possession, in all said real estate left by Hiram Bauder to the extent of his wife's right to Melissa's share, as well as her own share which descended to her and his daughter Carrie, in whose will he is devisee; claiming that an immediate estate of inheritance in the real estate descended by the will to Melissa and the other daughters and their mother; an estate of inheritance eo instanti upon the death of the testator, under the rule in Shelley's Case.

Mrs. Bauder, Nancy Keck and her husband, Leander, deny that position; and as Nancy Keck's children also have a contingent interest in the real estate, this bill was filed to have a

Not a rule of property, but of construction. The rule in Shelley's Case is, at most, a technical rule of construction, and not a rule of property, and has always, since the decision in Perrin v. Blake, 4 Burr. 2579, given way to the clear intention of the testator or donor, when that intention could be ascertained from the instrument in which the words supposed to be words of limitation were used. Baker v. Scott, 62 Ill. 86; Butler v. Huestis, 69 Ill. 594; Delslay v. Engel, 107 Ill. 186; Chelton v. Henderson, 9 Gill, 432; Carter v. Reddish, 32 Ohio St.

construction put upon the will. The complainants contended:

"That the only devise to the said Mary Bauder and the said daughters of said Hiram Bauder, was the use of the said real estate to the said Mary Bauder, Nancy, Harriet and Melissa, for their lives; and no part of the real estate itself was devised, but it was to be kept intact undivided, unimpaired and undisposed of and sacred to those who might be their heirs living upon the death of all of them; and until the decease of all of said first takers, the use should remain to the survivor or survivors of them. And that when Harriet died no estate passed to her daughter or to anyone else, but her mother and sister, under the will as aforesaid, had the use of the same during their lives; and that, Melissa having died, no estate passed from her, but the same remained likewise in her mother and sisters, under the will, for their use during their lives; and that the survivors are entitled to the use of the whole estate during their lives.

"That the word 'heirs' as used in the will, is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and that it was the intention of the testator in and by said will that his said widow and three daughters should have a life estate only in his real estate, and upon the death of all of them, the remainder should go to such of their heirs as might then be living; that the rule in Shelley's Case does not apply to said devise in said will and to apply the same would be contrary to the intention of said testator."

The circuit court decided that, as to the real estate of Hiram Bauder, "The said Mary Bauder, Harriet Elizabeth, Nancy Catharine, and Melissa, in and by said will, took an immediate estate of inheritance therein; that the word 'heirs,' as used in said will was a word of limitation, and not of purchase; that such was the intention of the testator in said will, and that the rule in Shelley's Case applies thereto."

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Charles Wheaton, for appellants:

The word "heirs" when used in a will ought to be taken as designatio personarum whenever it is manifest the testator intended to use it in that sense.

Butler v. Huettig, 68 Ill. 594.

In Belsay v. Engel, 107 Ill. 182, it is held that the plain intention of the testator overrules the rule in Shelley's Case.

Where technical words are employed in a will in such a manner that to give them their strict meaning would defeat the intention of the testator, apparent from the will, a more liberal or popular interpretation will be given to them in order to carry such intention into effect.

It is a rule of construction, and not of interpretation, and takes effect only when the interpretation of the will has been ascertained. Yarnall's App. 70 Pa. 335; Perrin v. Blake, 4 Burr. 2579; Guthrie's App. 37 Pa. 13; Foster v. McKenna (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 368. The only matter determined by the rule is whether a person shall take by descent or purchase. Webster v. Cooper, 56 U. S. 14 How. 438 (14 L. ed. 510). All devises made before the enactment of statutes abolishing this rule in Shelley's Case will be construed in accordance with the rule. Williams v. Williams, 11 Lea, 652; Quick v. Quick, 21 N. J. Eq. 13. "Heirs," "issue" or "children of the first taker" are either words of limitation or purchase, as will best effectuate the devisor's intention. Doe v. Collis, 4 T. R. 294; *Shriver v. Terms "heir" "heirs," "children," "issue," etc., construed. Where an estate of freehold is limited to a person, and the same instrument contains a limitation, either mediate or immediate, to his heirs, or the heirs of his body, the word "heirs" is a word of limitation; if to the heirs of his body, he takes a fee tail, if to his heirs general, a fee simple (1 Preston, Estates, chap. 3; Broughton v. Langley, 2 Ld. Raym. 373; Whiting v. Wilkins, 1 Bulstr. 215; Bedford's Case, F. Moore, 718; Perrin v. Blake, 4 Burr. 2579); and the word "nearest," like "next" or "first" prefixed to the term "heirs" or "heir," without the use of other words of limitation, will not vary the effect of the devise. Ryan v. Allen, 9 West. 457, 120 Ill. 648; 1 Coke, 93 b; 1 Preston, Estates, 264; 4 Kent, Com. 215; Baker v. Scott, 62 Ill. 86; Brislain v. Wilson, 63 Ill. 173; *Beacroft v. mean legitimate children. Eldridge v. Eldridge, 3 Cent. Rep. 345, 41 N. J. Eq. 39. If clearly shown that the word "heirs" was used as meaning children, the court will give it that meaning. Shimer v. Mann, 99 Ind. 235; Ridgeway v. Lamphear, 99 Ind. 251; Brumfield v. Drock, 101 Ind. 130; Criswell's App. 41 Pa. 283. The word "children" in its primary sense and "issue" are words of purchase; Foster v. McKenna (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 364; but "heir" and "heirs" are words of limitation, and not of purchase. Schoonmaker v. Sheely, 3 Denio, 433.

Instances of construction of terms. In the creation of a fee-tail estate there must be words of procreation indicating the body out of which the heirs were to issue or by whom they were to be begotten: while words of inheritance only were necessary at common law to the creation of a fee. Lehndorf v. Cope, 11 West. Rep. 321, 122 Ill. 317. The words "heirs male" import heirs of the body. Weart v. Cruser, 9 Cent. Rep. 117, 49 N. J. L. 475. A devise to T. without words of limitation, "and if he should die leaving no lawful heirs the whole to descend to his brothers and sisters, share and share alike, or to their legal representatives," vests a fee-tail estate in T. Titzell v. Cochran (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 518. So, prior to the Act of 1855, a devise to a son for life, and to his legal heirs at his death, if any, and if not then to testator's grandchildren, the son took an estate in fee-tail. Bassett v. Hawk, 10 Cent. Rep. 736, 118 Pa. 20 W. N. C. 399. A devise to certain grandchildren and their lawful issue, and in case of the death of either without lawful issue, the share of such child to go to the survivor under the operation of the Act of 1855, is converted into a fee simple. Reinochi v. Shirk, 11 Cent. Rep. 644, 119 Pa. 108, 21 W. N. C. 127. The word "issue" is prima facie construed heirs of the body, and standing alone the words "die without leaving lawful issue" import an indefinite failure of issue. Reinochi v. Shirk, 11 Cent. Rep. 644, 119 Pa. 108, 21 W. N. C. 127. A devise to one and to his "heirs of the blood of the father" creates a fee simple conditional which is, by the Maryland Statute, converted into an unqualified fee simple. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Patterson (Md.) 12 Cent. Rep. 109. In a devise to a sister "and at her death to her children, or other lineal descendants," the words "other lineal descendants," so qualify the words "child" or "children," as to make them words of limitation and not of

The court will not resort to a technical construction for the purpose of defeating the manifest intention of the testator.

Gardner v. Gardner, 6 Paige, 455; Stewart v. Chambers, 2 Sandf. Ch. 382.

So the word "heirs" will not be interpreted as a word of limitation, if the intention is apparent to use it in another sense.

Burtis v. Doughty, 8 Bradf. 287.

The main thing to get at in the construction of a will is the intention of a testator, to be ascertained from the whole will taken together.

1 Jarman, Wills, Perkins' ed. 414, 425, Covenhoven v. Shuler, 2 Paige, 129; Crosby v. Wendell, 6 Paige, 548; Pond v. Bergh, 10 Paige, 140.

In a will, a general intent must yield to a particular intent, to be gathered from a construction of the whole will taken together.

2 Wms. Exrs. pp. 1152-1164; Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 667.

To effectuate the clear intention of the testator, as apparent upon the whole will, words and limitations may be transposed, applied or rejected.

2 P. Wms. 1162; Cooper v. Hayes, 96 Ind. 386; Harris v. Carpenter, 7 West. Rep. 908, 109 Ind. 540; Wiggins v. Perkins (N. H.) 2 New Eng. Rep. 896.

Messrs. M. O. Southworth and N. J. Aldrich, for appellee:

Though an estate be devised to one for life, or with any other restrictive expressions, yet, if there be added afterwards apt and proper words to create an estate of inheritance in the heirs, the extensive force of the latter words should overbalance the strictness of the former and make him a tenant in fee.

The true question of the intent would turn, not upon the quantity of the estate intended to be given to the ancestor, but on the nature of the estate intended to be given to the heirs.

See Baker v. Scott, 62 Ill. 100.

In the case at bar the testator devises "the use" of all his property, etc.; and it has been contended by the other side that such language does not carry an estate in the land, only the income from it, the estate held in abeyance. That such is not the law, see:

Handberry v. Doolittle, 38 Ill. 202; Okeden v. Okeden, 1 Atk. 552; Hall v. Carter, 2 Atk. 858; Mills v. Banks, 3 P. Wms. 7; Mather v. Mather, 108 Ill. 618; Ryan v. Allen, 9 West. Rep. 486, 120 Ill. 648; 2 Jarman, Wills, 609, and cases there cited.

Scholfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question here is whether in construing a devise which assumes to give a life estate to the ancestor and the remainder in fee to the heirs at law of such ancestor, the language of the devise in giving the life estate and other parts of the devise showing, in connection with the language, that his intention was to give only a life estate, must control.

It is quite clear upon authority that the answer must be in the negative. We held in Baker v. Scott, 62 Ill. 88, that the rule in Shelley's Case is in force here, as a rule of property, and that the question of intent in determining apply. Moore v. Brooks, 12 Gratt. 135. Where the declaration prohibits the first taker from selling or disposing of the land devised, and the remainder is given to his heirs, the word "heirs" is construed as a word of purchase. Roberts v. Ogbourne, 37 Ala. 174.

When the rule does not apply. The rule in Shelley's Case does not apply to a case where an estate for life is granted with remainder to the issue of the first taker, or children of the tenant for life. Chambers v. Payne, 6 Jones, Eq. 276; Reeder v. Spearman, 6 Rich. Eq. 88; Gernet v. Lynn, 31 Pa. 44; Stump v. Jordan, 54 Md. 618; Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C. 220; Donnelly v. Turner, 60 Md. 81. Even where the words "descend to children" are used (Tate v. Townsend, 61 Miss. 816); if the limitation be to the heirs of his body, the first taker would have an estate tail instead of a fee. Pibus v. Mit- ford, 1 Vent. 372; Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 18 Pa. 351; Toller v. Attwood, 15 Q. B. 229; Doe v. Harvey, 4 Barn. & C. 610; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 484; Clarke v. Smith, 49 Md. 106; Cooper v. Coursey, 2 Coldw. 416; Williams v. Williams, 10 Heisk. 568. Where an estate is given to a person for life, with remainder to his heirs and their heirs forever the estate of the first taker is not enlarged into a fee by the operation of the rule, since the words "their heirs forever" are consistent with the rule. Litzel v. Litzel, 48 Ill. 488; Bogers v. Rogers, 518 Den- v. Beasley, 120 Ill. 120. If a fund at the de- the latter the principal sum be paid to his heirs, share and share alike, the term "law-ful" means children and not next of kin. v. Eldridge, 3 Cent. Rep. 344, 41 N. J. Eq. 89. If such devise the son took a life interest and, and his children took a remainder vested at once on the death of the testator. v. Eldridge, 3 Cent. Rep. 344, 41 N. J. Eq. 89. If the testator devised to his daughter the improvement of a farm, the premises to be equally divided between all her legal heirs at her decease. It was held that she took a life estate only, and that her children living at the testator's death took a vested remainder in fee. Bowers v. Porter, 4 Pick. 198; Eldridge v. Eldridge, 3 Cent. Rep. 345, 41 N. J. Eq. 89.

Executory trusts not within rule. Where trusts are merely executory, and something remains to be done to perfect and carry into effect the testator's intention, the court is not confined to the strict rules of common law, but governs itself by the testator's intention, and does that which will best answer and support it. Wood v. Burnham, 6 Paige, 613; Stoeloff v. Redman, 26 Ind. 237; Livingston v. Murray, 67 Barb. 220. Where the trusts respecting the shares of the daughters were legal and valid trusts; were not passive, but active; were not executed but executory trusts--the rule in Shelley's Case had no application to them; but they were saved by the Revised Statutes, article Relative to Uses and Trusts, § 48. Wagstaff v. Lowrey, 33 whether it is applicable in a given case does not turn upon the quantity of estate intended to be given to the ancestors, but upon the nature of the estate intended to be given to the heirs; and it was shown in that case that in the great case of Perrin v. Blake, 4 Burr. 2579 (3 Greenl. Cruise, Real Prop. 818) as finally decided in the Exchequer Chamber it was admitted that the rule in Shelley's Case often defeats the undoubted intention of the deviser, "for" it was said: "There was never an instance where an estate for life was expressly devised to the first taker that the deviser intended he should have any more. But if he afterwards gives an estate to the heirs of the tenant for life, or to the heirs of his body, it is the consequence or operation of law that in this case supervenes his intention and vests the remainder in the ancestor."

Preston, in his work on Estates, says in Volume 1, page 281, *283, speaking of the legal effect under the rule in Shelley's Case of the word "heirs" in a devise or grant, "That all possible heirs of the given description are to take in succession from generation to generation under the name of heirs of the ancestor, is to bring the case immediately within the rule. That only one individual or several individuals is or are to take in the characters of heirs, or rather as particular persons described by that name, either for their lives only or for an estate of inheritance to be deducible from them as the stock or ancestor; and that their heirs are described by super-added words of limitation, and as their descendants, is to exclude the rule."

in Shelley's Case) "applies generally and without exception to the several limitations as often as the gift to the heirs is without any expression of qualification;" and he thus illustrates his meaning: "Neither the express declaration, (1) that the ancestor shall have an estate for his life and no longer; nor (2) that he shall have only a life estate in the premises, and that, after his decease, it shall go to the heirs of his body, and in default of such heirs vest in the person next in remainder; and that the ancestor shall have no power to defeat the intention of the testator; nor (3) that the ancestor shall be a tenant for his life and no longer, and that it shall not be in his power to sell, dispose, or make away with any part of the premises— . . . will change the word 'heirs' into a word of purchase."

Kent says (vol. 4, p. 233, 8th ed.) in speaking of the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Perrin v. Blake, supra: "The result of that famous controversy tended to confirm, by the weight of judicial authority at Westminster Hall, the irresistible pre-eminence of the rule (i. e. in Shelley's Case), so that even the testator's manifest intent could not control the legal operations of the word heirs when standing for the ordinary line of succession as a word of limitation, and render it a word of purchase. If the term heirs as used in the instrument comprehended the whole class of heirs, and they became entitled, on the death of the ancestor, to the estate, in the same manner and to the same extent and with the same discernible qualities as if the grant or devise had been simply to him and his heirs, then the word heirs is a word of

Barb. 221. Persons described as sons or children take as purchasers, and not by descent; and the remainders are vested as soon as such persons come into being. Macumber v. Dangerefield, 15 Mees. & W. 263; Lees v. Mosley, 1 Younge & C. (Exch.) 589. Where by devise, a life estate was limited to Elizabeth, and remainder to her sons as tenants in common, share and share alike, and the heirs of their bodies, the fee tail was not limited to the heirs in tail of the first taker: the rule in Shelley's Case did not apply. The two sons could not take an estate tail from their mother as tenants in common. They must take it as purchasers or not at all. Webster v. Cooper, 55 U. S. 14 How. 488 (14 L. ed. 510). If they are executors, as they usually are in marriage settlements; or if it is the clear intention of the donor that the tenant for life shall not have the power to cut off the estate in remainder—the rule will not apply. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 496; Sand. Uses, 311; Jones v. Laughton, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 362; Gill v. Logan, 11 B. Mon. 231; Berry v. Williamson, 11 B. Mon. 245. That the words "to be equally divided," prevent the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, and limit the interest of the first taker to an estate for life, is the settled law in this State. Mills v. Thorne, 36 N. C. 392; Ward v. Jones, 5 Ired. Eq. 400; Jenkins v. Jenkins, 36 N. C. 259. Under a devise to testator's two sons, John and Edward, of a farm, to them as long as they live, and after their death to their children, John and Edward take a life estate, with remainder to their children as purchasers, upon the death of the survivor. Jones v. Cable, 6 Cent. Rep. 353, 114 Pa. 566. The gift in remainder vested at once on the death of the testator, the context of the will showing no different intention. Theobald Wills, 275; 1 Lupton, Legacies, 589; Bowers v. Porter, 4 Pick. 188; Eldridge v. Eldridge, 8 Cent. Rep. 845, 41 N. J. Eq. 89. Devise to grand-daughter; remainder in fee to her children, construed. Where the estate is given limitation, and the intention will not control the legal effect of the word. The term must be used as a mere designation of one or more individuals or a new import given to it by super-added or ingrafted words of limitation, varying its sense and operation, in order to make it a word of purchase."

"after his death, to his issue by him lawfully begotten of his body," these must necessarily have been his children. They could not have been otherwise. It will do no violence, either to the language here used or to the context, if this clause be regarded as if the testator had substituted the latter words for the former in framing this part of the instrument. If this had been done there could have been no controversy between these parties. Re Sanders, 4 Paige, 208; Daniel v. Whartenby, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 644 (21 L. ed. 684). Even "heirs of the body" may be read under circumstances so as to mean children, and when so read those words will give, as this word, not forced out of its signification, gives, to the first taker no more than his life estate. Moon v. Stone, 19 Gratt. 205. If it be objected that the devise to the daughter for life, with remainder to her issue, is, at common law, turned into a fee in the daughter by the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, upon the ground that the word "issue" is used as the equivalent of heirs, and is here a word of limitation and not of purchase; the answer is that the rule applied only to the case of the first taker and not to the use of the word in a case like the present. Hennessey v. Patterson, 35 N. Y. 98; Cushney v. Henry, 4 Paige, 345. The word "children," in a devise, was a word of purchase, and not of limitation. Beacroft v. Strawn, 67 Ill. 33; Armstrong v. Moran, 1 Bradf. 315; Christie v. Phyre, 19 N. Y. 344; Buffar v. Bradford, 2 Atk. 221; DeWitte v. DeWitte, 11 Sim. 41. The word "children" in its primary and natural sense is a word of purchase, but the words "heirs," and "heirs of the body" are, in their primary and natural sense, words of limitation, and not of purchase. Rivard v. Gienhof, 35 Hun, 251. Schoonmaker v. Seely, 2 Denio, 480. The term "children" in its natural sense, is a word of purchase, and it is to be taken to have been used as such, unless there are other expressions in the will which show that the testator intended to use it as a word of limitation only. Christie v. Phyre, 19 N. Y. 354. It would be unreasonable to suppose that the testator, who evidently looked to succession, could mean that a child of the deceased child should take coextensively with the children. Barstow v. Goodwin, 2 Bradf. 418.

The principle applicable here is clearly and forcibly stated in "Hayes' Principles for Expounding Dispositions of Real Estate," 96 (7 Law Library, 52) thus: "The requisite limitations to the ancestor and his heirs being found, the rule must be applied. It can never be a question whether the rule shall be applied or not. We might as well be asked whether a testator intended to contravene the rule against perpetuities. It will no more yield to individual intention than any other fundamental law of property. The rule admits of no exceptions."

To like effect is Bender v. Fleurie, 2 Grant, Cas. 345. The testator gave to his daughter certain land in these words: "She shall have it as her own during her life, and then it is to come to the heirs of her body for their own use," and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania said: "But it is said, the testator did not mean to give her an estate tail. Perhaps he did not. But he has used words which in law mean nothing else. If he intended to give but a life estate voluit non dixit, we must take what he said, not what he meant. . . . But no court in this State, or in England, has ever treated the phrase 'heirs of the body' as words of purchase, when they are used with reference to the issue of a devisee, to whom a life estate is given. They are words of limitation, and as such they create an estate tail in the first taker, which cannot be cut down even by the clearest expression of a desire that it shall be a life estate only."

Under our statute cutting off entails, as construed in Butler v. Huestis, 68 Ill. 594, such a devise, we concede, would not here create an estate tail; but that is purely because of our statute. The rule of construction thus laid down is beyond question pertinent and applicable here to devises, like that before us, which are unaffected by any statute of our State.

In Hileman v. Bouslaugh, 13 Pa. 344, the same court, speaking of the rule in Shelley's Case said: "The requisite limitations to the ancestor and his heirs being found, the rule must be applied. It can never be a question whether the rule shall be applied or not, whether the author of the limitation intended it to be applied or not."

And again: "The question on a will is not whether the testator intended that the rule shall not operate, for this is not subject to his power, but whether he used the words 'heirs of the body' as synonymous with the word 'children' or its proper equivalent."

The result of the authorities in regard to the question before us is well stated by Mr. Justice Elliott, speaking for the Supreme Court of Indiana, thus: "It has seemed to many that there is a conflict between the rule declaring that the intention of the testator must govern, and the rule in Shelley's Case; but this appearance of conflict fades away when it is brought clearly to mind that when the word 'heirs' is used as a word of limitation it is treated as conclusively expressing the intention of the testator. Where it appears that the word was so used, the law inexorably fixes the force and meaning of the instrument. If once it is granted that the word was used in its strict legal sense, nothing can avert the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case; so that the inquiry is, Was the word used as one of limitation? The only method in which an instrument employing the word 'heirs' can be shown not to be within the rule, is by showing that the word was not employed in its strict legal sense." Allen v. Craft, 7 West. Rep. 512, 109 Ind. 476. See also Theobald, Wills, 836 et seq.

The doctrine thus sustained was assumed by us to be the law in Wicker v. Ray, 6 West. Rep. 495, 118 Ill. 472; Ryan v. Allen, 9 West. Rep. 486, 120 Ill. 648, though the present question was not there discussed.

Counsel for appellant cite general rules of construction and some cases in apparent conflict with the foregoing views. A careful examination of the general rules cited will show that when their application to causes like the present is understood there is no conflict; and the cases cited, with the exception of Belslay v. Engel, 107 Ill. 182, hereafter to be noticed, will be found, on examination, distinguishable from the present case in that it appeared in those cases, from the connection in which they occurred, that the word heirs or heirs of body were used as synonymous with "child" or "children" or some other limited class, and not as meaning those who take by inheritance generally, as heirs, in the technical sense of that word. Thus in Millett v. Ford, 6 West. Rep. 424, 109 Ind. 159, the devise is this:

"I give and bequeath unto my son James R. Rachels, during his lifetime, the following real estate . . . to have the use of the above described land during said James' lifetime, and after his death to the heirs of his body in lawful wedlock, and none others." The words "heirs of his body in lawful wedlock," could by no possibility intend others than his children; and so the devise was precisely as if it had been to James R. Rachels and his children.

And so in Urick's Appeal, 86 Pa. 386, the devise is to the devisor's children and their heirs; but in a subsequent clause he declares that none of his children should have the right to sell or encumber the lands, but the land shall remain free for their children or heirs, etc., showing clearly that "children" and "heirs" were used as synonymous; in other words that when he said "heirs" he intended "children."

The other cases cited by counsel for appellant will be found to be alike distinguishable from the present case—restricting and narrowing the meaning of the word "heirs" to particular persons, or to a particular class of persons less than that of heirs in general.

The devise in Belslay v. Engel, supra, was: "Sixth. I give and bequeath unto my granddaughter, Catherine Belslay, the free use and occupation of" (then describing the lands in dispute) "to have and to hold to use and occupy and enjoy the same . . . during her natural life," etc. "Thirteenth. It is my will, and this bequest is made upon the express declaration that in case any of my said grandchildren should depart this life without issue of their body, then that all their share of said real estate . . . shall be equally divided among all my grandchildren and their legal representatives, and the title thereto thereafterwards so vest forever. It is my will that no title in fee to any of said land shall vest in my said grandchildren, and I declare it to be my will that they shall have only a life estate therein, and that the fee simple shall vest in their legal heirs." It is plain that this is but equivalent to saying: "I give the life estate to my grandchildren and the remainder in fee to their children. The heirs of those that die without issue of their bodies—i. e., children—being excluded by the necessary effect of the devise, it inevitably follows that none but children of grandchildren could be their "legal representatives" or their "legal heirs;" and therefore in using these terms the testator clearly meant children of grandchildren—and such was the effect of the decision. Beyond all question, then, the case was rightly decided. In the argument of the opinion, however, there is language that seems to place the decision upon the intention of the testator to vest a fee in the legal representatives or legal heirs of the grandchildren as determined from a consideration of all the language of the will, and not, as should have been done, upon the evident intention of the testator to use the words "legal representatives" or "legal heirs" as synonymous with "children," and therefore as words of purchase, and not of limitation. This language of the opinion was unadvisedly assented to by a majority of the members of the court, and is now disapproved and overruled.

It is clear from the language, "to be divided among them as the same would be divided by law without a will," that the testator intended to give his wife and daughters the same use of the real estate that they would be entitled to had he made no will; but that they shall not be allowed to sell it.

A devise of the use of the land is equivalent to a devise of the land itself; and carries the legal, as well as the beneficial, interest therein. Ryan v. Allen, supra.

Had there been no will our statute would have given the widow dower in the lands and vested the fee in the daughters, one third each, as tenants in common. Neither would have had an interest in the individual interest of the other; and therefore the heirs of one would not, necessarily, have been the heirs of the other.

In the light of these observations the will must be read substantially thus: "I give to my wife, Mary, dower in my lands, and I give to my daughters Harriet E., Nancy C. and Melissa E., each, the undivided one third of my lands, subject to the dower of my wife, Mary, therein, except that it is my will that none of the real estate be sold or disposed of . . . but that the same be kept sacred for their heirs."

The injunction to not sell is plainly upon each, severally, because the title is not that of joint tenants but that of tenants in common, and each therefore might sell without regard to the others; and for like reason the injunction to preserve is upon each severally and necessary to preserve that which is given her and for her own heirs because the heirs of no one else merely as such can have any interest in her estate. The only limitation in the language employed in the will is that we have been considering. There is nowhere a single word or syllable to indicate that the word heirs was here used as the equivalent of "child" or "children" or "issue," or to otherwise indicate a class less comprehensive than that included within the technical meaning of "heirs at law." Under our statute, therefore, this general language of the devise carries a fee (§ 18, chap. 80, Rev. Stat. 1874).

The word heirs as here used clearly means all who are to take generally, without exception, as a class of inheritable persons, and, as to the successive heirs of the daughters named, severally, and not a part—as individuals selected out of the class of heirs—and therefore brings the case within the rule in Shelley's Case. 1 Preston, Estates, pp. 282, 283.

Stress is laid in argument upon different matters as presented by the entire devise, claimed to show that the testator could not have intended to give an estate in fee to his daughters; but we have seen that that is not the question. If the language used, in the legal sense that must be placed upon it in the connection in which it occurs, imparts a conveyance in fee to the daughters, such must be its effect, although it may appear that he actually only intended to convey a life estate—the only inquiry permissible being whether, from other parts of the devise, it appears that the word heirs was used in a sense more restricted than the term itself imports as the equivalent of "children," "issue," or some other partial or restricted class of heirs.

Finding no cause to disturb the judgment, it must be affirmed.

PEOPLE of the State OF ILLINOIS.

(.... Ill. ....)

1. Section 25 of the Illinois Warehouse Act of 1871, imposing a penalty for issuing receipts for property not actually in store, is germane to and embraced within the title: "An Act to Regulate Public Warehouses, and the Warehousing and Inspection of Grain and to Give Effect to Article 13 of the Constitution of this State."

2. Said section was not repealed by implication by the passage of sections 124 and 125 of the Criminal Code, the provisions of the two Acts being distinct and not repugnant—the offense created by the former consisting solely in issuing a receipt from which a fraudulent result may occur, and that created by the latter consisting in the making or uttering of a receipt for a fraudulent purpose or with a fraudulent intent.

3. That there was no intent to defraud the party to whom a warehouse receipt was issued in violation of said section 25 is immaterial on the question of guilt under that section; the only intent necessary to be found to constitute the offense relates only to whether the warehouseman intended to issue the receipt knowing it to be false.

4. The Warehouse Act was intended for the protection of the public, and the issuance, by a warehouseman, to a bank, of receipts, transferable by indorsement, purporting to be for property in store belonging to the bank, when in fact no such property was in store, and delivered by him to the bank as security for loans made by it to him, renders such warehouseman liable criminally under section 25 of the Act, although he had no intent to thereby defraud the bank.

5. When punishment is prescribed within defined limits (as, in section 25 of the Warehouse Act, imprisonment for not less than one and not more than ten years), evidence of intent is admissible in order to fix the degree of criminality and the punishment commensurate thereto, notwithstanding it may not be admissible upon the question of guilt or innocence.

ERROR to the Criminal Court of Cook County (Horton, J.), to review a conviction under section 25 of the Warehouse Act of 1871. Reversed.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Sleeper for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. George Hunt, Atty-Gen., Joel M. Longenecker, State's Atty., and George N. Stone for the People, defendants in error.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the trial of this cause it was avowed by the prosecution that the prosecution was upon the counts under the Warehouse Act, which the court determined limited the charge to the 9th, 10th, 12th and 13th counts of the indictment; and the trial proceeded under those counts:

It is contended that the court erred in giving the second and third instructions on behalf of the People, for the reason that the jury were thereby told that if they believed from the evidence, etc., certain things, "as charged in the indictment, etc.," they should find the defendant guilty, instead of limiting the jury to the consideration of the facts charged as constituting the offense, in the particular counts under which the defendant was on trial.

The better practice in such cases is to direct the attention of the jury to the charge in the counts upon which the prosecution rely; but there was here no prejudicial error. In each of the instructions complained of the attention of the jury was directed only to the facts constituting the offense as charged in the counts to which the prosecution was limited.

The statute before referred to, and upon which said counts were predicated, is the 25th section of the Act of 1871 (Starr & Curtiss, ¶ 180, p. 1975), which is as follows:

"Any warehouseman of any public warehouse who shall be guilty of issuing any warehouse receipt for any property not actually in store at the time of issuing such receipt, or who shall be guilty of issuing any warehouse receipt in any respect fraudulent in its character either as to its date or the quantity, quality, or inspected grade of such property, or who shall remove any property from store (except to preserve it from fire or other sudden danger) without the return and cancellation of any and all outstanding receipts that may have been issued to represent such property, shall, when convicted thereof, be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall suffer, in addition to any other penalties prescribed by this Act, imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one and not more than ten years."

It is urged that this section of the statute is void because the provision imposing a penalty for issuing such warehouse receipts, etc., is not embraced in the title of the Act. The Act is entitled: "An Act to Regulate Public Warehouses, and the Warehousing and Inspection of Grain, and to Give Effect to Article 13 of the Constitution of this State."

Section 6 of the article referred to provides: "It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass all necessary laws to prevent the issue of false and fraudulent warehouse receipts, and to give full effect to this article of the Constitution, etc."

It is, we think, manifest from the mere statement that the section under consideration is germane to the purposes of the Act as stated in its title, and not, therefore, obnoxious to the objection. People v. Lowenthal, 93 Ill. 191; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320.

It is next insisted that this section of the Warehouse Act was repealed by the passage of sections 124 and 125 of the Criminal Code. The position is not well taken. The Warehouse Act and the Criminal Code, severally containing the sections referred to, were parts of the General Revision of 1874; and the presumption is that the Legislature intended the revision should be a consistent body of laws, and each part thereof be capable of enforcement. The provisions of these sections are not repugnant and there is, therefore, no repeal by implication.

The section of the Warehouse Act is directed against the issuance of warehouse receipts, etc., by warehousemen of public warehouses as designated in and regulated by that Act; and because of the public capacity in which they are acting, and that warehouse receipts for property stored in such public warehouses are, by the 24th section of the Act, made transferable by indorsement, and thereby a valid transfer of the property represented by such receipt is made, the offense is made to consist simply in committing or doing the acts prohibited. On the other hand, the sections of the Criminal Code referred to are directed against every person who shall "fraudulently make or utter any receipt or other written evidence of the delivery or deposit of any grain" or other commodity, upon any wharf, or place of storage, or in any warehouse, mill, store or other building; and includes places of deposit or of storage not public warehouses as designated in the Warehouse Act. In the one case the offense consists solely in issuing the receipt from which a fraudulent result may occur prejudicial to the public or those into whose hands the receipts may come; while in the other, it is made to consist in the making or uttering the receipt for a fraudulent purpose or with a fraudulent intent.

It is apparent, we think, that the objects sought to be attained by these enactments are distinct, and that full effect could not be given to the legislative intent in respect of the acts of public warehousemen under the sections of the Criminal Code alone.

The principal point of contention, however, is that the court erred in excluding from the jury, as it practically did, evidence tending to show the intent with which the several warehouse receipts were issued by the defendant; and ruling that it was immaterial whether such receipts were issued by the defendant for a fraudulent purpose, or with a fraudulent intent, or not. As will be observed, we have to some extent anticipated this contention.

The defendant was a warehouseman of a public warehouse of Class C. He so testifies; and the evidence clearly establishes that his warehouse fell within that class as fixed by the second section of the Warehouse Act. It can make no difference that the defendant was a dealer also in the commodities for the storing of which he kept such public warehouse. His transactions as warehouseman could not be affected thereby. The receipts issued by the defendant to the bank purport on their face to be issued by the defendant, as warehouseman of a public warehouse of Class C, and are issued in compliance with the requirements of the 24th section of the Act. Therein is designated the brand or distinguishing marks of the property purporting to have been delivered for storage by the bank, as is provided shall be done in receipts for property stored in public warehouses of that class.

It is obvious, therefore, without further discussion, that the defendant was a warehouseman of a public warehouse, and issued the warehouse receipts charged in the counts of the indictment before referred to, and subject to all the regulations prescribed by the Warehouse Act for his conduct as such warehouseman. These several receipts were thus issued by him, when in fact, as he himself testifies, the particular property designated and described in such receipts was not in store with him at the time of the issuance of such receipt, or at any other time. It is conceded that no timothy seed in bags, bearing the marks and brands stated on the face of the receipts to have been deposited for storage by the bank, were ever at any time on deposit or in store in the defendant's warehouse, or under his control. The bank at no time made any deposit or stored any timothy seed therein.

The receipts were, therefore, false in every particular relating to the property thereby represented to be in store. If, therefore, the court was correct in its ruling, the defendant was clearly punishable under the statute referred to.

To understand this contention clearly, some reference to the facts is necessary. The defendant applied to the Merchants' Loan & Trust Company for financial accommodation. The proof tends to show that he indicated to the bank that the sums required might aggregate $100,000, and proposed to issue warehouse receipts upon his own produce in store as collateral security for advances made by the bank, and keep the property represented by such receipts insured for the benefit of the bank; and the proof also tends to show that he procured insurance upon property purporting to be represented by such receipts.

An account was opened; advances made by the bank, for which the note of the defendant was given, to which the warehouse receipts introduced in evidence, and others, were collateral, to a large amount, aggregating at the time of the failure of the defendant, and remaining unpaid, over $90,000.

The evidence offered by the defendant, and practically excluded, tended to show that it was understood that the produce of the defendant represented in the receipts should not be tied up thereby; that the warehouse receipts were intended and understood to be mere formal security for advances made by the bank. And it is contended that, as the officers of the bank knew no deposit had been made of grass seed as shown on the face of the receipts or otherwise by the bank, that it was competent for the defendant to prove the understanding with which the bank received such receipts as tending to rebut the presumption of fraud or fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant in issuing the same.

If the statute in question was intended for the protection of the person to whom the receipt issued only, there would be much force in the position; for if the bank made no deposit it could not be deceived by the statement in the receipt that it had stored the property therein described. And if the property of the defendant actually in store was not to be represented in such receipts, and this was so understood, no fraud could have been perpetrated upon the bank. This statute, however, has a much broader scope, and is not designed alone for the protection of the person to whom the receipt is, in the first instance, issued; it is intended not only for his protection, but to protect the public at large and all persons into whose hands the receipt may come in the course of business.

By the provisions of the 24th section of the Act, these receipts of public warehousemen are made transferable by indorsement of the party to whom they are issued, and thereby a valid transfer of the property represented in such receipt is made. And it is provided that such indorsement may be made either in blank or to the order of another. Such receipts, therefore, pass from hand to hand by indorsement of the person to whom issued.

It cannot be doubted that commercial transactions are greatly facilitated by this transfer of property, and the purpose of the Act was to protect the holders of such public warehouse receipts from imposition and fraud. The receipts are required to be the true representatives of property actually in store in the warehouse, and their issuance is prohibited under any other conditions or circumstances. If the bank, in this case, as it might, had put these warehouse receipts in circulation, an actual fraud would have been committed, and the evil intended to be prevented by the statute, consummated. By the issuance of the receipts to the bank, it was furnished with the means of perpetrating a fraud, and this is one of the objects this statute sought to prevent. Any other construction would open the door to unlimited fraud, and render nugatory the protection attempted to be afforded to transactions through the public warehouses of the State by the statute.

It follows that, as touching the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, the intent with which the receipts were issued by him was immaterial. The intent necessary to be found, to constitute this offense, related alone to whether defendant intended to issue the receipt knowing it to be false. Thus far the common-law doctrine, that every criminal offense consists of the joint operation of act and intent, enters into and must be considered as applying to statutory offenses. Bishop, Stat. Cr. 351-361.

If such receipts were issued by the defendant, he knowing that the property therein represented was not in fact in store as therein designated and described, the crime created by this section of the statute, as it relates to the issuance of such receipts, was committed. As before stated, it is immaterial whether the defendant intended a fraud upon the bank or other persons, if in fact his act knowingly committed was within the prohibition of the statute. This principle has found repeated recognition in this and other courts, in prosecutions for violations of the Dram Shop Act and other Acts. McCutcheon v. People, 69 Ill. 601, and cases cited; State v. Morse, 52 Iowa, 509; Gardner v. People, 62 N. Y. 299; Halsted v. State, 41 N. J. L. 552.

The Supreme Court of Iowa, in State v. Stevenson, 52 Iowa, 701, held, upon the same principle, that where a warehouseman shipped grain out of his control, for which he had given a receipt, leaving the receipt outstanding, he was criminally liable under a similar statute, although the grain was so shipped with the knowledge and without objection by the holder of the receipt: The court said: "It is evident from this whole section that it is for the protection of the community as well as the protection of the holder of the voucher. It is clear that Petrie (such holder), in this case, with the receipt in his possession, might perpetrate a fraud upon third parties, the grain not being stored with the defendant as stated in the receipt. The defendant could not, innocently, under the statute, with such a receipt outstanding, ship the wheat beyond his control, even in the presence of Petrie and with his verbal assent. Such an act would furnish Petrie the means of perpetrating a fraud, which is one of the objects of the statute to prevent."

It is urged with great persistency that the transaction here was a mere attempt to create a lien upon the property of the defendant, in the nature of a mortgage or pledge thereof; and that, therefore, the act of defendant in making and delivering said receipt cannot be deemed the issuance of a warehouse receipt within the meaning of said Act; and also that the statute does not contemplate the issuing of warehouse receipts for the property of warehousemen, but only for property deposited or stored in such public warehouse by others. It is highly probable, if a holder of these receipts was seeking to recover possession of the property therein named, or enforce some right thereunder, as against the assignee of the defendant, or others having liens thereon, he, having notice of the facts as here shown, would be bound by the transaction as it truly occurred between the warehouseman and the person to whom it issued; and the principle laid down in Fishback v. Van Dusen, 88 Minn. 111, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, becomes applicable.

No such question here arises. The warehouse receipts, as we have seen, as issued, purported to be for grain stored by the bank with the defendant in his public warehouse, designated and marked as shown by the receipts, when in fact no such deposit had been made.

Nor is it true, as the contention of counsel would indicate, that the receipts represented produce belonging to the maker thereof. Nor can it make any difference in the criminal responsibility of the defendant under this statute, that such receipts might have been intended by the parties to operate as a pledge or mortgage of the defendant's property; or that the officers of the bank knew or might have known that no such articles of property as therein described were in the custody of the defendant. The instructions asked on behalf of the defendant being based on the theory of counsel for plaintiff in error, that it was necessary for the People to show, and for the jury to find, that the receipts were issued by the defendant with a fraudulent intent, were properly refused.

We have seen that evidence tending to show that the defendant did not intend the perpetration of a fraudulent act is not admissible in justification or as exculpating the defendant from punishment for the alleged offense. Was it admissible for any purpose? If so, it was competent to be considered by the jury for such purpose, and its exclusion was error. While the penalty is denounced against any warehouseman of a public warehouse committing the acts prohibited by the statute, and no excuse can be heard that a fraud was not intended, yet a wide discretion is left by the statute to the jury, or court, to determine what penalty shall be inflicted in the particular case. That the Legislature did not deem all persons guilty of violating the provisions of said Act as deserving of a like punishment, is manifested by the fact that the penalty inflicted may, in the discretion of the jury, be for any term—not less than one nor more than ten years.

The purpose and object of punishment, in criminal cases, is stated to be to deter others from crime and thus protect the community, as well as, when the life is not taken, to reform the offender. On the one hand punishment will not be inflicted unless deserved, while, on the other hand, it will not be imposed unless for conservation of the public good. 1 Bishop, Cr. Law, § 210.

And the punishment should always be commensurate with, but never in excess of, the purposes of the law as thus understood. The degree of punishment to be inflicted is, in the first instance, a matter for legislative control; but when the Legislature has prescribed punishment in the alternative, or within certain defined limits, thereby vesting jurisdiction in the courts to determine which, or within the limits fixed, what penalty shall be inflicted in the particular case, the court is called upon to determine what punishment the turpitude of the offense proved, on the one hand, and protection to society on the other, demands.

It was not within the legislative contemplation that all persons convicted under this Act should receive the same punishment. One may be sentenced for a term of one year and another for ten years. One may have been guilty of a technical violation of the statute, involving no considerable degree of moral turpitude and from which no considerable injury could be inflicted upon the public; the other, have committed the offense under the most flagrant circumstances, showing a willful and deliberate purpose to inflict injury. In such case the jury must determine what, within the time prescribed by the Legislature, is adequate punishment. This, manifestly, can be justly and properly done only by a consideration of the facts and circumstances attendant upon its perpetration, and which characterizes the purpose and motive in, and effect of, its commission.

If the evidence is to be confined to the mere proof of the issuance of the false receipt by the public warehouseman, what is there upon which to determine what, within the limit, shall be his punishment? Obviously nothing; unless it be permissible to prove, in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment, the immediate attendant circumstances of its issue. This we think may be done. It was, we think, competent for the defendant to prove the circumstances under which the receipts were issued and delivered as bearing upon the turpitude of the offense; and for the jury to consider the same in determining the measure of punishment to be inflicted. Such evidence must necessarily be controlled by instructions as in other cases, where evidence is competent and admissible for a particular purpose.

We are of opinion that the court erred in holding that the evidence tending to show the purpose and intent by which the defendant was actuated in the commission of the offense was improper to be considered by the jury in mitigation of the penalties to be by them imposed. Nor can we say, if it had been submitted, that the term fixed by the jury for which the defendant should be confined in the penitentiary would have been the same. Its exclusion for the purpose indicated was, we think, prejudicial error.

For the error in this regard the judgment of the Criminal Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Andrew TOOLE, Rept.,

v.

James TOOLE et al.—David M. Koehler,

(.....N. Y.....)

1. When the record in a partition suit discloses the existence of persons not made parties who might have an interest, the title acquired at a judicial sale under the decree therein is defective; and a purchaser will not be compelled to accept it, although it may be that such omitted persons were, by reason of alienage, incapacitated from having an interest. To be conclusive against such persons, the record must establish their incapacity.

2. The burden of establishing alienage of persons otherwise interested in property sought to be partitioned is upon the plaintiff in partition.

3. A purchaser at a judicial sale, who contracts for a deed on a day fixed, is entitled to a deed under a decree which will convey an unquestionable title on the day fixed, and should not be subjected to further proceedings to perfect title.

The question presented, and the facts connected therewith, are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Fleming v. Burnham, 1 Cent. Rep. 267, 100 N. Y. 1; Jordan v. Poillon, 77 N. Y. 518; Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 584; Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 56; Slade v. Joseph, 5 Daly, 187.

A purchaser at a partition sale should be relieved from his purchase in the case of absence of parties who might have had claims to the property.

Jordan v. Poillon, 77 N. Y. 518.

In actions for specific performance, the courts have sometimes decreed that the purchaser should take title when its defects were cured before the final hearing, although existing at the commencement of the action (Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Mott, 7 Paige, 85; Grady v. Ward, 20 Barb. 548), but have never gone so far as to hold the action open and undetermined to enable the seller to bring a suit against other parties, and try the experiment of an effort to secure a good title at some uncertain date in the future.

People v. Open Board of Stock Brokers Bldg. Co. 93 N. Y. 104.

Under ordinary circumstances, a purchaser at a partition sale is entitled to a conveyance by a good title at the time fixed for that purpose, and an unreasonable delay in furnishing the same is a sufficient answer to an application to compel him to take a conveyance and fulfill the terms of sale.

Rice v. Barrett, 99 N. Y. 406.

Mr. Lewis Johnston for respondent.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is well settled by the decisions that a purchaser at a judicial sale should not be compelled by the courts to accept a doubtful title. Where irregularities or defects exist in the proceedings, which require further or other proceedings in order to cure them, the objection of an intending purchaser, based upon their existence, should not be overruled and his contract of purchase be directed to be completed. His contract called for a good title, and if it was bad, or doubtful, he should, on his application, be relieved from completing the purchase.

In these partition proceedings the absence of parties was shown who were of the same blood and kinship with the next of kin of Mary Hanley, deceased, whose estate was the subject of partition. If they were incapacitated by reason of alienage from having an interest in the property to be partitioned or sold, that was a fact possible of being conclusively established, by bringing them into the proceeding and trying out the question of their alienage by due process of law. A judgment obtained as the result of such an action would set at rest forever any existing or possible claims. The proceeding is one in rem—the subject being the partition of the real estate, or the distribution of the proceeds of the sale.

The general term concede, in their opinion, that the purchaser, at the judicial sale in question, was not offered a title free from doubt, and that concession seems fatal to their order, by which he is directed to complete his purchase. We agree with that court that the proof, in the record of the partition proceedings, which discloses the existence of other persons, not made parties to the action, who might have an interest, did not sufficiently, or conclusively as against them, establish the incapacity of those persons as aliens to have or acquire such an interest.

The court should have granted the application of the appellant to be relieved from his contract, instead of ordering a further continuance of the proceedings in the action, by a reference to take proof upon the capacity or incapacity of the absent parties to take and hold the real estate by reason of their alleged alienage.

The burden of establishing the fact of alienage and of incapacity was upon the plaintiff in partition, and not upon the purchaser. He had the right to assume that the decree, and sale thereunder, conferred, not merely a good legal title, but a title not open to further question or reasonable dispute by other persons who stood in the same degree of kinship to the deceased. By the terms of his contract, he was entitled to a deed on a day fixed, and he was then ready to perform. That he was right in his objection to the title at that time, the general term acknowledged, and that being the case, they should not have changed his contract and held him to be bound to performance indefinitely, or pending further proceedings to perfect title.

The sale was in June, 1887, and the deed should have been delivered in July following. In January following, the general term ordered the further continuance of the proceedings before a referee, and then, in the following May or June, after a delay of nearly a year, ordered the purchaser to complete his purchase. There is an absence of any proof as to any damage occasioned by the delay; and it is unnecessary, if not improper, to indulge in presumptions as to the existence of any. We rest our decision upon the ground that, for reasons we have given, the title offered was not one free from doubt and was fairly open to the objection made.

The orders of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and Koehler, this appellant, be relieved from his purchase and repaid his deposit upon the sale with interest thereon from July 8, 1887, and all his proper and reasonable expenses in examining the title, with costs herein at special and general terms and in this court.

All concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

GIBSON

v.

RICHMOND &amp; DANVILLE R. CO.

1. Railroad bondholders, to whom stock of the corporation has been mortgaged as collateral security, cannot maintain a suit in equity to charge the lessor of the mortgaged road with the earnings derived under the lease, when such lease is not alleged to be void or voidable as between the parties to it.
2. That the mortgage for such stock was given by the State, which owned a majority of the stock, held not to bind the State to use its controlling interest in the road exclusively in the interest of its mortgagees of the stock, nor to impress the earnings received by the lessor of the road with a trust for the benefit of such mortgagees.

ON demurrer to bill in equity. Demurrer sustained.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Hoadley, for defendant, for the demurrer:

The plaintiff does not aver that the lease when made was improvident, or in violation of the duty owing by the directors of the North Carolina Railroad Company to their stockholders, or beyond their powers. The bill is therefore without any equity.

The power to lease was expressly given by law, and of this law this court is bound to take judicial notice.

Owings v. Hull, 84 U. S. 9 Pet. 607 (9 L. ed. 246); Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 61 U. S. 20 How. 227 (15 L. ed. 896); Cheever v. Wilson, 78 U. S. 9 Wall. 121 (19 L. ed. 607); Junction R. Co. v. Bank of Ashland, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 226 (20 L. ed. 885); Elwood v. Flannigan, 104 U. S. 562 (26 L. ed. 842).

This rule extends not only to public statutes but to private statutes therein declared to be public.

Beatty v. Knowler, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 152 (7 L. ed. 813).

It will not be presumed that the directors acted beyond their legal powers, in the absence of an averment to that effect; but it is established that they acted within their legal powers.

State v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 72 N. C. 634.

As the charter of a railroad company is a contract between the State and the stockholders, the terms of which necessarily, in legal implication, enter into and constitute part of every subscription to capital stock, it follows that the State of North Carolina and the complainant, as mortgagee of its stockholding interest in the North Carolina Railroad Company, became the owner of the stock, subject to the provisions of the charter, and to their honest exercise, from time to time, by the boards of directors.

Nugent v. Putnam Co. 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 241 (22 L. ed. 83); Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co. 105 U. S. 13 (26 L. ed. 961); Manassas, O. & L. M. R. Co. v. Brown, 26 Ohio St. 223; Simpson v. Denison, 10 Hare, 51; Sparrow v. Evansville & O. R. Co. 7 Ind. 869; Bish v. Johnson, 2 L. R. A.

The plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant company, for the reason that his mortgage is not on the property, but on the shares of stock held by the State of North Carolina in the corporation.

A mortgage on the stock is not a mortgage on the property.

Marshall v. Western N. O. R. Co. 92 N. C. 322.

The interest of a stockholder is of a collateral nature, and is not the interest of an owner.

Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence, at section 1090, clearly distinguishes between the relation of the directors to a corporation and of the corporation to its stockholders, showing that while the directors are trustees, they are trustees, not for the shareholders, but for the corporation, so far as the corporate property is concerned. But so far as the shares are concerned, they are trustees for the shareholders.

The plaintiff, as mortgagee of stock, occupies no other and different relation to the corporation from that which an owner of stock holds. The defendant company never agreed to pay any more than the prior liens stated in the bill, and cannot be required to pay more.

Wallace, J., delivered the following opinion:

The complainant is the owner of certain bonds for $1,000 each of the State of North Carolina, created pursuant to an Act of the Legislature of the State, and containing a certificate, executed by the authorized officers of the State, which recites that "Ten shares of the stock in the North Carolina Railroad Company, originally subscribed for by the State, are hereby mortgaged as collateral security for the payment of this bond."

The defendant is a lessee of the property of the North Carolina Railroad Company for a term of years. The complainant has filed this bill, for himself and in behalf of other holders of the bonds, to compel the defendant to account for the earnings of the leased railway property in excess of the rent reserved in the lease. The defendant has demurred to the bill.

Succinctly stated the averments of the bill are: that the North Carolina Railroad Company was incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, passed January 27, 1849; that the Act provided that the State should subscribe for $3,000,000 of the $4,000,000 authorized capital stock of the company, should be entitled to appoint eight of the twelve directors of the company, and should be entitled to vote by an official proxy upon its capital stock at all stockholder's meetings; that the State took the stock, and has always exercised its rights to appoint directors and vote; that the State created a statutory mortgage upon the shares of the stock to secure certain construction bonds issued by it; that subsequently it created a second statutory mortgage upon its shares of stock to secure an issue of bonds, of which the bonds in suit are a part, and issued $2,500,000 of such bonds and sold them to the public; and that thereafter, September 21, 1871, and while the railway company was earning and paying 6 per cent per annum upon its capital stock, and while the State was in default in paying the interest on the second mortgage bonds, the defendant, with full knowledge of the rights of the second mortgage bondholders, took a lease of the railway at a rental merely sufficient to pay the interest on the first mortgage bonds, and has since been in possession of the property and in receipt of earnings therefrom largely in excess of the rental.

The Acts of the Legislature incorporating the railway company and authorizing the creation of the construction bonds by the State and the first mortgage upon the shares to secure their payment, are not fully set out in the bill; but as these are laws of which the courts must take judicial notice the bill is to be read in connection with their provisions. By the Act incorporating the railway company and directing the State to take shares therein power was granted to the corporation to lease its property and franchises.

Such effect was given to section 19 of the Act by the decision in State v. Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, 72 N. C. 634, where the lease in question to the present defendant was adjudged to be within the authority of the corporation. The Acts creating the statutory mortgages give effect to the lien of the bondholders at law and in equity without registry or proof of notice. The bill does not aver that the lease made to the defendant was improvident or in any respect invalid or vicious. The averment that at the time the lease was made the railway was earning 6 per cent upon its whole capital and the rent reserved was only equivalent to the interest on the first mortgage bonds of the State may be intended to suggest that the property was leased for an inadequate rental; but as the amount of the first mortgage bonds is not mentioned, and as their amount may have been for as much or for more than the amount of the capital stock, this averment does not even insinuate that the lease was improvident. The bill does not seek to have the lease declared invalid or vacated for any reason. Neither the railway company nor the State is made a party defendant.

The theory of the bill seems to be, and the case for the complainant has been argued upon that theory, that the State of North Carolina was invested by the legislation under which it became a stockholder of the railway company with complete control of the affairs of the company; that by the hypothecation of its shares to the second mortgage bondholders it impliedly agreed to become a trustee for them charged with the duty of exercising its power of control so as to preserve the earnings of the railway and appropriate them to the payment of the bonds; that, consequently, the earnings were a trust fund for the bondholders; that, by permitting the lease by the railway company to the defendant, the State consented to a diversion of the trust fund; and that as the defendant is the recipient of a trust fund with notice of the rights of the cestuis que trust it must account for such of the fund which has come to its hands as is not applicable to the payment of interest to the first mortgage bondholders.

The proposition that the State assumed fiduciary obligations towards the second mortgage bondholders which do not ordinarily exist between mortgagor and mortgagee, and which gave the bondholders the right to insist that the railway company should be managed in their interest as a trust property, has been ingeniously presented, but does not seem to have any real substance.

The case is not distinguishable, in its legal aspects, from one where an individual, a majority stockholder of the stock of a corporation, has hypothecated his shares by chattel mortgage to a creditor as security for a loan. In such a case it may be assumed that both parties to the transaction understand at the time that the value of the security is to depend upon the financial prosperity of the corporation, and measurably upon the honesty and efficiency of the corporate management; but no promise or duty can reasonably be implied from that understanding that the shareholder who has mortgaged his shares is to use his power of control in the corporate affairs exclusively in the interest of the mortgagee, or is not to consent to or promote any scheme or undertaking in the conduct of its business which is within the scope of its legitimate functions and which he may believe to be expedient and proper. Certainly no promise or duty can be implied from such an understanding which would be inconsistent with his obligations to the other shareholders, or his good faith towards the creditors of the corporation. So long as he conducts himself towards the mortgagee honestly in exerting his power of control, he violates no duty, and the latter has no ground of complaint.

When, in consequence of a default in payment, pursuant to the terms of the hypothecation, the mortgagee's title to the shares becomes absolute, he is in a position to substitute himself in the place of the mortgagor, and participate in the control of the corporation according to the forms, and subject to the conditions, of the organic law. If instead of doing this he nevertheless allows the mortgagor to do so, he ought not to complain, and cannot be heard to challenge any transactions with third persons by the corporation which are effected in the mean time in good faith and are within the corporate power.

Applying these familiar rules of law to the present case the second mortgage bondholders cannot assert with reason that the State has violated any fiduciary duty towards them, or that the corporation itself has been in any way a party to the subversion of their rights unless they are prepared to show, what is not alleged in the bill, that the lease was fraudulent or ultra vires. All persons dealing with a corporation must take notice of the provisions of its organic law.

In the present case the second mortgage bondholders were bound to know when they took their security that the railway company was authorized to lease its property and franchises and should have expected that circumstances might arise under which the interests of the corporation, its stockholders and its creditors, would be promoted by doing so. They were also bound to take notice of the prior rights of the first mortgage bondholders originating in the statutory mortgage created by the Acts of the Legislature, and to anticipate that the interests of these bondholders, to whose lien upon the shares of stock their own lien was subordinate, might require the company to lease its property. The second mortgage bondholders, therefore, took their securities with the knowledge that circumstances might arise under which it would be not only the right but the duty of the State, as a majority stockholder in the railway corporation toward the other stockholders and the first mortgage bondholders, to promote the leasing of the railway. Certainly it cannot be maintained that the effect of the second mortgage was such as to preclude the shareholders of the railway company, other than the State, and the prior mortgagees of the shares, from deriving the benefit of any legitimate mode of exercising the franchises granted to the corporation which might be expedient.

So far as appears from the bill the lease in question was a reasonable and legitimate arrangement, and has been acquiesced in since 1871 by the complainant and those whom he represents. It is fair to assume that the North Carolina Railroad Company and the State both regarded it as probably offering a better income than could be derived from the ordinary traffic of the railway, and therefore as an arrangement which would promote the interest of shareholders and bondholders.

Very clearly the second mortgage bondholders cannot maintain a suit in equity to charge the defendant with the earnings derived under the lease, when they do not assert that the lease is void or voidable as between the parties to it. The lease is either a valid contract between the North Carolina Railroad Company and the defendant or it is an invalid one. If valid the complainants cannot assail it, and the defendant is entitled to stand upon the terms of the contract, and derive whatever profit it may be able to from operating the road after paying the rent. It cannot be valid as between the parties to it, and invalid as to the complainant, unless the second mortgage bondholders have rights or equities superior to those they would have if when the bonds were not paid they had demanded and acquired the shares of stock hypothecated to them as collateral security. It may be that they are not in a position to intervene in the affairs of the North Carolina Railroad Company and cannot, through their influence at corporate meetings or otherwise, cause such proceedings to be taken by the corporation as it ought to take if the lease were a fraud upon the stockholders whom it represented as trustee in entering into the contract.

But although the complainant may occupy a better position as to matters of procedure and remedy than he would if he were a stockholder, this circumstance cannot prejudice the right of the defendant to insist that the contract cannot be set aside, in whole or in part, unless it is invalid as between the North Carolina Railroad Company, as a trustee for its stockholders, and itself. The complainant's cause of action is founded on the rights to which he has succeeded as a mortgagee of the shares of stock; and his position is not assisted, nor is that of the defendant prejudiced, by his neglect to substitute himself as a stockholder in place of a mortgagee of the stock.

For these reasons, and without discussing the other questions which are presented by the demurrer, the demurrer is sustained.

MOTION to remand cause to state court.
Denied.

The case is stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hoke & Burton Smith for motion to remand.

Messrs. Hopkins & Glen and Julius L. Brown contra.

Newman, J., delivered the following opinion:

This is a motion to remand; and in order that the question presented may be understood, a brief statement of the case is regarded as necessary. On the 18th day of July, 1887, the First National Bank of Sheffield filed its bill in equity in the Superior Court of Fulton County, Georgia, against the Merchants' Bank of Atlanta, on the following statement of facts:

On the 14th and 15th days of June, 1887, complainant had on deposit $8,000 with the defendant. Prior to that time complainant had been dealing with the Fidelity National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio, forwarding checks to said bank and said bank depositing, in place of said checks, currency to the credit of complainant in New York. Prior to said time the Fidelity National Bank had been perfectly solvent and was a bank which did an immense business, and complainant had dealt with it quite a length of time.

Just before or about the 14th day of June, 1887, said bank, through its officers, had squandered its money in sudden wild speculations in wheat and "futures" of different characters, and it had become totally insolvent; yet it continued to deal with complainant without giving complainant any notice of its changed condition, and fraudulently concealed such changed condition from complainant with full knowledge of the fact that complainant was not informed of said changed condition. By reason of said fraud the said Fidelity National Bank induced complainant on the 14th and 15th days of June, 1887, to send it two checks for $4,000 each on the Merchants' Bank of Atlanta. The Fidelity National Bank received the said checks two or three days later and fraudulently sent the same to the Merchants' Bank of Atlanta without forwarding the currency to New York, to be deposited to the credit of complainant, and said checks reached Atlanta on or about the 20th day of June, but the Merchants' Bank has never paid out said $8,000 to the said Fidelity National Bank and still has the same."

The prayers in the bill are for a decree requiring the Merchants' Bank to pay complainant $8,000, and enjoining it from paying it to the Fidelity National Bank. Temporary injunction was granted. On October 8, 1887, an order was passed making David Armstrong, Receiver of said Fidelity Bank, a party to the cause; and thereupon on the same day upon petition of said Armstrong an order was passed by said superior court removing the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States.

It is said in favor of this motion in the first place that the petition for removal, together with the bond and affidavit, were filed in the state court on the 7th day of October, 1887, and that David Armstrong, as receiver, was not made a party defendant until the next day, the 8th day of October. An examination of the record shows this to be true. It further shows that on the 7th day of October, the attorneys for complainant consented in writing that Armstrong, as receiver, be made a party defendant to said cause; and on the 8th day of October the court passed an order in which it is recited that Armstrong, as receiver, having been made a party in the cause, and having caused his appearance to be entered by his solicitor, and having made and filed a bond, and affidavit as required by law, said cause is removed to the Circuit Court of the United States.

I think that by this order the discrepancy in dates and the irregularities alluded to were cured. It seems that on the 7th when the receiver filed his petition for removal he had not, by formal order, been made a party; but I do not think that filing would have the effect to take from the court all jurisdiction to proceed further in the same, for it would seem that this proceeding by Armstrong to remove, when he was really not a party to the cause, would have no effect, and it required the order of the court, passed on the next day making him a party, to give the proceedings any force and effect whatever. I do not think, therefore, the position of counsel for complainant, that the matter alluded to requires the cause to be remanded, can be sustained.

It is said in the next place that the location of the Merchants' Bank, it being a Georgia Corporation, defeats the right of removal in the case. This would be true if the Merchants' Bank was a party to the controversy in the case having an interest therein, to be determined; but the record shows that it is only a nominal party. In the language of the petition, it is "but a stakeholder" of the fund in controversy, and it is apparent that the entire litigation and contention will be between the other two parties. The Merchants' Bank having no interest whatever therein, it simply holds the money to abide the judgment of the court as between the other two parties. Bacon v. Rice, 106 U. S. 99 [27 L. ed. 69].

But it is said that, even if this be true, the real and only controversy in the case is between the Sheffield Bank and Armstrong as receiver of the Fidelity Bank; that, then, the citizenship and residence of the parties is not such as to give this court jurisdiction by removal. In that aspect of the case it is a controversy between citizens and residents of different States, neither of whom is a citizen or resident of Georgia.

The decision of this question depends upon the construction that should be given the Act of March 8, 1887. By the first section of that Act the Circuit Courts of the United States are given "original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States." By the second clause of the second section of this Act "Any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the Circuit Courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by the preceding section, and which are now pending or which may hereafter be brought in any state court, may be removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district by the defendant or defendants therein being nonresidents of that State." In the latter part of section 1 is this provision: "And no civil suit shall be brought against any person by original process of (or) proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant; but where the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of different States, suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant."

It has been assumed by some courts, without any discussion of the subject, and without any reason given therefor in their published opinions, that the language quoted from section 2, as to removals, applies to the language last quoted from section 1. Yuba Co. v. Pioneer Gold Min. Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 188; McNeil Pipe, etc. v. S. E. Rep. 745; Pitkin Co. Min. Co. v. Markell, 33 Fed. Rep. 886; Harold v. Iron Silver Min. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 529; Tiffany v. Wilce, 34 Fed. Rep. 230.

In the case of Gavin v. Vance, 33 Fed. Rep. 84, Judge Hammond after stating that "The contrary view is neither impossible nor improbable nor yet unreasonable," concludes that section 2 refers to the latter part of section 1. See also Tiffany v. Wilce, 34 Fed. Rep. 230.

In all the cases that I have just cited, with one exception, the plaintiff was a resident of the district in which the suit was pending, and a decision of the question presented here was unnecessary. My conclusion as to the proper construction of these two sections is different. I do not think that it can be said that jurisdiction is given by the language quoted from the latter part of section 1. It relates to the locality in which suits may be brought by original "process of proceeding," and is intended for the benefit of defendants. It provides where they may be required to answer suits originating in the federal courts. Jurisdiction is conferred on the circuit courts by the first part of section 1; and that jurisdiction when founded on citizenship is between citizens of different States, provided the jurisdictional amount is involved; and it is to that portion of the section instead of the latter part, fixing the place where suits may be brought by original "process of proceeding," to which section 2 refers. "Removal of Causes" by Judge Speer of the Southern District of Georgia, § 21 et seq., and analysis C; Fales v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 82 Fed. Rep. 673; Short v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 84 Fed. Rep. 225 (approving the Fales Case); Vinal v. Continental Constr. Co. 84 Fed. Rep. 228.

I should have come to the conclusion I have indicated without very much hesitation but for the fact that several federal judges, in cases I have cited, seem to have taken a different view and have assumed, although, as I have stated, without any discussion of the subject as here presented, that the provision in the latter part of section 1 related to cases removed to this court as well as cases originating in it. I am strengthened very much in my own opinion of course as to the proper construction of the statute, by the fact that the same opinion is entertained by a number of judges in cases last cited, where the question before me is considered and decided.

Counsel for Armstrong, receiver, have argued that the court may retain jurisdiction of this case because of the fact that Armstrong is a receiver of a national bank; and they further urge that it is a suit for "winding up the affairs" of a national bank, within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1887.

I should not be inclined to concur in this view of the matter; but, as jurisdiction of the case is retained for reasons hereinbefore expressed, it is unnecessary to pass upon this question.

My conclusion is that the motion to remand this case must be denied.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF IOWA.

E. P. WELLES, Receiver of Commercial National Bank of Dubuque,

v.

Frank LARRABEE and First National Bank of McGregor.

(....Fed. Rep....)

1. A pledgee of stock in national bank, who holds it solely as collateral security for a debt due from the real owner of the stock, cannot be held liable as a stockholder for assessments thereon, when the name of such pledgee as owner or holder of the shares has never appeared upon the books of the bank, or even upon the certificates of stock.

2. A person who is not the owner of stock in a national bank, and who has no beneficial interest therein, cannot be held liable for assessments thereon by reason of the fact that the shares have been assigned to him to hold in trust, where it appears upon the proper books of the bank that he holds the same as trustee. If he can be held to be technically a stockholder, under United States Revised Statutes, section 5151, he must be also held exempt from liability as a trustee under section 5152.

(December 11, 1888.)

ON demurrer to the answer in an action at law, brought by the receiver of an insolvent national bank, to recover an assessment on shares of stock. Overruled.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Thomas Updegraff and William Graham for plaintiff,

Mr. James O. Crosby, for defendants:

As to pledge of shares of stock, see 2 Kent, Com. 18th ed. 577, note d.

The interpretation of United States Revised Statutes, § 5151, has been strict; and in every case, with a single exception, where a person's name has appeared on the stock books of a bank, as the owner of stock in his own right, he has been held liable to respond to the assessment, even though it were in fact held as collateral or in trust.

See Price v. Whitney, 28 Fed. Rep. 297; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Sessions, 28 Fed. Rep. 595; Davis v. First Baptist Society, 44 Conn. 582; Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 631 (25 L. ed. 448, 449), and cases cited.

Orense v. Babcock, 10 Met. 525, and Grew v. Breed, 10 Met. 569, decided in 1846, while seeming to favor the plaintiff, were interpreting Massachusetts Revised Statutes, chapter 86, section 41, which made no exception in favor of trustees, etc., as does United States Revised Statutes, section 5152; and the court held that trustees were individually liable, whether the trust appeared on the books of the bank or not.

In Adderly v. Storm, 6 Hill, 624, 626, under a New York Statute, it was held that there is "no exception to the rule, unless the existence of the trust appears on the face of the usual evidence of ownership."

There are no cases interpreting United States Revised Statutes, section 5152, but every case coming within its language, which includes all trusts, should receive its protection, where "the existence of the trust appears on the face of the usual evidence of ownership," with the same strictness that section 5151 has been applied to fix the liability of all those coming within its language.

The claim that the McGregor Bank is the real owner of the stock and liable as such in this action, is refuted by Anderson v. Philadelphia Warehouse Company, 111 U. S. 479 (28 L. ed. 478), and Henkle v. Salem Manufacturing Company, 39 Ohio St. 547.

Shiras, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the averments in the petition contained it appears that the Commercial National Bank was a corporation organized under the Act of Congress, doing business at Dubuque, Iowa; that on the 20th day of March, 1888, being insolvent, it ceased to do business, and the present plaintiff was duly appointed receiver thereof by the comptroller of the currency; that the liabilities were found to exceed the assets of the bank, and on the 25th day of July, 1888, the comptroller made an assessment upon the shares of the capital stock of said bank of 100 per cent upon the par value thereof, the same to be paid by August 25, 1888; that on the 20th day of March, 1888, the defendant Frank Larrabee, as trustee for the defendant the First National Bank of McGregor, was the owner of 100 shares of the capital stock of said Commercial National Bank of the par value of $10,000; wherefore judgment is asked against both defendants for said sum of $10,000.

To this petition the defendants answer, setting forth that previous to the 23d day of May, 1885, one J. K. Graves had become indebted to the First National Bank of McGregor in two loans of $5,000 each, evidenced by two promissory notes, and secured by the pledge of 100 shares of the capital stock of the Commercial Bank, the certificates being in the name of R. E. Graves, trustee, and by him assigned in blank; that on said 23d day of May, 1885, with a view to the extension of said loans, and for the securing the same, with the consent and by the direction of J. K. Graves, who was the real owner of said 100 shares of stock, the certificates named were surrendered to R. E. Graves, trustee, who was also president of the Commercial Bank, and a single new certificate of said 100 shares was issued to Frank Larrabee, trustee of the McGregor Bank; that J. K. Graves has never paid his indebtedness to said McGregor Bank; that said Larrabee has no interest whatever in said stock, but holds the same in trust for said J. K. Graves, and as collateral security for the payment of said indebtedness to the McGregor Bank due from J. K. Graves, who is the real owner of said stock; and that beyond said certificate of shares he has no estate or funds pertaining to said trust, or belonging to said J. K. Graves. To this answer the plaintiff demurs, and counsel have very fully argued the questions thereby presented for determination.

So far as the defendant bank is concerned, the question resolves itself into this: Can the pledgee of stock in a national bank, who holds the same solely as collateral security for a debt due it from the real owner of the stock, be held liable for the assessments thereon, when the name of the pledgee as owner or holder of the shares has never appeared upon the books of the bank, or even upon the certificates of stock? As to the defendant Larrabee the question is: Can a person who is not the owner of the stock, and has no beneficial interest therein, be held liable for the assessments thereon by reason of the fact that the shares have been assigned to him to hold in trust, it appearing upon the proper books of the bank that he holds the same as trustee.

It may perhaps aid in reaching the true solution of these questions to state briefly some principles which are fully recognized, touching the liability of stockholders and the grounds therefor. One of the purposes of a corporation is to enable those interested therein as shareholders to limit their liability for the indebtedness of the corporation. The statutes authorizing the creation of the particular corporation usually fix the limit of such liability.

In the case of national banks, the shareholders, in addition to being required to pay in the full amount of the stock subscribed for, are further liable, in case of need, for an amount equal to the face value of the stock held by them. In enforcing this liability the first prinprinciple recognized is that the actual owner of the stock may be held liable for the assessment upon the shares owned at the time of the failure of the corporation. This is upon the principle that the parties, who by reason of being the actual owners of the stock are entitled to the profits and benefits of the business carried on by the corporation, must respond to the burdens and debts up to the statutory limit. In the enforcement of this liability against stockholders it is well established that the actual owners of the corporate stock cannot shield themselves against such liability by putting the title of the stock in the name of some irresponsible third party. Creditors have the right to call upon the actual stockholders for contribution; and this right cannot be defeated by a merely colorable transfer of the legal title to some third party, who in fact holds the same for the benefit of the real owner of the stock. Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 215; Johnson v. Laftin, 5 Dill. 75; McClaren v. Pranciscus, 43 Mo. 467; Mechanics Bank v. Seton, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 802 [7 L. ed. 153].

It is a further recognized principle that a party who permits himself to be held out upon the books of the corporation as a shareholder in fact will, in favor of creditors, be held to be such. Parties dealing with a corporation have a right to assume that all persons shown by the books of the corporation to be stockholders are bound for the liabilities of the corporation in the manner provided by the statutes under which the corporation is organized. If, therefore, a person knowingly permits his name to appear upon the stock books as a shareholder in fact, he will be estopped in favor of creditors from denying liability. Re Reciprocity Bank, 22 N. Y. 17; Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, §§ 160, 161.

These general rules, and others deducible from the adjudged cases, are all based upon the foundation principle that the parties really interested as stockholders in corporations, and who as such are entitled to control and manage the affairs of the corporation, and to receive and enjoy the profits of the corporate business, are bound to respond to the liability imposed by the statute, when the business of the corporation has ceased to be profitable, and the ordinary assets are inadequate to meet the just demands of creditors. The rights of creditors are fully met and protected if the statutory liability is enforced against all who are in fact stockholders in the insolvent corporation, and against all who have knowingly permitted their names to appear or continue upon the corporate books as stockholders in fact, under such circumstances as would justify third parties in assuming that they were stockholders.

There is no principle of law or equity which justifies the holding a person liable as a stockholder in a corporation if in fact he is not one, unless he has knowingly permitted his name to appear as a stockholder, and thereby presumably misled parties dealing with the corporation. The liability sought to be enforced is purely statutory, and the declaration of the statute is that "the shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such association to the extent of the amount of their stock therein at the par value thereof," etc. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5151.

To be liable, the party charged must be a shareholder, and by the construction placed upon these and similar provisions in other statutes it is held that the actual shareholder cannot escape liability by placing the legal title of his shares in the name of a third party, and that one who knowingly permits his name to be placed upon the corporate books as an owner of stock, or who permits it to continue thereon after he has in fact sold his stock, will be estopped from asserting that he is not a shareholder in favor of creditors who might otherwise be misled.

Applying these principles to the facts averred in the record of the present case, what is the result? So far as the defendant bank is concerned it is not averred nor claimed that its name ever appeared upon the books of the Commercial Bank as a shareholder, or that it ever held itself out in any way to be the owner in fact of the shares of stock upon which it is now sought to be made liable. There is nothing averred, therefore, that works an estoppel upon the bank; and it may be heard to assert that it is not the actual owner of the stock in question. On part of plaintiff it is argued that the facts averred in the answer show that the McGregor Bank is the pledgee of the stock, and by reason of that fact must be held liable. If a person receives a transfer of stock, the legal title thereto being conveyed to him upon the corporate books, he becomes by his own act the apparent owner of the shares, and he cannot afterwards show, as against creditors, that in fact the transfer was by way of security only. Hale v. Walker, 31 Iowa, 844; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill. 296; Holyoke Bank v. Burnham, 11 Cush. 183; Adderly v. Storm, 6 Hill, 624; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 828 [24 L. ed. 818]; Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628 [25 L. ed. 448].

Some of the cases go to the extent of holding that, even if it appears on the corporate books that the stock is held in trust, and not absolutely, nevertheless the party in whose name it thus stands will be held liable. These cases seem to be based upon the assumption that the courts will disregard the addition of the word "trustee," and will hold the party to be on the face of the record the apparent legal owner of the stock. If this assumption is well taken, then the conclusion of liability is inevitable, under the rule that one who knowingly permits himself to appear as the legal owner of the stock upon the books of the corporation is estopped, in favor of creditors, from denying such ownership and the consequent liability. In these cases, however, the corporate books showed an assignment or transfer of the stock to the pledgee; and the true ground of liability in such cases, where it exists, is not because the pledgee is the owner in fact of the stock, for he is not, but the fact that the pledgee has received a transfer of the stock in such form that the legal ownership appears to be in him, and by thus holding himself out as apparent owner he is estopped from showing the contrary. It will be borne in mind, however, that the shares of the stock pledged as a security for the debt of J. K. Graves to the McGregor Bank were never carried on the books of the Commercial Bank in the name of the McGregor Bank.

The rule to be applied in such a case is found in Anderson v. Phila. Warehouse Co. 111 U. S. 479 [28 L. ed. 478], in which it is held that where stock in a national bank was transferred in good faith as security for a debt, and the legal title was placed in the name of an irresponsible third party, the pledgee could not be made liable for assessments upon such stock; it being held that the pledgee had a perfect right to thus take the stock as security for the debt due it, without making itself liable as the apparent owner thereof.

In the case at Bar, therefore, as the facts averred in the answer and admitted by the demurrer are that the McGregor Bank never owned the stock of the Commercial Bank, and that its only interest therein was by way of security for a debt due from the actual owner of the stock, and it not appearing that the McGregor Bank was ever held out or represented to be the owner of the stock in question, and as the legal title thereto never passed to the bank—it must be held that the answer, read in connection with the petition, presents a good defense to the action, and is not assailable by demurrer.

There is left, then, for consideration the question whether the facts appearing in the answer and petition constitute a defense for the defendant Larrabee. These facts are: that he never was the beneficial owner of the shares of stock in question; that the same were assigned to him in trust by the actual owner, J. K. Graves, to be held as security for the debt due the McGregor Bank; and that, when the transfer on the books of the Commercial Bank was made to him, the character of the title and interest transferred to him was indicated by the addition of the word "trustee" thereto.

Notwithstanding the ruling in some of the cases that such an addition is to be disregarded, the weight of authority accords with what on principle appears to be the common-sense construction of such a subscription. The word "trustee" is one of significance. It is constantly made use of, not only in legal phraseology, but in common speech, to indicate that one holds the title to property, not in his own absolute right, but for the benefit of some other party or parties.

The fair and reasonable conclusion that all would reach, upon noticing the fact upon the stock book of a corporation that certain shares of stock were held by A B, trustee, would be that he held the same, not in his own right, but for the benefit of some other party. If the subscription upon the stock register was in the name of A B, administrator or executor, could it be fairly said that persons dealing with the corporation would be justified in assuming that stock thus held was held by A B, in his own right, and not in a representative capacity? Such words as trustee, administrator, and executor have a well understood meaning, and, when attached to a name appearing upon the corporate books, are certainly sufficient to notify all that such shares of stock are held by the subscriber, not in his own right, but in a representative capacity, thus putting those dealing with the corporation upon inquiry. Thus in Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, it is said that it is an erroneous assumption that the word "trustee" alone has no meaning or legal effect; that "The law holds that the insertion of the word 'trustee' after the name of a stockholder does indicate and give notice of a trust. No one is at liberty to disregard such notice, and to abstain from inquiry, for the reason that a trust is frequently simulated or pretended when it really does not exist."

In Duncan v. Jaudon, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 165 [21 L. ed. 142], the supreme court cites this case of Shaw v. Spencer approvingly, saying: "And the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in a recent case, in its essential features like the case at Bar, decides that, if a certificate of stock expressed in the name of A B, trustee, is by him pledged to secure his own debt, the pledgee is, by the terms of the certificate, put upon inquiry as to the character and limitations of the trust, and, if he accepts the pledge without inquiry, does so at his peril. In that case the cestui que trust was not named in the certificate, and the court remarked that, if it were so, the duty of inquiry would hardly be controverted. If these propositions are sound—and we entertain no doubt on the point—the liability of the appellants for the conversion of the stock belonging to Mrs. Jaudon cannot be an open question."

It is not necessary to cite further authorities in support of the proposition that the addition of the word "trustee" to the name of Frank Larrabee upon the stock certificate was sufficient to charge parties with notice that he held the stock, not as his own, but as a trustee. Indeed, counsel for plaintiff in their argument do not controvert this proposition, but argue that the word "trustee" only notified parties dealing with the bank of the real facts, to wit: that Larrabee held the stock as pledgee, and as such is liable for the assessments. The facts, as pleaded in the answer, however, show that in fact J. K. Graves was the pledgee, and the McGregor Bank was the pledgee, and Larrabee was merely a trustee. There was no debt due him, nor could he in any way derive any benefit or advantage from the pledge. If Graves paid the debt due the bank, then it would become the duty of Larrabee to return the stock to Graves. If the debt was not paid, and the stock was sold for the payment thereof, then it would be his duty to pay the proceeds, or so much thereof as should be necessary to pay the debt, to the McGregor Bank, returning the surplus to Graves. Larrabee is neither the actual owner of the stock, nor has he any beneficial interest therein as pledgee or otherwise. His sole connection with the stock, according to the averments of the answer, was the taking and holding the title in trust for the real owner, Graves, subject to the claims of the McGregor Bank as a creditor of Graves; and according to the averments of the petition he was a trustee for the benefit of the McGregor Bank. Thus it appears that in fact Larrabee held the title of the stock as trustee only, and such fact appeared upon the face of the stock certificate; and by the express terms of section 5152 of the Revised Statutes it is declared that "Persons holding stock as executors, administrators, guardians or trustees, shall not be personally subject to any liabilities as stockholders, but the estates and funds in their hands shall be liable," etc.

Counsel for plaintiff argue that the trustees intended to be exempted by this section are such only as, having funds in their hands for investment, have invested the same in stock of national banks, and that the exemption does not apply to cases where the trustee holds the naked legal title in trust for some third party; and in support of this proposition counsel cite Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, §§ 179, 180; Hoare's Case, 2 Johns. & H. 229; Stover v. Fluck, 30 N. Y. 64; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill. 296; Johnson v. Laflin, 5 Dill. 75.

These authorities are dealing with cases wherein the trust was a secret one, growing out of the relations of the parties. If, however, the trust is an express trust, and the fact that a trust exists appears upon the corporate books, what ground exists for holding that the statutory exemption does not apply? The statute provides that parties holding stocks as trustees shall not be personally liable; and, if the party has not estopped himself from showing that he holds the stock only as trustee, by permitting himself to be held out upon the corporate books as an owner of the stock in his own right, then it would seem clear that one who in fact holds the stock as trustee only is expressly exempted from personal liability.

All that is necessary to be done to bring one within the terms of the statute is to show that the party holds the stock as trustee, and this being shown, the exemption attaches. What good reason can be urged for holding that a person in whom the naked legal title of the stock is vested in trust merely, and who derives no benefit therefrom, and who has no funds or estate in his possession or under his control to which he might look for reimbursement, should be held personally liable for the assessments upon the stock thus held by him, when a trustee who has an estate or funds in his possession or under his control is expressly exempt from personal liability. If any distribution is to be made, it would be more in consonance with just principles to hold the trustee, having an estate or funds in possession, to which he might look for reimbursement, liable for the assessment; rather than one who holds merely a naked title.

If, however, the view taken by plaintiff's counsel of the meaning of section 5152 is correct, it does not follow that the defendant Larrabee is liable. The statutory liability does not attach to him unless he is a shareholder; and upon general principles it must be held that a mere naked trustee, who has no beneficial interest in the stock, but holds the title for the benefit of the real owner and parties in interest, the existence of such trust appearing upon the corporate books, cannot be held to be a shareholder within the meaning of section 5151 of the Revised Statutes.

In the cases of administrators, executors, and trustees of that character, that there is no principal back of them, it might be argued with much force that they should be held liable as the owners of the stock, because the title vests in them, not as agents for some responsible principal, but as owners of the title, though bound to account for the proceeds thereof. To prevent liability from attaching to such administrators, executors, guardians and trustees, section 5152 was enacted; but it is not a fair inference that, by enacting the exemption therein provided for, it was the intent to make liable as shareholders in fact parties who are not the real owners of shares, and who do not and cannot participate in the management of the corporation, nor in the benefits and profits derived from the corporate business. As to such parties, the fundamental reason for liability to creditors fails.

If it be sought to hold the defendant Larrabee liable because by a technical construction of the word "shareholder" he may be included within the same, as found in section 5151, then he has the right to insist that a similarly technical construction be placed upon the word "trustee," as used in section 5152, in which case he would be exempt simply because he comes within the language of the section. But, looking beyond the mere language used in these sections, or rather construing the same according to the true meaning and purpose thereof, it must be true that Larrabee cannot be held liable under the provisions of section 5151, unless it appears that he is a shareholder in the defunct bank, or has held himself out as such. According to the averments of the answer he did not own the shares of stock assigned to him as trustee, and had no beneficial interest of any kind therein, nor could he derive any benefit therefrom. He had assumed the duties of a trustee for the owner or pledgee, Graves, and for the creditor or pledgee, the McGregor Bank; but beyond the duties of such trusteeship he has no interest in the stock. He represents, on the one hand, the real owner of the stock, to whom creditors may look for the payment of the assessments, and on the other, the pledgee and creditor; and, occupying this position, he cannot be fairly or properly said to be a shareholder in the bank within the meaning of section 5151 of the Revised Statutes. Not being then a shareholder within the meaning of that section, or, if he be such, then being a trustee within the exception enacted in section 5152, he cannot be held liable for the assessments upon the stock held by him as trustee.

The demurrer, therefore, to the answer must in favor of both defendants be, and the same is hereby, overruled.

Warehousemen in Alabama who deliver up cotton stored with them, to a third person producing their receipt therefor, may be held liable to the mortgagee of such cotton whose mortgage is properly recorded in another county, although they have no actual notice of the mortgage.

(December 12, 1883.)

A PPEAL by defendants, from a judgment of the Lee County Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action of trover for the alleged conversion of two bales of cotton. Affirmed.

Defendants pleaded not guilty, and a special plea averring that they received the cotton as warehousemen for storage only, and delivered it up on production of their receipt, without notice of plaintiff's right or claim.

At the trial it appeared that plaintiff had, in 1880, advanced money to May and Roberts, who cultivated land in Macon County, to enable them to make a crop, and had taken as security therefor mortgages which covered, among other things, the entire crop of cotton to be raised on the land during that year. These mortgages were duly recorded in Macon County and the law day of each was October 1, 1880. The cotton in controversy was a portion of that covered by these mortgages. It had been carried by May and Roberts, on November 6, 1880, to Opelika in Lee County, and there stored in the warehouse of defendants, who gave a warehouse receipt for it and afterwards delivered it to some third person upon the production by him of their receipt. Plaintiff, upon inquiry, was informed by defendants that the cotton had been stored with them, and upon production of their receipt that they had delivered it to a third person whose name they declined to state. They had no actual notice of plaintiff's right or claim to the cotton.

Messrs. A. & R. B. Barnes for appellants.

Mr. W. J. Sanford for appellee.

Somerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 682, decided as far back as 1846, the rule was settled by this court, in accordance with the English authorities, that an agent who intermeddles with the goods of another is guilty of a conversion, if the same act of intermeddling by his principal would, under like circumstances, have rendered the latter liable in trover. It was said by Ormond, J., that "Every act of intermeddling with the goods of another is a conversion; and that it is no answer to the true owner that the person so receiving the goods was ignorant of his title, or that he received them for the use or benefit of another."

The same rule is reiterated in Permynter v. Kelly, 18 Ala. 716 (decided in 1851), and is fully sustained by the weight of authority Marks v. Robinson, 82 Ala. 69, 83.

The only exception to this rule which our decisions have established is stated in Nelson v. Iverson, 17 Ala. 216, the authority of which is recognized in Marks v. Robinson, supra (1887). This exception is that the mere receiving of goods by one who restores them to his bailor, before notice that such bailor's possession is wrongful, is not a conversion.

Under the above principles, the appellants were guilty of a conversion in receiving the appellee's cotton and shipping it on his order, unless they come within the exception announced in Nelson v. Iverson, supra. It is insisted in argument that such shipment is legally tantamount to restoring the cotton to the possession of the bailor. The rule, in our judgment, cannot be construed to go this far. The exception in question only embraces the act of restoring the thing bailed to the mere possession of the bailor—a substantial restoration of the original status in quo of the property. It does not include a restoration of the bailor's dominion by an act the essential nature of which is a defiance of the true owner's title, or the probable consequence of which will be to put the property beyond his reach; and such is the act of conversion here imputed to the appellants.

The rulings of the circuit court touching this point are, in our opinion, free from error. The registration of the appellee's mortgage on the cotton in controversy was constructive notice to the appellants of the existence of the mortgage, and as binding on them as actual notice would have been. Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 408; Heftin v. Slay, 78 Ala. 180; Marks v. Robinson, supra.

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court, in favor of plaintiff upon a motion for execution against defendant to recover unpaid subscriptions to the stock of an insolvent bank. Reversed.

The Missouri Revised Statutes of 1879, § 788, authorizes the issuance of an execution upon the motion of a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation, against "any of the stockholders to the extent of the amount of the unpaid balance of the stock by him or her owned."

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Britton A. Hill (pro se) and Martin, Laughlin & Kern for appellant.

Messrs. H. I. D'Arcey and James P. Maginn for respondent.

Brace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 7th of April, 1881, plaintiffs in

1. A purchaser, at a sale on execution, of stock in a corporation, which defendant had previously transferred in good faith on the books of the corporation as collateral security, acquires no title by such purchase, so as to make him chargeable with liability as a stockholder, to the creditors of the corporation.
2. The transfer of stock on the books of a corporation, by persons holding it as collateral security, to one who had bid off such stock on execution against his debtor, who had pledged it as collateral, does not make him liable as a stockholder, where such transfer is made without his request or knowledge. The fact that he had bid it off on execution does not, by implication, authorize such transfer.

2 T. R. A.

testate obtained a judgment in the Circuit Court of St. Louis against the Butchers' & Drovers' Bank for the sum of $10,880; and an execution issued thereon on the 25th of that month was returned nulla bona on the 6th of June, 1881. At the April Term, 1888, of said court, the plaintiff moved for an execution against the defendant as a stockholder in said bank. The motion was resisted, and on the hearing, was sustained, and an execution ordered against the defendant in the sum of $5,000; and from this order the defendant appeals.

The facts in the case, as they appeared in evidence, are substantially as follows: on the 7th day of December, 1870, Peter Curran, being then the owner of 100 shares of the capital stock of said bank, of the par value of $10,000, 50 per cent of which was unpaid, borrowed from the bank the sum of $2,000, for which he executed his note, payable in ninety days, bearing 10 per cent interest, and at the same time transferred on the books of the bank fifty shares of his stock to P. S. Langton. On the 8th of May, 1871, Curran borrowed the further sum of $3,964.50, for which he executed two notes, bearing the same rate of interest, and at the same time transferred to B. M. Chambers the remaining fifty shares of his stock. Chambers was the president and Langton was the cashier of the bank. According to the testimony of Chambers, by an oral agreement, the stock was to be held by him and Langton as collateral security for these loans. On the 27th of April, 1877, while the stock thus stood in the name of Langton and Chambers, Hill & Collins, a firm, of which the defendant was a partner, obtained judgment against Curran for $2,500, and caused execution to be issued thereon. The officer holding the execution repaired to the bank, and demanded a statement of the amount of stock held by Peter Curran, and the cashier thereupon gave him the following certificate:

"There is no stock of the Butchers' & Drovers' Bank in Peter Curran's name. P. S. Langton, Cashier."

And the sheriff indorsed the following return on the execution:

"Executed this writ in St. Louis County on the 7th of May, 1877, by levying upon one hundred shares of stock in the Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, as the property of Peter Curran, the defendant; and I delivered a copy of this writ to B. M. Chambers, president of said bank, with my indorsement of said levy thereon, stating to him that I did levy on and take such rights and shares to satisfy this writ."

On the same day the sheriff advertised for sale, on the 19th of May, 1877, the interest of Curran in said 100 shares of stock to satisfy said execution; and at the sale it was struck off to Hill & Collins for $1,000, which amount, after deducting costs, was credited on the execution; and as to the remainder the writ was returned nulla bona on the 4th of June, 1877, with this additional return: "I delivered a copy of this writ, together with the advertisement, a copy of which is hereto attached, to P. S. Langton, cashier of the Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, with my return of levy and sale of one hundred shares of stock above mentioned, and offered to transfer said stock to the purchasers, but was assured the defendant had none to transfer." Curran had never paid anything on his notes, and at the time of this sale they were long overdue, and amounted, principal and interest, to more than $9,000.

On the 12th of July, 1877, Hill & Collins brought suit against the bank for $5,000 damages, for refusing to permit a transfer of Curran's stock upon the books of the bank; on the 18th the writ was served on Chambers, the president, and on the same day he and Langton transferred the 100 shares of stock in their name to Hill & Collins on the books of the bank, without their knowledge or consent. On the same day the bank closed in an insolvent condition, and ceased to do business. At the time of the transfer from Curran to Chambers and Langton the stock of the bank was worth, in the market, probably seventy or eighty cents on the dollar of paid-up stock. At the time of the levy of Collins & Hill there was no demand for it, and when transferred to them by Chambers and Langton, was worth nothing.

On the second of October, 1877, the bank filed an answer in the suit of Hill & Collins, and on the 28th of January, 1878, an amended answer, in which, after denying the allegations of the petition, and that Curran was the owner of any stock in the bank except as thereafter stated, then proceeded to set out the transfer of the stock by Curran to Chambers and Langton, to be held by them as collateral security for the payment of the notes before mentioned with interest, averring that said notes and interest remain due and unpaid, and setting up the provision in the charter of the bank, prohibiting a transfer except on its books, and after all debts due by the shareholder had been paid, but saying nothing about the transfer by Chambers and Langton to Hill & Collins on the 18th of July preceding.

On the trial, on the evidence in support of the answer, Hill & Collins took a nonsuit. They were, by the answers in this case, for the first time informed that Curran had transferred his stock to Langton and Chambers; and more than five years afterwards the defendant was first informed, by the commencement of this proceeding against him, that Langton and Chambers had transferred the stock to Collins & Hill. On this state of facts the circuit court held that the defendant was a holder of said unpaid-up stock, and as such subject to execution upon plaintiff's judgment against the bank to the amount remaining unpaid thereon.

The only question presented on the record of this case is: Was the defendant Hill a stockholder of the Butchers' & Drovers' Bank on the 6th of June, 1881, within the meaning of section 786, Revised Statutes 1879?

It will be observed from the foregoing statement that, if Hill was such stockholder, it must be because he became so either by virtue of his purchase at the execution sale of Curran's stock, or by virtue of the transfer of stock to him by Chambers and Langton. It therefore becomes necessary to inquire what were the legal relations of these parties to the stock. The transfer by Curran of his stock to Chambers and Langton was to them individually, on the books of the bank, absolute and unconditional. By that transfer they became the legal owners of the stock, entitled to vote it, draw dividends on it, and, to the extent of it, exer cise control and management of the affairs of the bank, and become liable as holders of it to creditors of the bank. Curran then ceased to be a stockholder in the bank, so far as that stock was concerned. He had in good faith, for a valuable consideration, parted with it, and, as to subsequent creditors of the bank, was no longer liable as a stockholder, having lost the power either to protect them or himself, although he may have had an equity in respect of that stock against the holders by virtue of a parol agreement made at the time of its transfer.

"It is thoroughly established that one to whom stock has been transferred in pledge, or as collateral security for money loaned, and who appears on the books of the corporation as the owner of the stock, is liable as a stockholder for the benefit of creditors." Germania Nat. Bank v. Case, 99 U. S. 628 [25 L. ed. 448].

"Where shares are held by a person as trustee for another, the legal holder of the shares, and not the equitable owner, is primarily liable both to the company and its creditors. Neither the company nor its creditors would be entitled to charge the equitable owner as shareholder." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 858.

"Unless the rule has been changed by statute, liability to pay calls and to respond in the case of insolvency to creditors attaches to the holder of the legal title only; and the court will not look beyond the registered shareholder, nor inquire under what equities he holds." Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 178.

It follows that during the six years of the existence of this bank, after the transfer of Curran, during which time, by its management, the value of the stock was reduced from seventy-five cents on the dollar to nothing, those dealing with the institution were, by the books of the bank, and the law of the land, pointed to Chambers and Langton as the stockholders liable to respond to them for the amount unpaid on these 100 shares of stock, in case they should be compelled to resort to that fund for satisfaction of their demands. And in this summary proceeding, in which the court is charged with the duty of ascertaining who is the stockholder to be legally charged with liability for plaintiff's debt, and not to settle the equities between Curran's vendee, the bank, or its creditors, and the legal owner of the stock, the question that becomes important is not, Who stands in Curran's shoes? but Who stands in the shoes of Chambers and Langton, if they have ever legally cast them off? And for this purpose it is not necessary to define what, if any, interest or right the defendant acquired under the execution sale. He did not acquire Chambers and Langton's stock, for the process was not against them. Curran had none, and the defendant acquired none by his purchase, and did not, by reason of that purchase, become a stockholder.

Did he become one by virtue of the transfer of Chambers and Langton on the 18th of July? "The general rule is that a person whose name appears on the books of a corporation is a shareholder, both as to the corporation and as to the public." Thompson, supra, § 177.

This supposes, of course, that the shares have been placed in his name with his consent, as was remarked in the case of Chapman v. Barker, L. R. 8 Eq. 361. "If the mere placing 2 L. R. A.

a name upon the register rightly or wrongly is to give the creditors a right to proceed against the individual, any one of us now in this court might find himself upon the register of some company, and liable to its creditors. It is an absurdity to say that I am to be liable because directors choose to put me down upon the register as a shareholder. . . . The case is wholly different where a person agrees to have his name put upon the register for any purpose. The creditors have a right to take as their debtor everybody who is properly upon the register, including the trustees for the company; but creditors do not, therefore, obtain the right of insisting upon retaining as their debtor a person whose name has been placed there by fraud or wrong, or ought never to have been there at all. An important question might arise as to how far a person, after he knows that his name has been wrongly placed upon the register, may, by acts of acquiescence, such as accepting a dividend or the like, be held liable. It is like any other case. He cannot approbate and reprobate. If, for his own convenience, he adopts the act, he must be liable for the consequence of the act. The question whether he has or has not adopted it is wholly one of degree and of evidence for the court. But I cannot entertain any doubt that a man, who is placed by the directors, through contrivance, in a position which they are not entitled to place him in, will not be liable to creditors or anybody else."

As Hill knew nothing of this transfer by Chambers and Langton to Hill & Collins until the motion in this case was filed for execution against him, and as from that moment he has been persistently repudiating it, it cannot be pretended that he ever expressly agreed to the transfer, or ratified it, by any act or word of his after it was done. But it is insisted that by his acts he, by implication, authorized it to be done, and is now estopped from denying that it was done with his assent; that, if Hill & Collins did not, by their purchase at the execution sale, become the owners of the stock that stood in the names of Chambers and Langton, and did not thereby become stockholders in the bank, they did by virtue of that purchase, acquire the equity that Curran had as against the bank and Chambers and Langton to redeem the stock; and that they must be held by their acts in acquiring that equity and their subsequent action to have requested a redemption, which was accepted by Chambers and Langton, and the bank; and that the transfer made to them was in pursuance of that request; and that the defendant thus became a stockholder of the bank.

We are cited to the case of Foster v. Foller, 37 Mo. 526, in support of the proposition that Hill & Collins, by their purchase at the execution sale, acquired Curran's equity of redemption in the stock. Without stopping to distinguish this case from that one, and without being understood as holding, either that Curran had an equity of redemption in this stock upon the facts in the case, or that, if he had, it passed by the execution sale—for the sake of argument let it be conceded that he had such an equity; that it passed by the sale; and that the argument may flow unimpeded, let any objection that might be raised to considering the bank and its trustees as one in their transactions, or the right of the trustees to give away the trust fund, be waived. Do we find in the evidence any fact from which at any time either the bank, Chambers, or Langton would be authorized to infer a request upon the part of Hill & Collins that the incumbered stock should be transferred to them? Unless we do find such a fact, the defendant is not estopped from denying that it was assigned at his request.

A brief consideration of the salient facts in the case will answer this question, and for this purpose the further mention of the name of Collins may be omitted. The defendant, having a judgment for $3,500, against Curran, being desirous of making his debt, and believing that Curran was the owner of stock in the bank, and that something might be made out of it, sues out his execution. The officer goes to the bank for the purpose of levying the execution on Curran's stock, if he has any, and informs the officers of his purpose. The law then made it the duty of the cashier to furnish the officer with a certificate under his hand, stating the number of shares the defendant in the execution held in the stock of the bank "with the incumbrance thereon." The cashier certified that "there was no stock in the bank in Curran's name."

Is it to be supposed for a moment that, if Curran had then been regarded by the officers of the bank as the holder of this stock, half paid up, worth in the market less than forty cents on the dollar, incumbered with a debt to the bank of more than $9,000, and with a contingent liability for the amount unpaid thereon, and they had so certified, as it was their duty to do, that the subsequent levy and sale would have been proceeded with? If they had done so, the defendant would have seen at once that he was engaged in a vain pursuit, and would, doubtless, have abandoned it as quickly as he did a similar one, at a later stage in the proceedings when the officers of the bank first disclosed such a state of case in the answers, and supported by their evidence in the suit instituted by him against the bank for their refusal to permit a transfer on their book of Curran's supposed stock.

The defendant was seeking, by due process of law, to subject Curran's stock, if he had any, to his debt. In attempting to do so, he claimed to have become the owner of that stock by purchase under such legal process, and asked that a transfer be made on the books of the bank in pursuance of such purchase. The bank refused to permit such transfer to be made, and, when sued for damages for such refusal, by showing that at the time of the levy and sale Curran had no stock in the bank; that Chambers and Langton were the owners of the stock that Curran once owned; that Curran had a mere equity, and a worthless one at that, against the then holders of that stock—satisfied him that he had acquired nothing by his purchase, and he abandoned his action for damages, as he would, doubtless, have abandoned his pursuit of Curran's supposititious stock before the sale, if they had given him this information at the time it was their duty to have done so.

The defendant was after Curran's stock. He did not get it, because years before Curran had parted with it to Chambers and Langton. He was not after Chambers and Langton's stock. He could not have gotten it if he had wanted it, by that process, and would not have wanted it if he could have gotten it—burdened as it was with liabilities far exceeding its value. This effort made by the defendant to subject the supposed stock of Curran (in his ignorance of the disposition that Curran had long since made of it) to the payment of his debt, and his subsequent action for damages, superinduced by the failure of the officers of the bank to give him timely and proper information of the actual condition of the stock, is the sole ground upon which is rested the claim that the transfer made by Langton and Chambers to the defendant on the 18th of July, 1877, was made at the request of the defendant.

Conceding, then, that the defendant acquired the right to redeem this stock from Chambers and Langton (he never exercised it, or sought to exercise it), they could not exercise it for him, and, without his consent, thrust upon him obligations which they had incurred by the ownership of this stock up to the very hour that the shades of bankruptcy closed in around the institution, and rendered its stock worthless. This transfer was not made in answer to any demand ever made by Hill to redeem this stock, for he never made such a demand. The only demand that he ever made, or was ever made in his behalf, was that the officer who made the sale under the execution might transfer on the books of the bank the stock of Curran that he undertook to sell. If that demand had been granted, and the transfer had been made by him, Langton and Chambers would have still remained the holders of the stock that Curran once owned, by virtue of his previous transfer to them; and Hill, by such transfer, would not have become the owner of that stock or a stockholder of the bank. How, then, can it be held that this secret transfer by them can enlarge the scope of that demand, or be held to be in compliance with it? Upon what principle of law or equity can the defendant be estopped from asserting that such transfer was without his assent?

Every dollar of indebtedness incurred by the bank upon the faith of this unpaid stock was upon the faith of the legal ownership of that stock by Chambers and Langton, and it would be monstrous to hold that, as these officers closed the doors of that institution, which they had conducted to the brink of financial ruin, to any future credit, upon the faith thereof, they could, in the act of doing so, unload their present obligations, incurred upon the faith of their past ownership of that stock, upon the shoulders of the defendant; or that creditors of the bank, by their act, could acquire a right to look from those whom they had trusted to him, whom they had not trusted to answer their demands, simply because he himself had been trying to secure his debt from one who had formerly been, but had long since ceased to be, a stockholder in the bank. There can be no doubt that the defendant was not a stockholder in the bank when the execution against it was returned nulla bona, and that the trial court committed error in holding that he was.

1. The doctrine that when a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property it can be followed and subjected to the preferential rights of the cestui que trust, is to be limited to cases where the identity of the fund can be traced, and is not to be extended to cases where it has been so mingled with other moneys or property that it can no longer be specifically separated.
2. If a bank, on receiving from another bank commercial paper "for collection and immediate return," makes the collection and mingles the money collected with its general funds, and thereafter becomes insolvent, having cash on hand sufficient to cover such collection, the fund collected must be held to have so lost its identity that the cash on hand will not be impressed with a trust lien in favor of the bank for which the collection was made, as against general creditors.
3. Where money collected by a bank for another bank, under instructions for immediate return, is allowed to remain for several months with the collecting bank, which becomes insolvent without having made return, the bank for which the collection was made will not be considered a cestui que trust, but will be treated as an ordinary creditor.
4. The statutory prohibition against preferences in the distribution of assets of insolvent national banks will not prevent a cestui que trust from following trust money held for him by such bank as trustee, into any new investment thereof made by the bank, capable of identification, but will prevent its being followed after it has lost its identity by being mingled with the general funds of the bank.

ACTION against the receiver of an insolvent national bank to recover the proceeds of collections made by the insolvent bank for the plaintiff bank before the insolvency. BNJ dismissed.

The facts are fully stated by the court.

Mears, Battle & Mordecai for plaintiff.

Mr. F. H. Busbee for defendant.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is the receiver of an insolvent national bank. The plaintiff, a bank doing business in Pennsylvania, sent, during the winter and spring of the present year, to the bank of which defendant is receiver, commercial paper indorsed, "For collection and immediate return to the Philadelphia National Bank." This paper was collected by defendant's bank and the proceeds were mingled with the other moneys of the bank instead of being forwarded to the plaintiff. The bill contains an allegation, which is not controverted, "That the defendant's bank at all times subsequent to making such collections and at the time its affairs were placed in the hands of a receiver had on hand cash to a greater amount than that due to plaintiff."

Plaintiff asks to have the balance due it paid in full out of the assets of the insolvent bank, on the ground that the latter, by receiving the paper for collection and immediate return, became a trustee for the transaction of the affair, and that either its entire property or the money in its vaults became impressed with the trust. In other words, it claims a priority in the nature of an equitable lien on either the assets of the bank or its cash on hand.

The court holds that when defendant's bank mingled the money collected with its general funds, it was, if a breach of trust was committed thereby, a conversion of such money, and that thereupon the plaintiff became a simple contract creditor with no claim that has a preference at law over any other simple contract debt.

Mixing trust funds. If a man mixes trust funds

If the money was not held by the bank as trustee, the result is the same. On the former supposition, however, plaintiff would have a right to follow the money into any new form into which it could be specially traced. But it is immaterial whether or not the bank stood in the relation of a fiduciary to the plaintiff, because, on the facts stated in the bill it appears that the money collected cannot be traced into any specific investment or fund, but has been indistinguishably mingled with the general assets of defendant's bank.

Such an opinion would have been very generally expressed without hesitation prior to 1879, when the English Court of Appeals rendered its decision in Re Hallett's Estate, Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696. I do not consider it at all in conflict with the opinion of Sir George Jessell in that case. But it is in conflict with several cases since decided in this country most of which refer to Knatchbull v. Hallett.

I look upon these cases as introducing a new principle into an old and well known doctrine of equity, unsound in theory, and which with the greatest deference to the courts deciding them, I do not feel at liberty to follow in advance of any adjudication by the supreme court. The cases are People v. City Bank, 96 N. Y. 82; McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401; Harrison v. Smith, 88 Mo. 210; Peak v. Elliott, 80 Kan. 156; and Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems (Tex.) 6 S. W. Rep. 802.

The facts in the case first cited (People v. City Bank) are, briefly, as follows: two notes made by the firm of Sartwell, Hough & Ford had been discounted by defendant, a state bank. Sartwell, Hough & Ford had money on deposit with the bank, and, wishing to anticipate payment, they drew checks for the amount of the notes which were thereupon charged to their account, and the notes were entered upon the books of the bank as paid. In fact they had been sold. Thereafter, the bank having become insolvent, a receiver was appointed who refused to pay the notes. The case as constituted in the court of appeals was an appeal from an order directing the receiver to make such payment. It appeared that at the time a smaller amount of cash than the face of the notes was found in the bank. The court, Danforth, J., delivering the opinion (which is a brief one and does not put the matter upon any well defined principle), held that the receiver must pay the notes in full, out of money received by him after the bank's failure—that is to say, out of its general assets. He cites Re Le Blanc, 14 Hun, 8, affirmed, 75 N. Y. 598; and Libby v. Hopkins, 104 U. S. 808 [26 L. ed 769], and says:

"These cases stand upon the ground of a specific appropriation of a particular fund for the payment of the claim brought in question. So does the one at bar."

If the facts of People v. City Bank showed the existence of a particular fund there could be no question of the soundness of the decision, but it would not be authority for the cases professing to follow it. The difficulty seems to be that while there once had been such a fund, it had been misappropriated, and neither existed nor could be followed when the bank's assets came to the receiver. People v. City Bank is followed in New York by two decisions of the general term: People v. Bank of Danville, 39 Hun, 187, and McCull v. Fraser, 40 Hun, 111.

In the former, Barker, J., says: "If the identical moneys collected by the bank did not pass into the hands of the receiver, it makes no difference, for in some shape or form they went to swell the assets which fell into his hands."

In Re Le Blanc, 14 Hun, 8, affirmed by the court of appeals without an opinion, and cited as authority by Judge Danforth, a particular fund passed into the hands of the receiver, which had been held by the corporation expressly for the payment of petitioner's claim; so the point in controversy did not arise.

The New York Case is followed by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in McLeod v. Evans, two of the five Judges dissenting. As the court puts its decision on an intelligible principle I will cite the reasoning of the prevailing opinion. Cole, Ch. J., says:

"The conclusion is irresistible * * * that the proceeds of the trust property found its way into Hodges' hands and were used by him either to pay off his debts or to increase his assets. * * * It is not to be supposed that the trust fund was dissipated altogether and did not fall into the mass of the assignor's property; and the rule in equity is well established that so long as the trust property can be traced and followed into other property into which it has been converted, that remains subject to the trust. * * * *We do not understand that it is necessary to trace the trust fund into some specific property. * * * If it can be traced into the estate of the defaulting agent or trustee this is sufficient.*"

The sentences which I have italicized contain a modification of the equitable doctrine of following trust property necessarily, as I suppose, underlying the decision of People v. City Bank, and adopted by the Supreme Courts of Missouri and Kansas in the cases cited from the reports of those States.

Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems (Tex.) 68 W. Rep. 802, is placed upon the same doctrine of equity, but without as wide a departure from the form in which it is usually enunciated. In deciding it Gaines, J., says: "It may be that when the entire mass is paid away the right to claim a trust in any money or property is lost. But if, as in the present case, throughout all the trustee's dealings with the funds so mingled he keeps on hand a sufficient sum to cover the amount of the trust money, we think it capable of demonstration that the trust should attach to the balance that is found in his hands. It is shown that after the bank received the money, amounting to about $6,000, its cash assets were never reduced below

$6,000 until they went into the receiver's hands. Even admitting that in the course of its transaction this identical money was paid out by the bank to its uttermost farthing, yet we know that every dollar so expended left its representative and exact equivalent in the vault from which it was taken, and that when again the money so left was expended, it left in turn its equivalent behind. We see, therefore, that whatever changes may have taken place in the funds from the receipts and expenditures of the bank, the balance left at the date of its failure was the result of the proceeds of the notes, to the extent to which such balance was increased; and that the cash which went into the hands of the receiver should be deemed the representative of those proceeds and impressed with the trust character."

Before proceeding to examine the English authorities supposed to support this line of decisions, I will give the doctrine of following trust funds wrongfully converted, upon which they were all based, as laid down by Justice Story and Professor Pomeroy:

"Whenever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner or cestui que trust. The general proposition which is maintained both at law and in equity upon this subject is that if any property in its original state and form is covered by a trust in favor of the principal, no change of that state and form can divest it of such trust or give the agent or trustee converting it, or those who represent him in right (not being bona fide purchasers), any more valid claim in respect to it than they had before such change. . . . The right ceases only when the means of ascertainment fail, which of course is the case when the subject matter is

Ward, 47 Ark. 538. Whenever a trustee has transferred the property, the cestui que trust has a full right to follow such property into the hands of such third person, unless he stands in the position of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice. Oliver v. Platt, 44 U. S. 8 How. 333 (11 L. ed. 622). So long as trust property can be traced and distinguished it may be claimed by the cestui que trust whenever the purchaser purchases bona fide purchaser without notice, then he may recover its value in money. May v. Le Claire, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 217 (20 L. ed. 50).

Following fund into hands of third person. It is only when money is held in a fiduciary character that the beneficial owner can follow it into the hands of a third person. Banque Franco-Egyptienne v. Brown, 84 Fed. Rep. 182. A court of equity may follow the funds coming into an agent's hands from his principal's business, into whatever property or change of form they may have been converted by the agent, if it be possible to identify them, unless they have passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice. Atkinson v.

ry course of business, in the absence of trust or agency, it is only to the extent of the interest remaining in the party committing the fraud that it can be followed. Justh v. Com. Nat. Bank, 56 N. Y. 494.

turned into money, and mixed and confounded in the general mass of property of the same description." Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1258, 1259.

"If a trustee or other fiduciary wrongfully disposes of his principal's securities . . . equitably imposes a constructive trust upon the new form or species of property as long as it can be followed and identified . . . No change in the form of the trust property effected by the trustee will impede the right of the beneficial owner to reach it, provided it can be identified as a distinct fund, and is not so mingled up with other moneys or property that it can no longer be specifically separated." Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1051, 1058.

The difference between the rule as stated by Story and Pomeroy, and as given in the Wisconsin decision, will be perceived to lie in the fact that according to the former the trust fund must be traced into some specific property, and if this cannot be done the right ceases; while, according to the latter it exists if it can be traced into the estate of the defaulting agent or trustee or has been used in paying his debts. Evidently this practically gives a priority to the beneficiary over all creditors not having specific liens. The Wisconsin and Texas cases differ in that the former gives to a cestui que trust whose funds have been wrongfully converted by an insolvent bank an equitable lien on the entire assets of the bank, while the latter gives such lien only upon the cash coming to the receiver, and only at least to the whole extent of the trust money in case such money was never reduced below the amount of the trust fund. In both cases the reason given is that the trust money has gone to swell the amount of the property upon which the lien is given. In neither is it held necessary to follow a distinct fund.

Before passing to the English cases I will quote the (as it seems to me) conclusive answer given to the reasoning of Chief Justice Cole by Casaday, J., in his dissenting opinion in McLeod v. Evans; for I think it applies to the entire line of decisions. After stating that the proposition that the wrongful conversion of a draft, of itself, gave the plaintiff a preference over all other creditors regardless of what became of the draft or its proceeds is supported by no adjudicated case, the judge goes on to say: "It is probable that the proceeds of the draft were used by Hodges" (the insolvent quasi trustee), "in payment of some of his debts. That would in no way swell the volume of his assets. It would merely diminish his indebtedness. This would benefit the estate to the extent that it increased the per cent that the other creditors would receive; but as the estate is badly insolvent, the aggregate amount of the increase would necessarily be very much less than the amount of the draft." The English cases cited in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems, in support of the position taken by the Texas Supreme Court, are: Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 574; Iennell v. Deffell, 4 De G. M. & G. 872 and Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 696; and the United States Supreme Court case is Central Nat. Bank v. Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54 [26 L. ed. 693].

I will examine these decisions and attempt to discover what modification of the doctrine of following trust funds laid down by Story and Pomeroy, if any, is introduced in them; and whether they support the theory of either the Wisconsin or the Texas case. Taylor v. Plumer is one of the celebrated cases of the law noted for a very able opinion delivered in it by Lord Ellenborough. Briefly stated its facts are these: a broker having in his possession bank notes belonging to defendant, which he held for a specific purpose, in breach of his trust purchased with them American Bank stock and gold coin and attempted to escape to the United States. He was pursued by defendant's agents and stock and money taken from him. Held, in trover in an action by the broker's assignee, that defendant was entitled, as against the general creditors, to the money as well as the stock, because the gold coin was specifically the product of defendant's bank bills. The Chief Justice, commenting upon Whiecomb v. Jacob, 1 Salk. 160, said that the difficulty of tracing money was "a difficulty of fact, and not of law; and the doctrine that money has no earmarks must be predicated only of an undivided and undistinguishable mass of current money."

Pennell v. Deffell was a case in which a trust fund was traced into bank accounts. One Green, an official assignee in bankruptcy, kept accounts with two banks in his own name and had deposited in each, not only parts of the trust funds, but also his private money, and had drawn from each for his individual uses. Knatchbull v. Hallett is similar to Pennell v. Deffell. A solicitor having bonds belonging to his client sold them and paid the proceeds to his general balance at his bankers. Afterwards he drew checks for his own purposes against, and paid other money of his own into, the account. At his death there was a larger amount to his credit in bank than the proceeds of his client's bonds. It was held, in this as in the preceding case, that the beneficiary had a right to follow the money, and was entitled to a charge on the balance in bank. In the way of this conclusion stood two artificial rules, either of which taken literally would have been fatal to the beneficiary's pursuit of the bank balances. The first was the rule in Clayton's Case, 1 Meriv. 572; the second was supposed to be supported by a dictum of Ellenborough in Taylor v. Plumer, viz.:

The doctrine that money has no earmarks must be predicated only of an undivided and undistinguishable mass of current money. The rule adopted in Clayton's Case was that in a bank account the first drawings out should be attributed to the first payments in. The court held, as an exception to this rule, that when a person holding money in a fiduciary character mixes it with his own and draws out of the mixed fund, the court presumes that he is first drawing out of his own money. It is evident that the rule was adopted because it gave effect to the probable intention of one having a bank account, and that the exception likewise gives effect to the probable intention of a trustee. It is not likely that a trustee would use trust funds while he has money of his own idle in bank; and it would be contrary to well established legal principles to unnecessarily assume a purpose to do a wrong. It was not necessary for the court to go further; but it may also be true that, even had the trustee such an intent, he had not carried it into effect. To convert the trust fund not only an intent, but some unmistakable act in pursuance of the intent, would be necessary; and the mere withdrawal of a part of the deposit, leaving enough to satisfy the cestui que trust would not be such an act. As soon as by the application of this exception it was made to appear that the beneficiary's money remained in the bank account the only other difficulty, the fact that it was mingled with other funds and undistinguishable from them, was easily removed by giving to the client a charge on the balance in bank. Of course no equitable lien could have been enforced in a case at law; and I understand the dictum in Taylor v. Plumer, which was an action of trover, to apply only to such a case.

In the supreme court case, Central Nat. Bank v. Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54 [26 L. ed. 698], it appeared that one Dillon, an agent of an insurance company, deposited collections belonging to his principal with plaintiff, in his own name as "agent," and afterwards paid other money of his own into the account and checked against the account for his private uses. The plaintiff endeavored to enforce a banker's lien upon it for Dillon's individual indebtedness to plaintiff. It was held that the descriptive word "agent" was of itself notice of the character of the deposit, and further that, upon the facts, the bank had express notice.

Dillon was not, as far as appears, a party to the attempt made to appropriate the company's funds to his private debts. In speaking of the fact that the latter had, to some extent, mingled his own funds with those of the insurance company, Matthews, J., quoting Sir George Jessell in Knatchbull v. Hallett, says: "As regards property disposed of by persons in a fiduciary position, whether the disposition of it be rightful or wrongful, the beneficial owner is entitled to the proceeds whatever be their form, provided only he can identify them. If they cannot be identified, by reason of the trust money being mingled with that of the trustee, then the cestui que trust is entitled to a charge upon the new investment to the extent of the trust money traceable into it. . . . There is no difference between investments in the purchase of lands, or chattels, or bonds, or loans, or money deposited in a bank; and equity will follow money if put into a bag or an undistinguishable mass, by taking out the same quantity.

We are now prepared to see in what, if any, respect the rule announced above and called by Sir George Jessell "the modern doctrine of equity," with regard to property disposed of by persons in a fiduciary capacity, differs from that laid down in the days of Story and Ellenborough. The rule as stated by Story or Pomeroy, in the extracts taken (supra) from their treatises, is extended by adding a case not specifically put by either of them, of the mingling of the trust money with that of the trustee in the investment made by the latter. Stating the doctrine in the words of Story, with an addition, which I have put in italics, drawn from the late decisions it is as follows:

(1) "Wherever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner or cestui que trust. The right ceases only when the subject matter is turned into money and mixed and confounded in a general mass of property of the same description."

(2) If the property cannot be identified, by reason of the trust money being mingled with that of the trustee, then the cestui que trust is entitled to a charge on the new investment to the extent of the trust money traceable into it. This will be done even if the money is mingled with that of the trustee in a bank account, or in a bag or other mass of money.

As far as the addition to the rule consists in giving a charge to the cestui que trust on a new investment made in part with his own money and in part with that of the trustee, it has no novelty. In Docker v. Somes, 3 Myl. & K. 664, Lord Brougham decided that if a trustee mixes trust funds with his private moneys, or employs both in a trade or adventure of his own, the cestui que trust may, if he prefers it, insist upon having a proportionate share of the profits instead of interest on the amount of the trust fund so employed; and in Hartford v. Lloyd, 20 Beav. 310, where a sum of money belonging to a trust fund was, as it seemed, used with other money in the purchase of post-obit securities, the court enforced a lien on such securities for the amount of the trust money so used. Both of these cases are noticed by Story on Equity Jurisprudence, § 465, etc., 1261 a.

The only thing then which can be considered recent in proposition (2), supra, is the application of the doctrine to a bank account and the illustration made use of, of the bag of money or the indistinguishable mass thereof. Nor do I understand the Master of the Rolls to announce this as a new principle of equity, but rather as the application of an established rule to a new case. In the case [Whitecomb v. Jacob] from Salkeld, the Judge, after speaking of the rights of one who employs a factor and intrusts him with the disposal of merchandise, states that there is an equity to follow the proceeds, attaching to the case of a factor as well as to that of a trustee; but he adds, "If the factor have money it shall be looked upon as the factor's estate, and must first answer the debts of a superior creditor, etc., for in regard that money has no earmark equity cannot follow that in behalf of him that employed the factor."

Speaking of this remark Sir George Jessell says: "There is no distinction between a person occupying one fiduciary position or another fiduciary position, as to the right of the beneficial owner to follow the trust fund." I had not understood the court to have attempted any such distinction in that case. I further suppose the judge who decided Whitecomb v. Jacob to have been speaking, not of money in a bag or any particular mass or heap of money which might, conceivably, have been in possession of the factor at his death and into which his employer's money might have been traced—in which case it would have been analogous to money mingled by a trustee with his own, in a bank account; but rather of the ordinary case of money on hand at his death, bearing no marks of being the proceeds of the factor's trust money, any more than of any other transaction in which he might have been engaged. Of such money it might well have been said in current proverbial phraseology that it had "no earmarks." Such a case does not come within the decision, or the reasoning, in Knatchbull v. Hallett. See Ex parte Hardcastle, 44 L. T. N. S. 528, 8. C. 29 Week. Rep. 615, a case decided since Knatchbull v. Hallett.

I do, however, conceive it to come within the decision and argument, in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems. If I considered that case to be law I should add another to the two propositions laid down as the law of tracing, viz.:

(3) And in case trust money received by a trustee is not shown to have been either paid to the cestui que trust, preserved in specie or invested, the cestui que trust shall, upon the death or insolvency of the trustee, have a lien on all moneys coming to the hands of his representative or receiver, on the ground that the same went to swell the decedent's or insolvent's cash assets.

The above proposition being granted, I can see no reason why the additional one necessary to sustain the Wisconsin, Missouri, Kansas, and (as I conceive) the New York cases does not follow. I give it in the words of Cole, Ch. J., in his opinion in McLeod v. Evans:

(4) Nor is it "necessary to trace the trust fund into some specific property. If it can be traced into the estate of the defaulting agent or trustee this is sufficient."

It is evident that (3) conflicts with Justice Story's statement, that the right to trace ceases when the subject matter is turned into money, and mixed and confounded with the general mass of the trustee's money (which I have endeavored to distinguish from any particular fund or account of the trustee, into which it may be traced, according to rule (3)). Proposition (4) contradicts all previous statements of the doctrine, including not only that given in Knatchbull v. Hallett, but also that in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems.

The judge who wrote the learned and able opinion of the Supreme Court of Texas in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems dissents in express terms from the last proposition, and declines to follow the list of American authorities cited by me in the first part of this opinion. Nor do I assert that he maintains proposition (3). But I do contend that that doctrine necessarily follows from the position taken by him. The decision in the Texas case relates only to the cash assets of an insolvent bank, and only to a case in which those assets never, from the time of the deposit of the trust fund up to the suspension of the bank, fall below the amount of that deposit. But neither of these facts seems to me to materially distinguish it from the proposition which I have stated to be necessarily involved in it.

As Jessell, M. R., says: "There is no distinction between a person occupying one fiduciary position or another," as to the right to follow trust funds, and it is quite unimportant that the trustee is a bank. Nor can it make any difference whether the money coming to a receiver's hands is the general cash of a corporation kept in its vaults, or that of an individual kept by him in his pocket, his safe or his chest, or in all or any of these receptacles, as convenience may have dictated. If, indeed, the corporation had kept a deposit with some other person or corporation, and the trust fund could be traced into it, then the rule in Knatchbull v. Hallett would apply. But I am speaking of a case like the Texas one or the one at bar, where there is no special fund, but where the trust money goes into the general cash of the trustee.

The only remaining ground of difference lies in the fact that the cash on hand never fell below the equivalent of the trust fund. But I conceive that if there happened to be enough on hand at the time of the suspension to pay the amount due to the beneficiary, it can make no possible difference whether that amount was at all times kept on hand, or whether the trustee, after spending a part of the trust money, replaced it with money drawn from other sources. If in the imaginary case of 1,000 sovereigns of trust money put in a bag, the trustee had taken out a sovereign and afterwards put one in, there would be no doubt that the whole amount then being in the bag would be the property of the cestui que trust; and so, had the amount taken out and replaced been one or 500 sovereigns, certainly in the circumstances supposed the reason why the sum finally left in the bag is the property of the cestui que trust is because the trustee, in replacing the sovereigns, intended to restore to the bag coins to fill the place of the ones taken from it. But if it is permissible to suppose that the bank officers, in paying out the money of their beneficiary, intended that the money of their depositors should take its place, I see no difficulty, or difference, in supposing this to be the case when such money comes in after the amount on hand sinks below the total of the trust fund. And if, instead of being a question of actual intention, the intent is assumed, on the ground that it was the duty of the bank to keep the trust fund on hand, and that the corporation cannot allege that it did not perform this duty, then it may be said that it was just as much the duty of the bank to replace any part of the fund withdrawn from its vaults as it had originally been to keep it there, and the court can as well assume one intent as the other.

As I have already said, I do not consider the doctrine (2) formulated from the opinion of Jessell, M. R., as any departure from that always held. He calls the money deposited in bank or put in a bag "a new investment," upon which he allows the beneficiary a charge, and goes upon the idea that there is thus something specific into which he traces the fund. But the proposition (3) resulting from the Texas case seems to entirely depart from the idea of a new investment of the trust money or following it into anything specific.

The money in the vaults of a bank carrying on its ordinary business cannot properly be said to be the result of any one or more of the deposits put in it. If at the time of the insolvency of a bank $1,000 is found in its safe, and half a dozen deposits of that amount are shown by its books to have been paid in, it is unreasonable to attribute the fund, as is done in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems, to a particular one of them which happens to have been trust money. If, indeed, the suspension of business by the bank should immediately follow the placing the trust money in its vaults, the case would come within the rule as given by Jessell, M. R., for the money would as a fact be a part of the mass of money in the bank, and equity would give a charge upon it for the amount of the trust fund. It is upon this ground that I understand the court to have disapproved, in Knatchbull v. Hallett, of the ruling of Fry, J., in Ex parte Dale, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 772. Dale & Company, on December 5, sent papers for collection to a branch of the West of England Bank. The bank made the collection and deposited its amount in its vaults, in which it was mingled with other moneys. On the 7th it sent a letter to Dale & Company incorrectly stating that the money had been remitted. The 8th was Sunday, and the bank did not open on the 9th, but instead went into liquidation. It is probable that the collection was made on the 7th, when the letter was sent to Dale & Company, and it may be assumed as true that the very money collected went into the hands of the liquidators.

The Texas Case is put entirely upon the proposition that the trust fund is traced into specific property that came to the receiver. I wish to examine a little more in detail than I have yet done whether this is true. It would have been impossible, even with access to the books of the bank, to have followed the money which came into its vaults by reason of the collections in litigation, but it is possible to put supposititious cases which would cover every probable use of the money. There is one which is clearly inadmissible, viz.: that the precise money collected remained in the vault. If that had been the case it would have been found separated from the other funds and marked as plaintiff's money. If the bills collected were mingled with the general mass in use for current business, the probability that they remained in the safe for a number of weeks is so infinitesimal that it may be entirely dismissed from consideration. We can suppose that the $5,000 collected by the Texas bank consisted of five packages of $1,000 each. One of them may be supposed to have been used in purchasing a safe or some other article of furniture. At the same instant we may suppose that a depositor paid into his account $1,000.

On the theory of the Texas Case, that $1,000 took the place of the thousand paid out. Why? On the idea of an intent on the part of the bank officers to replace the money paid out? Clearly there was no such intent. Will equity assume, in contradiction of the evident fact, that the bank intended to pay A with B's money? Is the idea of tracing the money the one adopted? But the cestui que trust's money was invested in the purchase of a safe, and on the doctrine as laid down in all the books his right was to consider himself either the owner of the safe or, if he preferred, the holder of a lien upon it, or a simple contract creditor of the trustee to the amount of the money misapplied. There is no authority to be found for the statement that he had in addition the right to take a different $1,000 in the possession of the trustee, but not appropriated by the latter to the trust, on the ground that it ought to have been so appropriated. Another $1,000 package we may suppose used to pay a check drawn by a depositor. To that extent it diminished the indebtedness of the bank and increased the dividend to be paid to the other depositors.

The plaintiff, on the doctrine of following trust funds, would be entitled to be subrogated to what would have been such depositor's dividend. Let us suppose now, what did not happen in Continental Nat. Bank v. Weems, but did in People v. City Bank, and also in the case at Bar—that the officers of the bank made way with the greater part of the cash on hand, leaving just enough to enable business to be carried on until they could reach a place of safety. It may be supposed that they carried away the remaining $3,000. It would not in that case have been true that “every dollar expended left in turn its equivalent behind,” or that the trust money went to swell the general assets of the bank. This last supposition shows perhaps more completely than any other the artificial character of the assumption that the bank officers may be supposed, as long as they left enough to satisfy the trust fund, to have intended to use only the money which the bank had a right to use.

I think, then, that it must be evident that at the times of the failures the trust fund was not either in the Texas bank, or the one whose case is at bar, unless considered in the banks by reason of some artificial rule. The exception to the rule in Clayton's Case, made in Pennell v. Duffell, and Knatchbull v. Hallett, was not, as I have shown, artificial, but in consonance with the facts of those cases. To apply it, or any rule analogous to it, to the case at Bar would be to make use of a legal fiction. The officers of the bank had no intent to make any difference between the money collected for their correspondents and that passed over the counters of the bank by depositors.

It would be equally objectionable, because equally a false assumption, to say that the money, having been traced into the bank safe and not accounted for, must be presumed to remain there until the contrary can be proved; and that, the contrary not having been proved, the court will presume the money in the safe to contain that of the beneficiary. The contrary is proved, to a moral certainty, by all the facts of the case. To say that it does not lie in the trustee's mouth to assert that it had been wrongfully paid out would be to invoke a doctrine of estoppel not applicable to a receiver who represents creditors, as well as the delinquent trustee, and who must therefore be allowed to show the very truth of the matter.

I have treated this case as one in which the plaintiff is entitled to be considered as a cestui que trust. I think that it is not entitled to be so considered, but that it ought to be treated as an ordinary creditor, because the money collected, or at least a large part of it, was allowed to remain for several months with the defendant's bank. As I understand the course of business among banks, in regard to collections of this kind, it is not expected that the same moneys that are collected shall be forwarded. On the contrary, they are uniformly treated as is the money of ordinary depositors, and are remitted by means of the system of exchanges of credit which forms a part of the general mercantile business of the country. The result of giving such a collection a preference over the ordinary debts of a bank would be to make national banks preferred creditors in every case of insolvency of other national banks.

The statute forbidding preferences in the distribution of assets of insolvent national banks is not believed to prevent a beneficiary from following any trust money held for him by a bank, into any new investment thereof made by the bank. If, however, the doctrine could be carried to the extent claimed in the Wisconsin or even in the Texas Case it would seem to be an unlawful preference under the Act of Congress.

Since writing the foregoing, my attention has been called to a decision not accessible when the case at Bar was argued. In Cavin v. Gleason, 7 Cent. Rep. 285, 105 N. Y. 256, one in whose hands money had been placed to be invested, used the entire amount, excepting $30, in paying his personal debts, and made an assignment. Held, that the creditor was not entitled to a preference except as to the $30 which, as it appeared, came into the hands of the assignee. Andrews, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is clear, we think, that upon an accounting in bankruptcy or insolvency a trust creditor is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of the insolvent merely on the ground of the nature of his claim . . . We know of no authority for such a contention. . . . If it appears that trust property has been wrongfully converted by the trustee and constitutes, although in a changed form, a part of the assets, it would seem to be equitable that the things into which the trust property has been changed should, if required, be set apart for the trust, or, if separation is impossible, that priority of lien should be adjudged in favor of the trust estate for the value of the trust property . . . entering into and constituting a part of the assets. This rule simply asserts the right of the true owner to his own property. But it is the general rule that in order to follow trust funds . . . they must be identified . . . The courts below seem to have proceeded upon a supposed equity springing from the circumstance that by the application of the fund to the payment of White's creditors, the assigned estate was relieved pro tanto from debts which otherwise would have been charged upon it, and that thereby the remaining creditors . . . will be benefited. We think this is quite" too vague an equity for judicial cognizance.

Bill dismissed without prejudice.

M. L. SLEDGE et al., Exrs. of R. Don Wilson, Deceased, Appls.

(....N. C....)

1. In an action to compel a conveyance of land in performance of a contract, where the defense set up is the insolvency of the vendee, and of plaintiff, his widow, and an abandonment by her of all claim to the land, a reply alleging that the vendor agreed with her to take back the lot and pay her the value of the improvements, and demanding payment of a sum due her under such agreement, is not such a departure from the code system of pleading as to defeat the action.
2. A judicial sale of the equitable interest of a deceased vendee in a contract for land will not bar an action by his widow to recover the value of improvements on an agreement by the vendor to pay her therefor in consideration of rescission of the contract for the land.
3. An agreement by a vendor on rescission of a contract to reimburse the other party for expenditures upon the land is not within the Statute of Frauds.
4. The tender of a deed after verdict for a sum of money claimed as alternative relief by plaintiff, in an action for specific performance of a contract is too late to be effectual.

(December 10, 1888.)

APPEAL by defendants, from a judgment of the Superior Court for McDowell County (Clark, J.), in favor of the plaintiff in an action to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, executed between R. Don Wilson, the defendant's testator, as vendor, and J. W. Houston, the deceased husband of plaintiff, as vendee. Affirmed.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Batchelor & Devereux for appellants.

Smith, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this cause was before us upon a former appeal from the ruling sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the replication taken to the answer (98 N. C. 414), this language was used in reference to the alleged departure of the replication from the case made in the complaint: "But the plaintiff may waive the delay and take the money to be paid in reimbursement of the expenditure put upon the premises, and the offer to do this is the substance of the replication." And again: "Nor does the demand for the money, which may be considered but a proposition to abide by that agreement, essentially change the nature and legal effect of the pleading."

The import of this is, that while an unexecuted contract forms no bar to an action for specific performance, for which it was intended to be a substitute and adjustment, the plaintiff may, at her election, proceed upon it, just as, when the Statute of Frauds is interposed, the plaintiff may have an account of moneys paid and improvements put on the land when the promise relied on was not in writing, and the defendant acquiesced in the outlays, and thereby induced the belief that he would in good faith abide by his contract; and so has this suit been considered in the court below since the decision.

2 I. R. A.

Briefly stated, the case is as follows: the plaintiff instituted her suit against the defendants M. L. Sledge and Joshua McCurry, executrix and executor of R. Don Wilson, the first named being also his devisee of the lot which the testator is alleged to have contracted to convey to John W. Houston, the deceased husband of the plaintiff, who claims to be owner of all his estate, to enforce the specific execution of the contract, and the conveyance of the lot on payment of the purchase money; the said vendee having died before any of the notes given to the testator became due. The defendants do not deny that such a contract in writing was made, but in defense set up the total insolvency and inability of both the vendee and the plaintiff to make the required payments, in consequence of which the plaintiff abandoned all claim to the lot, and united in a petition for its sale to make assets to meet the liabilities of the deceased intestate vendee; and the said Wilson entered into possession, and expended a large sum in the construction of a house and putting other improvements upon the lot, making it inequitable now to assert any claim under the contract. To this the plaintiff replies, admitting the rescission of the contract between the plaintiff and the testator, and, as the consideration of such rescinding, alleges that the testator agreed with her to take back the lot at the contract price, and pay her the value of the improvements made by the vendee, and to take, use, and account for all the material then on hand or contracted for by him; and that having demanded payment therefor, and been refused, she now demands payment of $650 due under said agreement from the defendants, the personal representatives of the vendor, the said R. Don Wilson.

The action thus assumes a new form, being changed from one demanding a specific performance to one for the recovery of the money agreed to be paid upon its rescission, and the restoration of the lot which is a substitute for the surrendered claim first made and asserted. Now, such a change is not such a departure from the code system of pleading as necessarily to defeat the action, and send the plaintiff out of court to pursue her remedy upon the rescinding agreement, for the vital and essential subject matter remains; and such an amendment accords with the new practice, which, ignoring mere forms, aims to adjust and settle controversies about the same matter in a single action, when the other party is not misled to his injury and damage. The defendants, being thus called to answer the new cause of action, though set out in the replication, treated as virtually an amendment of the complaint (and such association of the pleadings, in order to get at the true cause of action, is recognized in Hughes v. Whitaker, 84 N. C. 640), were entitled to answer the demand, and were offered by the court an opportunity to plead the Statute of Limitations, of which they refused to avail themselves; their counsel remarking that he knew of no rule of pleading that admitted such a plea to a replication, ignoring its relation to the complaint, as in substance an enlargement of its scope and operation.

Thus considered, the complaint, aided by the subsequent pleadings, presents the claim of the plaintiff in a twofold aspect: (1) a demand for title to be made by the devisee of the lot, and alternatively for (2) a judgment of the court for expenses incurred, agreed, in lieu thereof, to be paid by the testator against his representatives. The first claim is abandoned, and the suit proceeds upon the second. Now, both grow out of one transaction, and there is not seen any reason why the controversy may not, when presented in proper form, be adjusted and settled in a single action. Nearly, if not quite, all the errors assigned on the appeal grow out of the assumption of the incongruity in the pleadings, while under the present practice the action must be ascertained by an inspection of them all. Boyet v. Vaughan, 79 N. C. 528, overruled, but not on this point, on the rehearing, 85 N. C. 363; Perry v. Adams, 98 N. C. 107.

1. What has been said is an answer to the exception to the ruling in respect to the issues proposed by the defendants to be submitted to the jury, and refused, and is alike applicable to all the exceptions founded upon the supposed incompatibility of the plaintiff's pleadings.

2. The defendants introduced in evidence the petition of the administrators of J. W. Houston, and the proceedings under it, for the sale and conversion of his interest in the lot arising out of his contract, and, we understand, rely on them as an estoppel or transfer of that interest. The answer describes the suit as one instituted by the testator, Wilson, against the plaintiff and others, for the sale of the equitable interest acquired by the deceased vendee in the lot, and its sale thereunder for the inconsiderable sum of $5. But, in whatsoever form the action was brought it was intended to divest the said equitable estate; and while not relied on, so far as we can see, as a defense, does not interfere with the assertion of the plaintiff's claim to compensation for improvements by virtue of the testator's alleged undertaking to pay for them.

3. The defendants also insist that the agreement, whereby the vendor recognized his equitable obligation to reimburse the expenditures, falls under the Statute of Frauds, and, not being in writing, cannot be enforced. We are unable to appreciate the force of this objection. When, in a verbal contract for the sale of lands, the vendor repudiates it, and refuses to comply with its terms for this reason, he is required to return the purchase money received, and account for improvements which he permits to be put upon the land, with full knowledge that the vendee does this in expectation that its terms are to be complied with by the vendor, and in full faith in his integrity; and this because the repudiation of the contract, optional with him, and the acquisition of the fruits of the vendee's labor and expenditures, would, if tolerated, be a fraud; and thus the statute, instead of preventing, would become a cover for fraud. The recognition of the equitable obligation growing out of the transaction cannot impair its force and effect. The contract involves no interest in land, but simply assumes to pay a sum of money, because no title or right to land passes from the one to the other party. The statute has no application. McCracken v. McCracken, 88 N. C. 272, and cases cited in the opinion and dissenting opinion in the case.

4. The defendant M. L. Sledge, devisee, after verdict, through her counsel, now tendered a deed for the lot upon payment of $1,200 admitted to have been expended upon the lot by the vendor, and the purchase money, with interest thereon, until the surrender of possession to the vendor, in January, 1878, consenting to a deduction therefrom of the interest on the sum, $610, claimed to have been spent on the premises by the vendee. A deed was exhibited, and the plaintiff introduced the register's book, showing the title not now to be in said defendant, but to have passed to one Maloney. The court ruled that the offer came too late after verdict, and, the plaintiff not consenting to accept the deed, the tender was ineffectual. We concur in the ruling of the court, and overrule the exception.

From a careful review of the record we find no error, and must affirm the judgment. It is so ordered.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

JOHNSON
v.
BROOKLYN & C. R. CO.

SAME v. STEINWAY & H. P. R. CO.

(.....Fed. Rep.....)

The principle that an infringing article or machine made before the expiration of a patent cannot be used after such expiration does not apply to a combination of parts, which, on being held to infringe a patent covering such combination merely, is, bona fide, broken up, and, after the expiration of the patent, recombined.

(October 24, 1888.)

ON motion in equity, to punish for contempt in the alleged violation of an injunction restraining the infringement of a patent. Motion denied.

The point raised sufficiently appears from the opinion.

Messrs. Duncan, Curtis & Page for complainant.

Messrs. Frost & Coe for defendants.

Lacombe, J., delivered the following opinion:

Complainant's patent (Newman, No. 117, 198, July 18, 1871) is for "the combination of an oscillating platform; arranged for operation by the weight of the draught animals (of a horse car) with a (horizontally moving) switch." In the combination only was found novelty and invention sufficient to induce the court to sustain the patent. Johnson v. Forty-Second St. M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. 88 Fed. Rep. 499.

Rocking or oscillating platforms generally and as devices for automatic switches, were known to the art before the date of Newman's invention. Horizontally moving switches were also old. It was only the inventor's "ingenious assembling of known appliances" which Judge Coxe, in the case above cited, recognized as patentable. In the case at Bar the use of several infringing machines in defendants' tracks being shown, injunctions were granted during the life of the patent. Thereupon defendants ceased the use of the patented combination, disconnecting the oscillating tables from the switch tongues, and employing men or boys to operate the switches. Some weeks, however, after the expiration of the patent, they substituted new switch tongues for those in use when the injunction was granted, connected them with the oscillating tables, and are now using the combination of parts thus formed.

Complainant contends that this is a violation of the injunction, and moves to punish defendants for contempt. His motion is based upon the principle that an infringing article or machine made before the expiration of the patent cannot be used after such expiration, and that, upon sufficient cause shown, an injunction against such use will be indefinitely continued. The authorities cited sustain this proposition mainly upon the theory that the court could during the life of the patent order the destruction of the machine or article, and that the injunction forbidding its future use is merely the practical equivalent of such destruction.

The contention of the defendant as to the effect upon this proposition of Root v. Lake Shore Railway Company, 105 U. S. 189 [26 L. ed. 975], need not be now considered. The case at Bar is not within those authorities. All the parts of the patented article were old, their manufacture, sale, accumulation or use was free to all. The patentee's monopoly extended only to their combination. The infringing article would be destroyed when the combination of its parts was broken up, and the further destruction of those parts themselves which were not covered by the patent would be an interference with defendants' property not warranted by any of the authorities cited. The combination of parts in the defendants' infringing articles, having been once bona fide broken up, a recombination of the old parts after the complainant's monopoly has expired will not be enjoined.

Motion denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI & ST.
LOUIS R. CO., Pff. in Err.,
v.

James A. LYON.

1. A regulation of a railroad company by which, although a passenger may himself get off at L. R. A.

at a regular station or stopping place of a passenger train, which is just across the street from the station of another railroad, he will not be sold a ticket to that place or his baggage checked to or delivered at that station, but will be compelled to pay for a ticket to another station a mile distant, and go there for his baggage, is unreasonable and invalid.

2. The reasonableness of a regulation by which a railroad company refuses to check baggage to a regular stopping place of a passenger train is in the province of the court to determine as a matter of law.

2. Exemplary damages may be given for the refusal to sell a passenger a ticket or to check his baggage to a regular station of a passenger train in pursuance of an unreasonable regulation of the company, which indicates a wanton disregard of the rights of passengers.

3. A regulation which deprives the travelling public of the right to stop and receive their baggage at any regular station or stopping place for the train on which they may be travelling is necessarily arbitrary, unreasonable and illegal.

(January 7, 1889.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Washington County (Stowe, P. J.), brought by the defendant below to review a judgment entered on a verdict for $200, in favor of the plaintiff below in an action in case, for damages for the defendant's refusal to deliver plaintiff's baggage to him at a certain station on its road. Affirmed.

The facts and questions presented are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. M. Todd, for plaintiff in error:

The right of a railroad company to make reasonable rules for its own protection, and for the safety and convenience of its passengers, has been repeatedly recognized.

Pa. R. Co. v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 22, and cases cited, p. 27; Dietrich v. Pa. R. Co. 71 Pa. 432; Pa. R. Co. v. Zebe, 38 Pa. 818.

The question of the reasonableness of the rules of a railway company, affecting third persons, is generally a mixed question of law and fact; and it is always proper to submit such a question to the jury, under the instructions.

Bass v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 450. See also State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 435; Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221; 1 Redf. Railways, 88; Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596; Day v. Owen, 5 Mich. 520.

Messrs. A. W. & M. C. Acheson, for defendant in error:

The recovery of exemplary damages was proper.

McBride v. McLaughlin, 5 Watts, 875; Phillips v. Lawrence, 6 Watts & S. 154; McDonald v. Seafie, 11 Pa. 881; Blair Iron & Coal Co. v. Lloyd, 8 W. N. C. 108; *Amer v. The reasonableness of a rule or regulation is a question of law for the court to decide.

Sterrett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the questions presented for our consideration is whether the regulation of the railway company in conformity to which its agents refused to sell plaintiff below a ticket to Birmingham Station, and to check or deliver his baggage there, is unreasonable and therefore unlawful.

The facts upon which that and subordinate questions depend are undisputed. It appears from the evidence that the company has five passenger stations within the corporate limits of Pittsburgh, viz.: Temperanceville, Point Bridge, Birmingham, Fourth Avenue and Union Depot, the eastern terminus of the road. Birmingham Station, about a mile south of the latter, and diagonally across the street from the eastern or terminal station of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad, is a regular stopping place for passenger trains, and admittedly the most convenient point for transfer of passengers and baggage coming into the city on plaintiff in error's road and proceeding westward by the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Road. In March last the time between the arrival of morning train on the former and departure of train on the latter road was about twenty-five minutes, amply sufficient to make transfer from one road to the other at Birmingham Station.

At the time above mentioned plaintiff below bought from the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Company's agent at Washington, Pa., a ticket for passage from Pittsburgh to New Orleans. He then applied to plaintiff in error's agent for a ticket from Washington to Birmingham Station, intending to proceed thence on his journey without any delay at Pittsburgh; but, being informed that it would be necessary for him to buy a ticket to Union Depot Station, he was obliged to accept that or nothing. He then requested that his baggage be checked to Birmingham Station, or so marked that it would be delivered to him there. That was also refused, and he then notified the baggage master that on arrival of train at that station he would demand and expect to receive his baggage. The demand was accordingly made but it was unheeded, and the trunk was carried to the Union Depot. The alternative was thus presented of either waiting in Pittsburgh until he could obtain his baggage or proceeding on his journey without it. He chose the latter, stopped off at Cincinnati and there awaited the arrival of his baggage, which by his direction was obtained and forwarded after him.

The reasonable requests of plaintiff below were refused by the company's agents in obedience to previous orders from their official superiors, and not for the purpose of intentionally subjecting him to the inconvenience and annoyance that necessarily resulted, and which the officer giving the order must have known would result therefrom. The orders that were given were not disowned by the company. On the contrary, it undertook to justify them as a valid and proper exercise of its power to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations for the transaction of its business.

In view of the undisputed evidence of what occurred, the inconvenience, annoyance and delay to which plaintiff below was arbitrarily and unnecessarily subjected, the learned President of the Common Pleas instructed the jury that the regulation in question was unreasonable and invalid. After reciting the facts he said, among other things:

"The question arises whether or not selling tickets to a certain point, or to the City of Pittsburgh, and allowing parties to get off at any of these stations under a ticket which would take them to the Union Depot Station, they have a right to lay down a rule by which, although the party might get off himself, he would be compelled to go to the Union Station for his baggage. I say such a rule is unreasonable, and one the company had no right to make; and therefore the existence of a rule of that kind with reference to passengers was a violation of its duty. While the inferior officers of the road may be justifiable in obeying the rule, yet it is such a rule that the company had no right to make; and it becomes responsible in damages if it undertakes to enforce it as against passengers. I put it upon the broadest ground. But there is a narrower ground on which it might be put. It seems it did allow parties not only to get off themselves—because that is unquestioned—but it did allow certain parties, commercial travelers, parties holding thousand-mile tickets, and on some other occasions other parties, to get off and take their baggage off at that point. But it is immaterial whether or not the party is going by the Lake Erie Road or going to Birmingham or wherever he may go; it is a question of right so far as the citizen is concerned," etc.

It is contended that the above quoted instructions, and others of like import, were erroneous, in that they entirely withdrew from the consideration of the jury the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the regulation under consideration, and disposed of it as a question of law. While this position is not without the sanction of respectable authority, the better opinion appears to be at the question is generally a mixed one of law and fact.

So far as the reasonableness of a given rule depends upon the existence of particular facts and circumstances, it is necessarily a question for the jury, under proper instructions from the court; but, if the facts are undisputed, the question is a proper one for the court. Old Colony R. Co. v. Tripp, 6 New Eng. Rep. 866, 88 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 498, 496, notes and authorities there cited.

As was said in Vedder v. Fellows, 20 N. Y. 126, 131: "There are strong reasons why the reasonableness of railroad regulations should be submitted to the court as a question of law rather than to the jury as one of fact. Ordinarily jurors are not aware, nor can they readily be made aware, of all the reasons calling for the rule . . . What one jury might deem an inconvenient rule another might approve as judicious and proper. There would be no uniformity."

The facts of the case at Bar being indisputable, it was clearly the province of the court to say, as matter of law, whether the regulation in question was reasonable or not; and it was rightly held to be unreasonable and invalid. It was of such an arbitrary and vexatious character that no tribunal, court or jury could well declare it otherwise.

Another question is whether the case, as presented by the evidence, is one in which the jury should have been restricted to actual or merely compensatory damages. We think not. In actions in contract, except promises to marry, 2 L. R. A.

the amount recoverable is limited to the actual damages caused by the breach, the measure being the same whether the defendant fails to comply with his contract through inability, or willfully refuses to perform it. But in torts the rule is different; the motive of the defendant becomes material. In those that are committed through mistake, ignorance or mere negligence, the ordinary rule is mere compensation; but in such as are committed willfully, maliciously or so negligently as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of others, the jury are not restricted to compensation merely. They may, if the evidence justifies it, give vindictive or exemplary damages, such as will not only compensate the injured party, but at the same time tend to prevent a repetition of the wrong, either by the defendant or others.

It is claimed that the regulation complained of was obstructive in its purpose, intended to prevent the transfer of passengers and their baggage from plaintiff in error's road to a rival railroad. The fact may be so, but it is unnecessary in this case to inquire whether it is or not. It is enough to know that the traveling public have some rights, one of which is the transportation of themselves and baggage over any of the railroads of the Commonwealth; and that includes the right to stop and receive their baggage at any regular station or stopping place for the train on which they may be traveling. Any regulation that deprives them of that right is necessarily arbitrary, unreasonable and illegal.

The fact must not be ignored that corporations are artificial persons created for specific purposes and invested with such and only such powers as are conferred by law. While natural persons may do with themselves and their property whatever is not forbidden, artificial persons cannot rightfully do anything that is not expressly or by necessary implication permitted by the law of their being. Plaintiff in error was incorporated as a common carrier of freight and passengers. As such it owes a duty to the traveling public which it cannot arbitrarily and willfully ignore.

It is unnecessary to further consider either of the specifications of error. The case was correctly tried and plaintiff in error has no just reason to complain of the result.

2. A bank holding a check for collection has no right, unless specially authorized to do so, to accept anything in lieu of money.

3. A bank which has become liable to pay a check sent to it for collection by reason of having accepted a cashier's check instead of cash from the bank on which it was drawn just before the latter suspended payment, cannot claim the benefit of any payment made in the mean time to the payee of the check by the drawer.

ERROR to Common Pleas No. 3 of Allegheny County (Ewing, J.), brought by the defendant below to review a judgment in favor of the plaintiff below in an action in case, for $2,622.25, with interest from May 24, 1884. Affirmed.

On May 20, 1884, T. J. Watson delivered to Ashworth, the plaintiff below, his check on the Penn Bank of Pittsburgh, for $2,622.25. On the same day Ashworth indorsed the check and delivered it to the Fifth National Bank of Pittsburgh, the defendant below, with which he kept his account as a depositor. The check was credited, and in due course presented to the Penn Bank for payment, but that bank having shut its doors in the mean time, it was not paid. The Fifth National caused the check to be protested for nonpayment, and charged it back to Ashworth's account. Of this action of the bank Ashworth had full notice. On May 23, 1884, the Penn Bank opened its doors shortly before 8 P. M., but that fact did not come to the knowledge of the Fifth National until the next day. On May 24 (Saturday) the Fifth National sent the Ashworth check, with some other protested checks held by it, to the Penn Bank, and received in return therefor a cashier's check for the aggregate amount of all the checks sent up. This cashier's check on the same day was deposited in the Tradesmen's Bank, through which the Fifth National cleared, but on Monday, May 26, the Penn Bank closed its doors the second time, without paying any of the checks upon it coming through the clearing house on that morning.

Ashworth's right to recover was resisted upon the ground (1), that the defendant, under all the circumstances of the case, had acted with due diligence; and (2) that he had ratified the action of the defendant. It was also claimed that if he was entitled to recover, he could not recover $1,025, which had been paid to him by Watson, the maker of the check, on account of it, immediately after the first suspension of the Penn Bank. At the trial, defendant proposed to prove that the Fifth National Bank, as well as other banks of the city, had been requested by the Farmers' Deposit National Bank, through which bank the Penn Bank cleared, to not send the protested checks separately into the clearing house, but to consolidate them in the shape of a cashier's check or memorandum and send that, and in pursuance of that request the Fifth National Bank exchanged the protested checks held by it, including the check sued on, for a cashier's check or memorandum check. This, as bearing on the question of diligence in the matter.

This offer was objected to "because the plaintiff is not a party to the transaction and had no notice of it, and as incompetent and irrelevant."

The objection was sustained and the evidence rejected.

The plaintiff submitted the following point, inter alia:

at once liable to the depositor, as for money had and received. National Com. Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168. A collecting bank ordinarily becomes the owner of money collected by it for its correspondent, and, consequently, a debtor for the amount collected, under obligation to pay on demand, not the identical money received, but a sum equal in legal value. Planters Bank v. Union Bank, 33 U. S. 16 Wall. 428 (21 L. ed. 473).

Bank as collecting agent. When an obligation is lodged with a bank for collection, the bank becomes the agent of the payee or obligee to receive payment. Ward v. Smith, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 447 (19 L. ed. 207). The collecting bank is the agent of the holder of the note, and in no sense the agent of the maker. Dodge v. Freedman's Sav. & Trust Co., 92 U. S. 379 (23 L. ed. 820). See Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 25 (7 L. ed. 37). The deposit in one bank, of a bill to be collected in another, is a common usage, and the duty of the bank receiving such bill is precisely the same whoever may be the owner; and if unwilling to undertake the collection, the duty ought to be declined. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 25 (7 L. ed. 37). No special contract being made, and no special instruction being given, a bank receiving note for collection is bound to make reasonable demand, and give notice of dishonor. Fabens v. Mercantile Bank, 23 Pick. 390. If it fails to demand payment of a bill held for collection, it makes the bill its own, and becomes liable for the amount. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 25 (7 L. ed. 37); Bird v. La. State Bank, 93 U. S. 95 (23 L. ed. 818).

Agency employed in collection. Where a bank as a collection agent, receives a note for the purpose of collection, its position is that of an independent contractor, and the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated are its agents, and not the subagents of the owner of the note. Hoover v. Wisc., 91 U. S. 308 (23 L. ed. 302). A bank receiving a check for collection is bound to transmit the same to an independent agent for collec-

"That under all the evidence in the cause the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $2,622.25 with interest thereon from May 24, 1884, and the jury are instructed to find a verdict in his favor accordingly.

Answer. Affirmed, if the jury believe the evidence.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,095.15, being the amount claimed, with interest; and judgment having been entered thereon, defendant took this writ, assigning as error the rejection of its offer of evidence and the affirmance of plaintiff's point, as above stated.

Presenting a check and having it certified is not a demand for the money deposited.

Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn. Top. 39 Pa. 92.

If the holder of a check present it for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether the signature is genuine, or whether the drawer had funds to his credit, or merely to be identified, and without intending to demand payment, it is not such a demand for payment as will release the drawer.

Hampson v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 44 Cal. 189.

By the certification of a check the drawer is not discharged.

Dickford v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Ill. 288.

If the maker has withdrawn from the bank his entire deposit against which the check is drawn he is not injured by any delay in presenting it.

Emery v. Hobson, 68 Maine, 82.

Mr. J. M. Stoner, for defendant in error:

The law of the case is, that the surrender of plaintiff's check, and acceptance of the other, was followed by all the legal consequences of actual payment and puts the defendant below in just the same predicament as if plaintiff's check had been paid in good current funds, and it had them now in its vault.

See Essex County Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 7 Biss. 193.

Presenting a check for payment and accepting a certificate as good is equivalent to payment.

Smith v. Miller, 48 N. Y. 176.

Where the holder of a check presents the same to the drawee when due and procures it to be certified instead of paid, it is as between him and the drawer a payment, and the latter is discharged from liability thereon.

He can only receive payment in money (Ward v. Smith, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 417, 19 L. ed. 207); and hence any depreciation in specific bills received by a bank are its own loss and not the loss of its customer.

Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 233 (17 L. ed. 785); Merchants Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 1 Cent. Rep. 427, 109 Pa. 422.

Paxson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is safe to say, as a general rule, that when a bank receives a check from one of its depositors for collection, it must return him the check or the money. It is also equally clear that if the collecting bank surrenders the check to the bank upon which it is drawn, and accepts a cashier's check, or other obligation, in lieu thereof, its liability to its depositor is fixed—as much so as if it had received the cash. It has no right, unless specially authorized to do so, to accept anything in lieu of money. For the latter proposition it is sufficient to refer to Merchants Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 1 Cent. Rep. 427, 109 Pa. 422; Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 233 [17 L. ed. 785]; Ward v. Smith, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 417 [19 L. ed. 207]; McCulloch v. McKee, 16 Pa. 289; Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 208; Graydon v. Patterson, 18 Iowa, 258.

When payment of the check in question had been refused by the Penn Bank, and it had been duly protested, the Fifth National Bank of Pittsburgh, in this case the collecting bank and defendant below, could have relieved itself from liability by returning the dishonored check to the plaintiff below who had deposited it, or it might, perhaps, have called upon the latter for instructions as to any further proceeding; and had it received and followed such instructions, I am unable to see how any liability could have attached to it. Neither of these modes was pursued. The defendant retained the check, and made a further attempt to collect it. The plaintiff alleges that in doing so the defendant failed to use due diligence, and has thereby rendered itself liable to him for the debt.

The check in question was passed through the clearing house on May 21, 1884, but was not paid, the Penn Bank closing its doors on that day. It was opened again on Friday, May 23, at about 8 o'clock P. M. It remained open all the next day (Saturday), but closed finally on the following Monday morning. All the claims presented against it on Saturday were paid; the checks that came through the clearing house on Monday were not paid. The defendant bank sent this check, with others, to the Penn Bank on Saturday, and received what has been called a cashier's check for the aggregate amount.

The check in controversy was for $2,622.25, drawn by T. J. Watson, and was delivered to the Penn Bank when the cashier's check was taken. It was charged up again to Mr. Watson's account in the Penn Bank, and was placed on file there with the usual marks of cancellation upon it, and is still retained by that bank. The cashier's check was sent to the clearing house on Monday, and when it reached the Penn Bank the latter had finally closed its doors, and shortly thereafter made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors.

We need not discuss the question whether the defendant failed to exercise due diligence in not sending the dishonored check through the clearing house on Saturday. That it could have been done, and was done by some other parties, distinctly appears by the evidence, and is not disputed. We think the defendant bank fixed its liabilities by surrendering the check to the Penn Bank and accepting the cashier's or teller's check of that bank. As between the defendant and its depositor, this amounted to payment.

The plaintiff has neither his check nor his money Watson's account with the Penn Bank was good when the check was charged up to him. I am unable to see, therefore, that the plaintiff has any remedy against either Watson or the Penn Bank.

It was alleged, however, that in any event the defendant should have credit for the sum of $1,025, which it is said Watson paid the plaintiff on account of this check after the same had been protested. There is no assignment of error which specifically covers this point, nor was the court below asked to so instruct the jury by any point or written request appearing in this record. It is true the second assignment of error is perhaps broad enough to cover it. The fact remains, nevertheless, that there was no request for the specific instruction referred to. Nor are we able to see how it would have benefited the defendant had it been asked for. The equities, if any existed, between the plaintiff and Watson, could not have been settled by their banks. The collecting bank could have demanded no less than the face of the check, and the Penn Bank was bound to honor the check for its full amount, if in funds. It may be Mr. Watson may have a claim against the plaintiff in case the check is paid, but that does not concern the defendant bank.

Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF the State of MICHIGAN.
v.

George H. SOULE, Appt.

(....Mich....)

1. A club properly organized in good faith under Act No. 22 of the Public Acts of 1888, cannot purchase liquors by the quantity and distribute them among its members, receiving pay therefor as they are distributed by the glass, the proceeds to go into the treasury of the club, to be used in purchasing other liquors or in paying expenses, without being liable, under the Laws of Michigan, to pay a retail tax for selling such liquors and exhibit the tax receipt.

2. The servants, agents and employees of a club engaged in the business of purchasing liquor by the quantity and selling it to its members by the glass, who are engaged as such in said business, if they have not paid the tax, are equally liable with their principal therefor; and under the Liquor Law of 1887, p. 458, § 24, they may be informed against as principals.

Messrs. S. V. R. Trowbridge, Atty. Gen., and William J. Stuart, Proc. Atty., for the People, appellees.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent was informed against in the Kent County Circuit Court for engaging in the business of selling at retail, spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented and vinous liquors without first having paid to the county treasurer the tax provided by law therefor, and without having received from the county treasurer and posted up in his place of business a tax receipt, the said Soule not being a druggist, etc.

He was tried and convicted of the offense charged, and this case comes to this court for review on exceptions.

The facts admitted in the case, and upon which conviction was had, are as follows:

"On March 5, 1888, the 'New Era Club of Grand Rapids' was duly incorporated, pursuant to Act No. 22 of the Public Acts of 1888, of this State, and during the month of September, 1888, said club occupied rooms in a building at No. 341 South Division Street, in said city, for club purposes; that the rooms were leased by the club at a rent of $35 per month; that respondent was a member of the club and its treasurer and manager, in the employ of the club; that among the provisions kept by the organizations the property of the club becomes the joint property of its members, and the furnishing of liquors or wines to the members by the steward is not a violation of the statute, and the entertainment of a guest or friend by a member with wines or liquor at the club house would be no more of a violation of the statute than it would if such entertainment was given at his private residence. People v. Andrews, 20 N. Y. S. R. 408, citing, to the same effect, Com. v. Ewig, 6 New Eng. Rep. 177, 145 Mass. 119.

club for its members was liquor—spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented and vinous—which the respondent, as such employé, purchased for the club, out of the club funds, on the order of the club, and kept in said club room for the club, and that he, as such employé, dispensed said liquors to members of the club, as they called for it, by the glass, the members paying for the same five cents for a glass of beer or poor cigar, and ten cents for a glass of other liquor or a good cigar; and the money so received was by him placed in the treasury of the club and used by the club to pay its current expenses and replenish the stock of the club, and that members claimed and exercised the right—as they were permitted by the rules of the club—to bring with them to the club room friends who were not members, and to buy from the club stock, and give to such friends, any of said liquors by the glass, to be drank in the club rooms; and that respondent, as employé of the club, dispensed such liquors on demand, and that such disposition of liquors and cigars was carried on throughout the whole month of September, 1888, and that neither said club, any of its members nor said respondent paid the tax prescribed by law for engaging in the business of selling at retail, spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented or vinous liquors, nor were any of them druggists, nor was said place where said club was held a drug store.”

The Circuit Judge instructed the jury that a club like this, although legally organized under the laws of this State, engaged in part in purchasing liquors in quantity for the use of the club, and having it dispensed to its members by a servant of the club, they paying for it as they receive it, is as much legally bound to pay the tax and exhibit the receipt as is a retail dealer in such liquors; that the purchase of liquor by a club and selling it out to its members at retail for the usual prices paid therefor in saloons and bars, or the vending of such liquors to members to be presented to friends of members by way of treats, constitutes engaging in the business of selling at retail such liquors, for which the club is obliged to pay the tax and obtain and exhibit the receipt. And that if the club was engaged in the business as aforesaid, without having paid said tax, then its servants, agents and employés, engaged as such in said business, if they have not paid the tax, are equally liable with their principal therefor. And further as follows:

“Under this instruction, if you find that respondent, acting as the treasurer of this club, at the time charged in the information, kept in his possession the liquors of the club, and sold such liquors out to the members at retail, and that such club and respondent did not pay the tax required by law to be paid by persons engaged in selling such liquors at retail, and were not druggists, then the respondent would be guilty of the offense charged.”

The counsel for the respondent contend: first, that the club is not liable for the tax; second, if the club is obliged, under the law, to pay the tax, the respondent cannot be held upder the evidence as principal.

The element of bad faith in the organization of this club which has been made to play an important part in the disposition of the main question involved here, by some of the counts, seems to be eliminated from this record. The question is fairly raised whether a club, properly organized, and in good faith, under Act No. 23 of the Public Acts of 1888, can distribute liquors among its members, receiving pay for such liquors as they are distributed by the glass, the proceeds to go into the treasury of the club, to be used in purchasing other liquors or in paying expenses, without being liable under the laws of this State to pay a retail tax for selling such liquors.

There is a diversity of opinion among the authorities on this question.

Before examining the same it seems to us to be proper to examine the policy of our present laws on the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors.

In 1875 the Legislature repealed the Prohibitory Law, which had been on trial for twenty years, and adopted in its stead the principle of restriction and taxation of the liquor traffic.

This method of dealing with the sale of liquors has prevailed up to the present time. This club was formed in March, 1888, while the Local Option Law, since declared inoperative by this court, was upon the statute books, and apparently liable to enforcement. It cannot, however, in the light of this record, be said that this club was organized for the express purpose of evading this law; nor is it to be considered in the determination of this case.

The Local Option Law was never in force for a moment in Kent County, and no election was held or called under that Act. The Tax Law was in full force and effect at the time of the organization of this club, and at the time of the sales of liquor complained of in this prosecution.

The law provides for the payment of a tax by retail dealers in liquors, and a retail dealer is defined as follows: “Retail dealers of spirituous or intoxicating liquors, and brewed, malt and fermented liquors, shall be held and deemed to include all persons who sell any of such liquors by the drink, and in quantities of three gallons or less, or one dozen quart bottles or less, at any one time, to any person or persons.” Sec. 2, Act No. 813, P. A. 1887.

Upon the “business of selling” liquors at retail the tax is fixed at $500 per annum.

Any person or persons engaged in the business of selling liquors without the payment of the tax in full are deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not more $200 and costs of prosecution, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than ten days or more than ninety days, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Sec. 8, Act No. 813, P. A. 1887.

This provision of the law was not aimed at saloons or public bars alone; but it is further provided in the Act that “All saloons, restaurants, bars in taverns or elsewhere, and all other places, except drug stores, where any of the liquors mentioned in this Act are sold, or kept for sale, either at wholesale or retail, shall be closed on the first day of the week,” etc. Sec. 17, Act No. 813, P. A. 1887.

It must be held, I think, that the liquors purchased and kept by this club were, before they were dealt out to the members, the property of the corporation. When the liquor was passed by the agent of the corporation, the respondent in this case, over to the individual member, it became his property and was a sale to him, as he paid for it when it was delivered to him. He could then do with it as he pleased, drink it himself, give it to a friend to drink or throw it away.

Being sold within the quantity prescribed by statute, it was a sale by retail; and the corporation or its agent making a business of it, the sales constituted the "business of selling" by retail.

The law includes all persons, and the places of sale prohibited without the payment of the tax are not limited. It reaches a club house, or a private house, as well as a saloon or tavern. The object of the law is to tax the business wherever found or by whom carried on.

We are cited to some cases which are supposed to support the contention of respondent, which we will now notice.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has twice passed upon similar organizations. In the first case, "Several members formed a club of which the defendant was a member; they advanced a certain sum of money each, which was put into a common fund; the defendant was chosen agent of the club, and under instructions of the club purchased liquors and refreshments for the club; the fund was taken by the defendant and invested for them, and a certain number of checks, of the amount of five cents each, were delivered to each member of the club to the extent of the money advanced by each; these checks were transferable only to other members of the club; upon presentation of the checks by any member to the defendant he would deliver to that member liquor of the club to the amount of the check presented."

Upon distributing the liquor in this manner it was calculated that the liquor would so far overrun the amount to be delivered upon the checks as to leave in undelivered liquor about 25 per cent of the original cost. This the defendant had for his services and the use of his room for the club.

The court held that "If the liquors really belonged to the club, and had been previously purchased by them, or on their account, of some person other than the defendant, and if he merely kept the liquors for them, and to be divided among them according to a previously arranged system, these facts would not justify the jury in finding that he kept and maintained a nuisance within the meaning of the statute," which declared that the keeping and maintaining of a tenement used for the illegal keeping and illegal sale of liquors should be punished as a common nuisance.

"On the other hand, if the whole arrangement were a mere evasion and the substance of the transaction were a lending of the money to the defendant, that he might buy intoxicating liquors to be afterwards sold and charged to the associates, or if he was authorized to sell or did sell, or keep any of the liquors with intent to sell, to any persons not members of the club, he might well be convicted." Com. v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144.

This decision was apparently grounded upon the theory that in the case, as first supposed, there would be no sale of the liquors, but simply a distribution of the common property equally among the members of the association or corporation club.

This is not the case at Bar. There is no equal distribution of common property here among the members of the club, but a sale by the club to the individual member without any reference to his share in the common fund, or the stock of liquors owned in common by the club.

In the case of the Commonwealth v. Pomphret, 187 Mass. 564, the club was organized on a similar basis with the one considered in 102 Massachusetts, except that instead of distributing to each member in the first place checks representing the full value of his share in the common stock, a steward, who was paid for his services, kept checks for sale. Each member, upon joining the club, paid an admission fee of $1 and received a card certifying his membership. The money thus obtained was used in buying liquors. The steward furnished the checks, each representing five cents, to individual members in such numbers as were called for and received pay for them at five cents each.

The steward was complained against for keeping intoxicating liquors with intent unlawfully to sell the same, and was convicted in the trial court.

The supreme court held that the law had not undertaken to prohibit the drinking or buying of intoxicating liquor, or the distribution of it on severalty among persons who owned it in common; and that if two or more persons unite in buying intoxicating liquor, and then distribute it among themselves, they do not violate the statute, and the intent with which they do this is immaterial. The court assumed "that the liquors were owned in common by the members; that they were furnished only to members; and that they were kept by the defendant as one of the members and as steward of the association," and granted a new trial.

It does not appear that either of the clubs in these cases was incorporated.

In Tennessee Club v. Dwyer, 11 Lea, 452, the club was incorporated under the laws of that State for literary and social purposes. In the charter of the club it was provided that "The general welfare of society, and not individual profit," was the object of the association; "and hence the members are not stockholders in the legal sense of the term, and no dividends or profits shall be divided among the members." The initiation fee was $50 and the monthly dues $8. The club was used as a home except for lodgings, and some of its members spent much of their time there every day. No one but members of the club had admission to the same save friends of members living and residing outside of Shelby County in which the club was situated. One of its leading features was musical entertainments by amateurs, at which the daughters and lady friends of the members participated. Periodicals and leading newspapers were taken and kept in the reading room, and a general library of books.

Among other things the club kept a small stock of liquors, wines and cigars, which were dispensed to the members at a price fixed by a governing committee, not with a view, however, of making any profit, which was expressly forbidden by the charter, but simply for the accommodation and convenience of its members. The money paid for refreshments was reinvested by the secretary of the club in like refreshments used and consumed by its members. The liquors and refreshments were in the charge and custody of an officer and servant of the club, who attended to wait on its members.

The court found that the object of the sale of the liquors was not for the purposes of profit, but merely for the purpose of covering the outlay in the purchase thereof by the corporation, and the expense attending upon the keeping and serving thereof at the club house.

The club was held not liable to pay a tax as a retail dealer in liquors on the ground that the liquors were not kept for sale to the public or as a traffic, being purchased out of the common fund and kept for the exclusive use of the members of the club, and not sold for or at a profit.

It was determined that "the mode of sale," as it is termed, to the members at a rate fixed by the governing committee of the club is only in fact an equitable and convenient mode of distributing refreshments to its members, which are provided by the club for them exclusively. And it was squarely held that such a club had the right to purchase and keep liquors at its club rooms for the use of its members, and to distribute it among them in any method it might deem proper, and to raise funds for the purpose of replenishing by assessments upon its members; and further that the mode adopted by the Tennessee Club, of the "form of a sale" alone to its members of such a quantity for so much money, could be nothing more than a mode adopted of assessing each member in proportion to the amount he consumed.

Not satisfied, however, with this reason for its decision, the court reviewed the Statutes of Tennessee on the subject and held, from its construction of the same, that the Legislature did not intend to impose a tax as retail dealers upon clubs organized and conducted as was the club in question in the case.

In Seim v. State, 55 Md. 566, the court of appeals in that State held that the License Laws for sale of liquors did not apply to social clubs. In this case the corporation was known as the "Concordia" and the persons arrested for violation of a "Sunday Law" were the president, secretary and treasurer of the corporation. The statute provided that no person should "sell, dispose of or barter . . . any spirituous or fermented liquor, cordials, lager beer, wine, cider, or any other goods, wares or merchandise whatsoever" on the Sabbath Day, "commonly called Sunday;" nor should any dealer in any of the articles give away the same on that day, under a penalty.

Seim and the others were indicted under three counts: one charging them with "selling beer;" and one with disposing of "beer to one Springer on Sunday," and the last count with "giving away" beer as a "licensed dealer." The third count was abandoned on the trial.

The "Concordia" was incorporated under the general incorporation law of the State. By its charter the society was dedicated to the intellectual, moral and social improvement of its members, the refinement of their tastes and the development of good feeling among them. It is to "transact no business of any kind whatsoever for the purpose of making any profit, directly or indirectly, for itself or its members." Its sources of income were set forth to be: (1) money loaned to build club house by its active members; (2) entrance fee of $10 for each new member; (3) annual fee of $30 for each member; (4) money paid by members for what refreshments and liquors they get at the club house; (5) such additional assessments, fines and penalties as may be imposed upon the members.

These moneys are expended in: (1) paying current expenses of the corporation; (2) if there is any balance, in paying the interest on the loan of money to build club house.

Liquors are bought by the corporation and kept in the club house in the charge of a steward, an employé of the corporation. The members of the club, and no other persons, can get what liquors they want on any day, Sundays included, by calling for them and paying a price fixed by the regulations of the corporation. This price is fixed and paid, not for profit, but to cover the outlay for liquors and the expense of keeping and serving them at the club house.

The sale to Springer, who was a member of the club, of a glass of beer, for which he paid five cents, the price fixed, and which he then and there drank, was proven on the day charged in the indictment.

The court held, as before said, that the license laws of the State had never been construed as applicable to social clubs, for the reason that such a transaction as above described is not a sale within the meaning of the license laws; that the society was not an ordinary corporation, but a voluntary association or club united for social purposes—each member must be elected, and each is joint owner of the property and assets, and entitled to the privileges of the society as long as he remains a member. Among these privileges is that of partaking of the provisions and refreshments provided for the use of the members. "These are not sold to him by the corporation, but furnished to him by the steward, upon his paying into the common fund what is equivalent to the cost of the article furnished; and what is so paid is expended in keeping up the supply for the use of the members. Such a transaction is not a barter or sale in the way of trade."

There is also an English case on this subject—Graff v. Evans, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 373. The question was submitted whether the "Grosvenor Club" was liable under an Act providing that "No person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquors without being duly licensed to sell the same."

The club was a bona fide one properly constituted. The objects were "social intercourse mutual and moral improvement, aided by lectures and rational recreation." One object was also to keep the members away from the public house.

The members could obtain food and refreshments in the club, and wine and spirits on payment. The produce of such sales went into the funds of the club. The club had no license to sell. A member of the club was shown on a certain day to have purchased a bottle of whisky and a bottle of pale ale for which he paid. The bar man wrapped the bottles up in paper and the member carried them away out of the club openly and without concealment.

It was also shown that liquor to the value of $200 was sold annually to the members for consumption "off the premises," and that there was a profit on the sales to the amount of 88 per cent on the original cost.

The court held that the member buying the liquor was an owner of the property, together with all the other members of the club. Any member was entitled to obtain the goods on payment of the price. "A sale involves the elements of a bargain. There was no bargain here, nor any contract with Graff (the bar man) with respect to the goods." "Foster" (the member who purchased the liquor) "was acting upon his rights as a member of the club, not by reason of any new contract, but under his old contract of association, by which he subscribed a sum to the funds of the club, and became entitled to have ale and whisky supplied to him as a member at a certain price."

... There was no contract between two persons, because Foster was vendor as well as buyer. Taking the transaction to be a purchase by Foster of all the other members' shares in the goods, Foster was as much a co-owner as the vendor. I think it was a transfer of a special property in the goods which was not a sale within the meaning of the statute."

On the other hand, the selling or distributing of liquors by similar clubs, or through their agency, has been held by other courts to be in violation of statutes prohibiting the sale of liquors. State v. Mercer, 32 Iowa, 405-407; State v. Lockyear, 95 N. C. 633; Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 35; Rickart v. People, 79 Ill. 85; Marmont v. State, 49 Ind. 21.

In State v. Lockyear, supra, the "Capital Club" was organized and carried on almost identically the same as the corporation in Tennessee Club v. Dwyer, 11 Lea, 452; liquors were delivered in the same way and procured and paid for, both by the club and its members, upon almost precisely the same plan. It was held to be a sale, and that "all the elements of an executed contract" were present. "The corporate body, a legal entity and the owner of the liquor, through its servant, the defendant, delivers it to the purchaser at his call and receives a fixed compensation in money therefor. The property in the goods passes and vests in the purchaser, and the money paid is received for and becomes the property of the club. Can there be any doubt that a corporation may make contracts and deal with a corporation precisely as with a stranger, and valid obligations, capable of enforcements, be thus formed between the parties?"

The sale was held to be within, and in violation of, the Local Option Act of that State, the county in which this club was located having adopted prohibition under said Act.

In Marmont v. State, supra, Chief Justice Buskirk in his opinion says: "As the keg of beer when purchased belonged to the society the question arises whether the society by its agent could make a valid sale of such beer to the persons composing the society. We know of no principle of law which forbids it." It was therefore held a sale within the meaning of a prohibitory statute.

I shall not quote further from the cases which support the position that the corporation in the case at Bar was selling liquor at retail, within the meaning of the statute.

It appears to be a simple and unanswerable proposition that the liquor was in the first place owned by the corporation as corporate property, the same as any person might own it; that when it was delivered to a member of the corporation for money paid to the corporation, or its agent, and going into the funds, it was a sale to that member the same as if it had been passed to a stranger to the corporation in the same way; and the liquor by such sale then becomes the absolute property of the member the same as if he had purchased it in a saloon, or at any other place where it is sold.

The reasoning which I have given in the cases cited, by which such a transaction is held not to be a sale, seems to me to be unsound, strained and sophistical.

In only one case, to wit: Com. v. Smith, 103 Mass. 144, is there to my mind even the semblance of good reasoning. But in that case the association was not incorporated and the persons uniting together each put in an equal amount of money in the first place, and were given an equal number of checks to represent their share in the liquors, which they could take upon presentation of their checks. This transaction was quite plausibly denominated a distribution of the liquors and not a sale.

But that case is not the one here before us, as heretofore shown.

Counsel for respondent admits that under section 24 of the Liquor Law (P. A. 1887, p. 458) Soule, as clerk, agent or servant of "The New Era Club," would, under the proof in this case, be liable as principal under the statute; but they insist that he should have been informed against as such agent, clerk or servant.

We do not think so. The respondent is found at a place of business engaged in the sale of liquors at retail without having paid the tax. In his defense he shows that he is so selling as agent, clerk or servant of a corporation which has not paid the tax or complied with the statute.

By his own showing, under section 24 he makes himself liable as a principal; and the information is good against him as laid.

The conviction was proper, and the Court below is directed to proceed to judgment thereon.

The facts and questions presented are stated in the opinion.

The lien arising under the Law of 1885, becomes forthwith a vested right—"a vested interest which it is equitable that the government should protect."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 448.

A vested right of action is property in the same sense in which tangible things are property, and is equally protected against arbitrary interference.

The case in 8 Nevada explains Re Hope Mining Co. 1 Sawy. 710, cited by appellant. The later statute is shown to be a consolidation of two older statutes, and not a new one. Ainslie v. Kohn is explained by the statutes on which it rests. The Statute of 1874, § 18, p. 112, gives a lien before notice is filed. The new Statute of 1895 (§ 3632, Hill's Ann. Laws of Oregon, p. 1596) saves all liens so acquired. Also, in Nevada, Mechanics' Lien Laws are construed liberally and not, as in Michigan, in derogation of the common law.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff furnished lumber to the defendant Wadley, who had contracted to build two houses upon contiguous lots for the defendant, Meier. All the lumber was furnished before September 17, 1887, excepting one bill, of $39.30, which was delivered October 6, 1886.

The plaintiff undertook to enforce a statutory lien for the value of the lumber in the Circuit Court for the County of Wayne under and by virtue of Public Acts No. 270 of 1887. The court found that only the last item came under the Act of 1887, which took effect September 28, 1887, and directed a verdict for the plaintiffs in said sum of $39.30, and gave the defendants full costs. The plaintiff comes to this court on error.

Its counsel admits that only $39.30 of the lumber was furnished after the Act of 1887 took effect, but claims that the plaintiff obtained a lien for the balance under the statutes in force when the same was delivered to the contractor; that the lien under the two laws is substantially the same, the difference being in the procedure for enforcement; that the lien of the plaintiff became vested under the Law of 1885 at the time when the lumber was furnished; and, first, that this vested lien was not intended to be taken away by the Statute of 1887; and, second, that the Legislature could not so take it away if they intended to do so.

It is admitted that at the date of the going into effect of the Law of 1887 no steps whatever had been taken to fix or enforce any lien, and the first notice was filed October 28, 1887.

The Act of 1887 contained a repealing clause, as follows: "Act 258 of the Session Laws of 1879, relative to mechanics' liens, and all Acts amendatory thereof, and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, are hereby repealed, except as to proceedings now pending, which shall be concluded in the same manner as though this Act had not been passed."

The Statute of 1885 is amendatory of sections 8377 to and including 8381 of Howell's Statutes, which sections are the Statutes of 1879. It needs no argument to show that the exception to the repealing clause, as it reads, declares the intent of the Legislature to save only such liens, then existing, in which notice had been filed, or proceedings for enforcement taken, before September 28, 1887, the day the law took effect. The special exception shows clearly the legislative intent to save nothing else. This is a well known rule of statutory construction. It will also be noted that the Law of 1885 provided for the enforcement of the lien in chancery; and such method of enforcement is retained by this saving clause in all proceedings pending at the time, while the lien under the Act of 1887 is to be enforced in a suit at law.

Nor can it be claimed that the plaintiff acquired a vested right under the Law of 1885. The lien is bestowed, not to create a debt or charge, but to create a remedy—a means to collect a debt. This remedy, that the Legislature has created in derogation of the common law, it can take away, and no one can have a vested right to any particular remedy. The counsel for the appellant cites some cases which sustain his claim that the lien of his clients became vested as soon as the materials were furnished, and could not thereafter be destroyed by the Legislature without impairing the obligation of the contract under which the defendants received and the plaintiff furnished the lumber. The most notable case is that of Weaver v. Sells, 10 Kan. 609.

But the weight of authority is decidedly against this claim. The lien given by statute is no part of the contract. Without the statute creating the lien, the debtor was bound to pay the creditor the same as he would be with the lien. He had before this the common-law remedies to enforce the collection of his debt. The statute giving him a lien does not take away any remedy under the common law, but adds another, by fixing a lien upon the premises in case he sees fit to enforce it. This lien does not grow out of the contract, but depends entirely upon the statute for its existence. It derives its validity from positive enactment of the Legislature, and is liable always to be modified, altered or repealed by the same power that created it.

It is true, one may contract to furnish the materials, in view of the law as it exists at the time; but he furnishes the same, nevertheless, with notice that the law is subject to the will and control of the Legislature. The lien is but a means for enforcing the payment of the debt arising from the performance of the contract—a remedy given by law; which remedy, not being of the essence of the contract, is entirely within the control of the law-making power by whose authority it was given life. The right to a particular remedy is not a vested right. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 448; Rockwell v. Hubbard, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 197-202; Woodbury v. Grimes, 1 Colo. 100; Bailey v. Mason, 4 Minn. 546 (Gil. 480); Templeton v. Horne, 83 Ill. 491; Watson v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 157; Frost v. Riley, 54 Maine 345; Hall v. Bunte, 20 Ind. 304; Martin v. Hewitt, 44 Ala. 415-435.

As the defendants did not appeal, it is not necessary that we should examine the claim made by their counsel that the lien is not enforceable against one lot alone, because of the materials furnished being used indiscriminately in the buildings on both lots, and no separate account being kept, or ascertainable of the amount going into either one of the buildings.

The judgment must be affirmed, with costs of this court to defendants.

Town of WELLESLEY.

(....Mass.....)

1. A town which maintains a farm for the support of its paupers and from the surplus produce thereof boards paupers of other towns for pay, and also boards persons engaged to work upon its highways, is liable for injuries resulting to third persons from negligence in conducting it.

2. An employee on a town farm, maintained for the support of paupers and under the management of the overseers of the poor, is so far the servant of the town that it is liable for injuries

NOTE.—Municipal corporation, liable for injuries by negligence in care of its property. A town owning a town hall larger than it actually needs for municipal purposes is not bound to keep the part it does not use wholly unoccupied, but may derive a revenue therefrom by renting, or allow the same to be used gratuitously. French v. Quincy, 8 Allen, 12. But if it assumes to rent out such unoccupied portion it thereby becomes liable, in the same manner, and to the same extent, that a private owner would be. Worden v. New Bedford, 121 Mass. 24. If, however, the corporation let its building, not for profit, but gratuitously, no liability arises. Larrabee v. Peabody, 123 Mass. 561. A city which has undertaken, voluntarily and gratuitously, the care of its shade trees, is liable to a person injured by the falling of a dead limb negligently allowed to remain on the tree, the duty thus undertaken being not strictly governmental but rather private and ministerial. Jones v. New Haven, 34 resulting from the negligent performance of his duties, where the overseers are also highway surveyors and selectmen, and where the surplus income is used for town purposes and the whole operations of the farm are approved by the town.

1. A blind person walking unattended upon a public street is bound to use only ordinary care to avoid accidents; but in determining what is ordinary care the jury must consider his blindness and other infirmities and all the circumstances which bear upon the question—What care is reasonably necessary to insure his safety?

ON defendant's exceptions. Overruled.

This was an action of tort to recover damages for personal injuries.

At the trial in the superior court before Brigham, Ch. J., it appeared, among other things which are set forth in the opinion, that one Swift, master at defendant's almshouse, employed one Crawford to work at the almshouse, and that on February 1, 1887, he directed said Crawford to go to Boston with a two-horse team to haul manure for the town farm; that while returning through Newton, an adjoining town, the plaintiff was knocked down and injured at the corner of two streets by the team driven by Crawford; plaintiff, who was blind, seventy-three years old and infirm, was coming down the street with which locality he was familiar, when he was hit by the horses. The defendant asked the court to rule, among other things: "9, that the plaintiff, being blind and infirm and going about the streets unattended, took more than ordinary risks, and was bound to exercise more than ordinary care to avoid danger from passing vehicles; 10, that if plaintiff's negligence contributed in part to the accident, plaintiff cannot recover even if it appears that defendant was also negligent; 11, if the plaintiff could by reasonable care have ascertained before attempting the crossing that a team was approaching, and its direction, he should have done so, and waited until the danger was past."

The court refused these instructions; the jury found for the plaintiff; and the defendant excepted.

Mr. C. Everett Washburn for defendant.

Mr. Curtis Abbott for plaintiff.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

To determine whether the defendant town is liable for the negligence of Crawford in driving its team, we must answer two questions: first, Was the business in which Crawford was employed such that engaging in it would subject a city or town to liability for negligence in conducting it? secondly, Was he a servant of the town, or was he a representative of a board of public officers acting independently, merely in the performance of a public duty?

It is a general rule that a town is not liable for the negligence of its agents or servants in a matter in which it has no interest, and which has no direct or natural tendency to injure any individual in person or property, and which it has in charge solely in the performance of a public duty imposed upon it by law. Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 172; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 844. Whether this rule should be held to apply to the use of a farm for no other purpose than the support of paupers who are a charge upon the town, it is unnecessary to decide. For the jury have found that paupers whose support was chargeable to another town, and to the Commonwealth, were boarded for pay upon the defendant's farm, and that persons employed to work upon the highways were also boarded there, and that horses were kept there principally for use in repairing the highways.

When property is used or business is conducted by a town principally for public purposes, under the authority of the law, but incidentally and in part for profit, the town is liable for negligence in the management of it. Wornden v. New Bedford, 131 Mass. 28; Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489; Tindley v. Salem, supra.

This case clearly does not fall within the rule which we have stated. Nor can it be held that the use of the farm by the defendant was illegal, so as to exonerate the town from liability on account of it. It was not an appropriation of public money to a commercial enterprise, conducted primarily for profit. The income received from the farm was, apparently, incidental to the use of it in the support of paupers having a residence in the town, and in boarding horses and men employed upon the highways which the town maintained.

A city or town may make any reasonable provision for the support of paupers, or for sustaining other public burdens imposed upon it, and for that purpose may manage a farm which produces more crops than are needed for the food of the paupers, and may sell or exchange the surplus. It may transact business outside of the authority expressly given it, if the business is incidental to the performance of its public duties.

Overseers of the poor are public officers who commonly act under the authority of the law, and not as agents of a town. But in some matters they may represent the town as its agents. New Bedford v. Taunton, 9 Allen, 207.

They have the care and custody of the paupers in their respective cities and towns, and are to see that they are suitably relieved, supported and employed; but the city or town is to direct the manner and provide the means of supporting its paupers. Pub. Stat. chap. 84, § 2.

Conn. 1. A city is liable for the negligent management of property held by it for gain or profit, either wholly or partially, as where some portion of its municipal building is rented out, and injury results to an individual from the negligence of workmen employed by the city to repair such building. Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489.

Not liable for misfeasance or neglect of its officers. A town is not liable for the act of its highway surveyor, in employing a negligent assistant, he being a public officer strictly speaking, who can neither be controlled nor removed from office by the town. Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101. As between a town and its health officers, neither the relation of principal and agent, nor that of master and servant, exists, and it is not liable for their negligence; otherwise it would become surety to the public for the conduct of all town officers. Mitchell v. Rockland, 52 Maine, 118. A town is not liable for the negligence of a physician, who, being placed in charge of its pest house by its selectmen during an epidemic of small pox, permits a nurse to go forth without disinfection, and the disease is communicated. Brown v. Vinalhaven, 65 Maine, 402. See note to Hines v. Charlotte, 1 L. R. A. 844.

If a town sees fit to buy a farm, and cultivate it in connection with an almshouse, there is nothing in the statute which gives the overseers of the poor a right to manage it without authority from the town.

In the case at bar, the same persons held the offices of overseers of the poor, highway surveyors and selectmen. In one capacity they had the care and oversight of the paupers, in another of the roads and bridges, and in the third of many of the other prudential affairs of the town.

The farm was used in part for the support of the paupers, of whom they had charge as overseers of the poor, in part for a purpose which was connected with the maintenance of the highways, which were in charge of the highway surveyors, and in part for the production of income, a use which was outside of the express authority of any board of public officers, and was under an assumption of authority that seems to have been approved and ratified by the town. The three persons who managed the farm in the interest of the town for these several purposes cannot be deemed to have been acting merely as a single board of public officers; but they represented the defendant in different capacities, such as to make them in that business the defendant's agents.

The facts which the jury were required to find in order to return a verdict for the plaintiff conclusively established the town's liability for Crawford's acts, and the defendant's requests for instructions upon this point were rightly refused; and the instructions given were sufficiently favorable to the defendant.

It is not, under all circumstances, negligence for a blind person to walk unattended upon a public street. Smith v. Wildes, 8 New Eng. Rep. 744, 143 Mass. 556; Sleeper v. Sandown, 52 N. H. 244.

There was evidence proper for the consideration of the jury upon the question whether the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care.

The ninth and tenth requests for rulings were rightly refused, and the jury were properly instructed upon the subjects to which the requests referred. The plaintiff was only bound to use ordinary care; but in determining what was ordinary care the jury were called upon to consider his blindness and other infirmities, and all the circumstances which bore upon the question that care was reasonably necessary to insure his safety.

The eleventh request assumed as a hypothesis merely that the plaintiff could have ascertained "that the team was approaching, and its direction;" it called for an instruction as to the effect of only a part of the evidence bearing upon a single fact in issue, and the judge might properly refuse it. McDonough v. Miller, 114 Mass. 94.

Exceptions overruled.

v.
FITCHBURG R. CO.

SAME v. SAME.

1. Under the provisions of Public Stat.

*That section is as follows: "If by reason of the negligence or carelessness of a corporation operating a railroad or a street railway, or of the unfitness or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants, chap. 112, § 212,* that in certain cases of death occasioned by the negligence of a corporation, etc., the damages shall be "assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation or of its agents or servants," the corporation is not rendered liable by showing that it had assumed a contractual or quasi contractual responsibility for third persons who were not its servants but through whose negligence the injury happened.

2. Although a railroad corporation must be taken to have known, at the time of a disaster, the facts which subsequently pointed out the cause thereof, yet it is entitled to go to the jury on the question whether or not those facts would, before the accident, have indicated to a competent person, considering them with the care which is necessary when human life is involved, that the road was unsafe.

3. If a railroad company is using tracks belonging to a third party, and the dangerous character of such tracks might have been discovered by the exercise of due care, it will be liable for an accident occasioned thereby and resulting in the death of a passenger, whether the defect was in the original construction of the road or was due to the failure of the owner to make repairs, or however otherwise it may have been caused.

ON defendant's exceptions. Sustained.

These are two actions tried together brought to recover damages under section 212 of chap. 112 of the Public Statutes, for the death of two minor children of the plaintiff, aged respectively one and three years. They were traveling with their parents from Shelburne Falls to Greenfield, upon a free pass. At a point intermediate between these stations the train, owing to a defect in the railroad, was precipitated down a high embankment into the Deerfield River, and the said children were instantly killed. The accident was caused by a defect in the original construction of the embankment, and by the filling up of the ditches, which appear by the evidence to have been filled for about two months prior to the accident.

The railroad was owned by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and was operated by the defendant in accordance with a contract, by virtue of which the Commonwealth was to keep said railroad in repair, and the Fitchburg Railroad Company was to operate the same at cost, without any profit or any compensation beyond the actual amount expended in said operation.

At the trial before Mason, J., at the close of the testimony the defendant moved that the case be taken from the jury on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a verdict. This motion having been overruled, defendant asked the court to rule: "first, the defendant is not responsible for the originally defective construction of the road at this point; second, the defendant is not responsible for the defective condition of the road unless the defendant had notice of the same, or might have had notice by the exercise of due care;" which requests were refused, and the Judge ruled that the defendant would be responsible for the defective condition of the road, although it had no notice of the same, and could not obtain such notice with the exercise of due care.

ting a railroad or a street railway, or of the unfitness or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants,

The third ruling requested was that "The deceased were not passengers of the defendant in such sense as to render the defendant liable for the defective track, without other negligence on the part of the defendant." This ruling was also refused.

The defendant also requested the presiding Judge to instruct the jury that "The defendant is liable only for its own negligence; and the negligence of the Commonwealth and its agents cannot be imputed to it;" which request was refused.

The jury found for plaintiff, damages being assessed at $2,500 in each case; and defendant alleged exceptions.

Mr. Geo. A. Torrey for defendant.

Messrs. I. R. Clark and F. Ranney, for plaintiff:

As a carrier of passengers, defendant was bound to exercise the highest degree of care which it could reasonably, to prevent such injuries to its passengers as human care and forethought could avert.

White v. Fitchburg R. Co. 136 Mass. 324.

Its duty is the same whether running on its own track or the track of another company, which it is using by virtue of a contract.

Deceased were free passengers, and defendant's duty toward them and to passengers having tickets was one and the same.

Todd v. Old Colony & F. R. R. Co. 3 Allen, 18; 3 Wood, Railway Law, 1440, note 3.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If this were an action to recover for personal injuries, brought by a passenger who had paid his fare, it would make no difference in the defendant's liability whether the injuries were caused by the negligence of those who were in a strict sense the defendant's servants, or by that of a third person who managed the road over which the defendant had undertaken to carry the plaintiff. McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. Co. 4 Cush. 400; Eaton v. Boston & L. R. Co. 11 Allen, 500; White v. Fitchburg R. Co. 136 Mass. 324, 325; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 104 [18 L. ed. 591, 594].

The case would not be altered by the fact that the person in charge was the Commonwealth. Peters v. Rylands, 20 Pa. 497.

There are weighty decisions, also, to the effect that in such an action the defendant is liable, not only for negligence at the time of the accident, but for any defect in its appliances which might have been discovered at the time when they were made, although the defendant did not make them and the defect could not have been discovered afterwards. Hegeman v. Western R. Co. 13 N. Y. 9; Pendleton v. Kinsley, 3 Cliff. 410, 421; Phila. & R. R. Co. v. Anderson, 94 Pa. 351, 359; Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 184, 501; Grote v. Chester & H. R. Co. 2 Exch. 251, 255. Compare Ingalls v. Bills, 9 Met. 1, 11. See Pa. Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451 [26 L. ed. 141]; Hutch. Carriers, §§ 509-512. And see Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537, 546, citing Richardson v. Great Eastern R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342. Compare Wright v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 187.

In some of the cases it is intimated that the negligence of the third person is imputed to the carrier. White v. Fitchburg R. Co., Peters v. Rylands, and Pa. Co. v. Roy, supra; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Peyton, 106 Ill. 534, 540. And in some instances at least the declaration has alleged negligence on the part of the defendant only. See Great Western R. Co. v. Blake, 7 Hurl. & N. 987; Buxton v. Northeastern R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 549; Thomas v. Rhymney R. Co. L. R. 5 Q. B. 226; S. C. L. R. 6 Q. B. 266; Peters v. Rylands, ubi supra; Hegeman v. Western R. Co. 13 N. Y. 9, 10.

In an early case it was said: "Everything is a negligence in a carrier which the law does not excuse." Dale v. Hall, 1 Wilson, 281, 282.

On the other hand, the extreme liability imposed by the foregoing decisions very frequently has been referred to the carrier's implied contract, or to what the passenger reasonably may understand that the carrier assumed. Thomas v. Rhymney R. Co., Francis v. Cockrell, Peters v. Rylands, Eaton v. Boston & L. R. Co., ubi supra; Norton v. Western R. Co. 15 N. Y. 444, 447. Compare Buxton v. Northeastern R. Co. supra; Austin v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 442, 446. And some judges have pointed out that the liability could not stand on the carrier's negligence, and have suggested that the declaration ought to be varied accordingly. Thomas v. Rhymney R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 266, 275; S. C. 40 L. J. Q. B. 89, 95.

These distinctions are not of much importance in actions at common law brought by the passenger himself; but the present action is statutory and penal in its character. The statute does not extend the liability for personal injuries to those injuries which cause death, as in Little v. Dusenberry, 46 N. J. L. 614 (where also, so far as appears, the defendant may have been negligent). It creates a liability of a different nature. The action which it gives to the administrator is merely a substitute for the indictment also provided for, and it is expressly enacted that the damages shall be "assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation or of its agents or servants."

ants or agents while engaged in its business, the life of a passenger, or of a person being in the exercise of due diligence and not a passenger, or in the employment of such corporation, is lost, the corporation shall be punished by fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by indictment prosecuted within one year from the time of the injury causing the death, and paid to the executor or administrator for the use of the widow and children of the deceased in equal moieties, or, if there are no children, to the use of the widow, or, if no widow, to the use of the next of kin; but a corporation operating a railroad shall not be so liable for the loss of life by a person while walking or being upon its road contrary to law or to the reasonable rules and regulations of the corporation. If the corporation is a railroad corporation, it shall also be liable in damages, not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $500, to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the corporation or of its servants or agents, and to be recovered in an action of tort, commenced within one year from the injury causing the death, by the executor or administrator of the deceased person, for the use of the persons hereinbefore specified in the case of an indictment. But no executor or administrator shall, for the same cause, avail himself of more than one of the remedies given by this section.

Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212. See Carey v. Berkshire R. Co. 1 Cush. 475, 480; Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co. 108 Mass. 7, 12.

This language imports that there must be some degree of culpability on the part of the corporation or of its servants, and is not satisfied by showing that the corporation assumed a contractual or quasi contractual responsibility for third persons, who were not its servants. Suppose, for instance, that the defect in the construction of the road was unknown both to the defendant and to the Commonwealth, and could not have been discovered by either through the use of any degree of care; the fact that it was known to the private corporation that originally built the road could not be said to show culpability on the part of the defendant except by a willful misapplication of words.

We go one step further. Supposing that the defect was known to the Commonwealth and was not known and could not have been known to the defendant; the defendant was not negligent, whatever might have been its liability at common law, in this case or the last. We do not mean to intimate that the facts show any ground for this last supposition. The defendant was bound to know the visible facts concerning the track over which it carried its passengers. So far as appears, therefore, it must be taken to have known the facts which with our present knowledge we see pointed out the cause of or a part of the causes of the disaster. But it was entitled to go to the jury on the question whether these facts before the accident would have indicated to a competent person considering them with the care which is necessary when human life is involved, that the road was unsafe; and, under this statute, it was entitled to the second ruling asked.

The plaintiff does not contest the correctness of the ruling asked, but suggests that it was unnecessary because it was asked only as one ground for taking the case from the jury, and because it was undisputed that the improper condition of the road was visible. The two reasons offered are inconsistent with each other. We do not find any warrant for the first in the bill of exceptions, and with more hesitation we construe the exceptions to mean only that the filling of the ditch and the escape of water by working under the track were visible, and not that it was also manifest that they constituted a danger.

The defendant now contends that not only was it entitled to the second ruling asked, but the evidence disclosed no indications of danger, and that the case should have been taken from the jury on that ground. We cannot go so far as to decide what inferences the defendant ought to have drawn from the visible condition of the road in the situation where the accident happened.

If the danger might have been discovered by the exercise of due care, the defendant will be liable whether the defect was in the original construction of the road or was due to a failure on the part of the Commonwealth to make necessary repairs, or however otherwise it may have been caused. If the defendant carried its passengers into a place which it knew or ought to have known was dangerous, it was negligent, although it did not create and had no right to remove the danger.

Whether or not there would be any difference between the defendant's common-law liability for the negligence of third persons, not its servants, in the construction or maintenance of the road, to passengers who had paid fares, and its liability to those who were being carried lawfully but without consideration, may depend upon the true ground of liability so far as it exists, when the defendant is itself free from blame, and perhaps is still open to argument. Todd v. Old Colony & F. R. R. Co. 8 Allen, 18, 20; Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Weir, 37 Mich. 111, 114, 115; Hutch. Carriers, § 567, note.

But the defendant would be liable at common law for injuries caused by its own negligence to passengers carried gratuitously; and the statute makes no distinction between gratuitous and paying passengers, if the person killed is a passenger. There is no doubt that the plaintiff's children were passengers. See Todd v. Old Colony & F. R. R. Co. supra; Wilton v. Middlesex R. Co. 107 Mass. 108; Wilton v. Middlesex R. Co. 125 Mass. 180; Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co. ubi supra; Austin v. Great Western R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 442

Railroad commissioners being authorized by statute to make reasonable rules and regulations for all railroads in the State as to charges for transportation of passengers and freights, and to furnish each company with a schedule of charges made for its observance, and having fixed certain rates for one of the companies which it deems not reasonable and just, said company filed a bill against the commissioners to enjoin them from promulgating said rates, or any other rates substantially the same. Held, that this is not, in effect, a suit against the State; but the statute having prescribed a penalty for violation of the rates fixed, and authorized the commissioners to institute action in the name of the State to recover the penalty, in so far as the bill seeks to enjoin them from doing this, it is in effect a suit against the State.

A PPEAL by defendants, from a decree of the Circuit Court of Santa Rosa County (McClellan, J.), overruling demurrer to bill against State Railroad Commissioners to enjoin them from promulgating rates for transportation, etc. Bill dismissed.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.
The Attorney-General for appellants.
Mr. W. A. Blount for appellee.

Maxwell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants are commissioners under an Act of the Legislature of Florida of 1887, "to provide for the regulation of railroad freight and passenger tariffs in this State; to prevent unjust discrimination in the rates charged for transportation of passengers and freights, and to prohibit railroad companies, corporations and lessees in this State from charging other than just and reasonable rates, and to punish the same, and prescribe a mode of procedure and rules of evidence in relation thereto, and to appoint commissioners, and to prescribe their powers and duties in relation to the same."

They bring this case here for a reversal of the decree overruling their demurrer to the bill of the Pensacola & Atlantic Railroad Company against them, which also enjoins them from "promulgating, as binding upon the complainant, the rates for transportation of freight and passengers heretofore prescribed by the defendants for the complainant, or other rates substantially the same as said rates, and from procuring or permitting the institution of any suits against the complainant for any alleged charges by the complainant in excess of the said rates heretofore fixed, or in excess of any other rates which may be fixed by the defendants for the complainant, substantially the same as the said rates."

The gravamen of the bill is that the Pensacola & Atlantic Railroad Company is a corporation of the State of Florida empowered to construct and operate a railroad from some point on the Apalachicola River to the City of Pensacola; that the road was completed and began to operate in April, 1888, and has been operated ever since; that the defendants were appointed commissioners, under the Act above mentioned; that they have fixed rates for freight and passenger transportation on the railroads of the State, including that of complainant, which they have determined to be just and reasonable charges to be made by said railroads, and have ordered the several companies, including complainant, not to make any charges greater than the rates so fixed; that they have fixed three cents per mile as the uniform rate to be charged by complainant for passengers, and have fixed rates for freight, varying with the distance of transportation, and with certain classification of the various kinds of freight, which they have arbitrarily adopted; that the rates thus fixed were made in spite of facts hereinafter stated, and argument thereon before defendant; and, as authorized by the Act, complainant protested to defendants against the enforcement of said rates, but the defendants refused to change the same, and thereupon complainant appealed to the board of revisers provided by the Act, but that board confirmed the action of defendants; that complainant, for reasons hereinafter stated, declined to adopt the rates thus prescribed, and have charged for passengers and freight more than said rates, but the rates so charged were just and reasonable, and in no instance has it made a charge that was not just and reasonable, never having charged for passengers more than five cents per mile, the rate authorized by its charter; that consequent upon such charges by complainant, which defendants allege to be in violation of the Act and of their order, they demanded that complainant restore to the persons so charged the excess over the rates fixed by them, and upon complainant's refusal they have procured the Attorney-General of the State to bring several suits (naming them) to recover the penalties prescribed by the Act for charges in excess of rates so fixed; that numerous persons who have been charged by complainant more than the rates fixed by defendants, relying on the authority of defendants to fix rates, have brought suits against complainant to recover damages for said alleged excessive charges; that said suits of the State, and of the said persons, are now pending, and the defendants announce their intention to procure other suits to be brought by the Attorney-General for every case of a charge by complainant in excess of the rates fixed by them, and that there are numerous cases of such excess, and complainant will continue to so charge until it be judicially determined that it has not the right to do so; that defendants have not the power to determine the justice or reasonableness of complainant's charges, because that involves a judicial function which they are inhibited from exercising by the Constitution of the State; that if not judicial, it is legislative, and cannot be exercised by defendants; that if defendants have any power whatever in the premises, it is restricted to fixing rates that are in fact just and reasonable, and they cannot require complainant to reduce its rates to charges which are not reasonable and just to it; and that the rates prescribed by defendants are much less than those heretofore charged by complainant for the same services, and are neither just nor reasonable; for though its charges have been much greater than is allowed by the rates fixed by defendants, and have brought a much larger gross income than would be realized from said rates, yet complainant has not only failed to realize any interest upon its investment, but has failed to realize enough to meet the necessary ex-penances connected with the operation and ownership of its road.

The bill then proceeds to give figures and statements as to the cost of construction and equipment of the road, and its actual value, and as to earnings and expenses of its operation, going to show excess of expenses over earnings, and actual loss from the operation of the road during the more than five years of such operation to date, and alleges facts in regard to the condition and business of the country through which the road runs to show that such loss, even on the basis of its charges, will probably continue for some years. It further alleges that the rates prescribed by defendants are also unreasonable and unjust when compared with those permitted by them to other roads in the State, giving figures to show the difference; and that a reduction of its charges to the rates prescribed by defendants would compel complainant to forego any possibility of earning any interest on its investment, or any income from the operation of its road, and that to continue the operation at an actual loss would render its road valueless; and that defendants cannot, under the law, so act as to produce this result, for thereby complainant would be deprived of its property without due process of law, contrary to provision of section 1, art. 14, Const. U. S.

The prayer of the bill was for the relief which was granted by the injunction.

On the argument of the demurrer to the bill the commissioners filed an affidavit, intended mainly to show that in their dealings with complainant they were not led to expect such complaints as the bill makes; and they say that if application had been made to them for a change or increase in the rates, and it had appeared to them reasonable and just, they doubtless would have made proper changes, as they did in cases of application by other roads.

The preliminary question raised by the demurrer arises on two of its grounds, the third and fourth, viz.: (3) that the court has no jurisdiction of the matters set forth in complainant's bill, or to grant relief in the premises; and (4) that this is in effect a suit against the State.

We will consider first whether this is, in effect, a suit against the State. If it is, it is well understood that it cannot be sustained, unless by consent of the State. The objection springs from the rule that a suit against officers of the State founded on any claim or complaint the adjudication of which against the officers would be, in effect, an adjudication against the State, is a suit against the State.

In Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 23 U. S. 9 Wheat. 788 [6 L. ed. 204], and Davis v. Gray, 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 203 [21 L. ed. 447], the court announced that it would look only to the record to determine whether the State was a party. But in subsequent cases this test is treated as too narrow, and cases against officers were held to be cases against the State, although not named on the record. See La. v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711 [27 L. ed. 448]; Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. 109 U. S. 446 [27 L. ed. 992]; Hagood v. Southern, 117 U. S. 52 [29 L. ed. 805]; and Re Ayers, 123 U. S. 443 [31 L. ed. 216].

In the Virginia Coupon Cases, 114 U. S. 270-338 [29 L. ed. 185-210], the State being interested, but the court holding she was not a necessary party, it was nevertheless said in its opinion "that the question whether a suit is within the Eleventh Amendment is not always determined by reference to the nominal parties on the record."

And conversely, in the cases of New Hampshire and New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76 [27 L. ed. 656], the court refused to sustain a suit of one State against another, although the Constitution of the United States authorizes such a suit; because it appeared that while on the record the States suing were the nominal parties, yet they were acting for some of their citizens, who were the real parties in interest, and who could not themselves sue the State, being within the prohibition of the Eleventh Amendment.

It cannot be said, therefore, that the case under consideration is not a case against the State simply because the record does not bear her name, and indeed there has been no contention to that effect. So the question is whether the case comes within any class in which a suit against officers is of such a character that a judgment or decree cannot be given in it without affecting some right or interest of the State, so that the effective operation of the judgment or decree is really against the State, rather than the officers sued. In other words, Would a decree against these commissioners be a decree against the State as the actual party?

The only cases in the Supreme Court of the United States in which it has been held that a suit against officers or others is a suit against the State are Louisiana v. Jumel, Cunningham v. Macon Railroad Company, Hagood v. Southern, and Re Ayers, all cited above. We need only analyze these so far as to show the nature of the question involved in each.

The first, Louisiana v. Jumel, was an attempt of bond creditors of the State to protect and enforce their rights under the Law of 1874, which provided for the issue of the bonds they held, and under an amendment to the Constitution of the same year, which ratified the law, as against an ordinance of the new Constitution of 1879 which stopped the further levy of the tax that this law authorized for the purpose of raising revenue to pay interest on the bonds, and also prevented the disbursing officers from using funds in the treasury derived from previous levies for paying such interest. The suits were against officers of the State. It was not denied that this ordinance was unconstitutional because impairing the obligation of a contract of the State; but the court held that the suits could not be sustained for the reason that the execution of her contract could not be enforced by a suit against her officers to which she was not a party.

The case of Cunningham v. Macon Railroad Company was for the foreclosure of a mortgage to secure bonds issued by the company. Prior to its institution, the State of Georgia had gone into possession of the road, and was still in possession under purchase at a sale made on account of her lien to secure her indorsement of other bonds of the company. The court held that her interest in the property made her a necessary party, and it refused to entertain jurisdiction of the case as she could not be sued without her consent.

The case of Hagood v. Southern was a suit against officers of the State of South Carolina, on bond scrip issued by the State, which declared on its face that it was receivable "in payment of all taxes and dues to the State", to compel its receipt for taxes. This was held to be a suit that could not be maintained, because the State could not be compelled to perform her contract by a suit against her officers.

The case of Re Ayers was on a writ of habeas corpus. A bill had been filed to enjoin officers of the State of Virginia from prosecuting suits in the name of the State against the taxpayers reported to be delinquent for the recovery of their taxes—the gravamen of the bill being that they refused to receive coupons of the State for taxes, though made receivable by law, and that this was a violation of the contract of the State, but that under a subsequent law suits were threatened against those who tendered the coupons, and would not otherwise pay their taxes. An injunction was granted, which the officers disobeyed, and they were put into custody for contempt. The writ of habeas corpus was for their relief. The court discharged the parties, holding that though the suits threatened might be a breach of the contract of the State, yet the injunctions should not have been granted, because the actual party upon whom it operated was the State, and not the officers who were sued, and there being no jurisdiction against the State the injunction was void, and did not furnish legal ground for the imprisonment. The court refused jurisdiction of two of these suits, because they involved state contracts; of the third, because it involved property of the State; and of the fourth, because although the foundation of the suit involved a contract of the State, the immediate proceeding was to relieve her officers from punishment for doing in her name that which, when done, would be her own act.

Looking to cases we find in the state courts, they are substantially of the same nature. That of State v. Durke, 33 La. Ann. 498, was a suit presenting in part the same questions as those in Louisiana v. Jumel, and was decided adversely to the plaintiff, on the ground that if he had contract rights against the State they could not be enforced by a suit against her officers, she not being a party. In Weston v. Dane, 51 Maine, 461; Marshall v. Clark, 22 Tex. 23; and Houston Railroad Co. v. Randolph, 24 Tex. 817, similar decisions were given, the cases being against officers on pecuniary claims against the State; and similar decisions in Prinsep v. Cherokee Railroad Company, 45 Ga. 365; and Hoener v. DeYoung, 1 Tex. 764, being cases in which property claimed by the State was involved.

It appears, so far as we can find in the reported cases, that the rule which forbids a suit against officers, because in effect a suit against the State, applies only where the interest of the State is through some contract or some property right of hers, or where her interest is in a suit brought or threatened by her officers in her own name to enforce some alleged claim of hers. And it is important to observe the character of the interest. It is not enough that the State should have a mere interest in the vindication of her laws, or in their enforcement as affecting the public at large, or as they affect the rights of individuals or corporations, but it must be an interest of value to herself as a distinct entity—of value in a material sense. She has an interest in the success of the policy of her laws, and in the just administration and execution of those laws; yet it is not an interest on which she can be said to be a party affected by any private suit arising under them, when it is not another and more direct interest inhering in some separate right or claim of right of her own.

With this distinction in mind, how stands the present case?

The fifth section of the Act constituting the office of the commissioners provides that they shall "make and fix reasonable and just rates of freights and passenger tariffs, to be observed by all railroad companies doing business in this State, on the railroads thereof; shall make reasonable and just rules and regulations to be observed by all railroad companies doing business in this State as to charges at any and all points for the necessary handling and delivering of freights; shall make such just and reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary for preventing unjust discriminations in the transportation of freight and passengers on the railroads in this State; shall make reasonable and just rates of charges for use of railroad cars carrying any and all kinds of freight and passengers on said railroads, no matter by whom owned or carried; and shall make just and reasonable rules and regulations, to be observed by said railroad companies on said railroads, to prevent giving of any rebate or bonus, directly or indirectly, and from misleading or deceiving the public in any manner as to the real rates charged for freight and passengers."

The sixth section authorizes and requires the commissioners to "make, for each of the railroad companies doing business in this State, as soon as practicable, a schedule of just and reasonable rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freights and cars on each of said railroads, and said schedules shall, in [any suit] brought against any such railroad corporations wherein is involved the charges of any such railroad corporations for the transportation of any passengers, or freight, or cars, or unjust discrimination in relation thereto, be deemed and taken in all courts of this State as sufficient evidence that the rates fixed therein are just and reasonable rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freights and cars upon the railroads; and said commissioners shall from time to time, and as often as circumstances may require, change and revise said schedules."

There are other provisions in these sections, which it is needless to recite.

The principal complaint of the bill against the commissioners is that, in performing the duty imposed on them, they exceeded the authority given by the Act, and fixed rates for the road of the complainant that were not reasonable and just; that if said rates are enforced the road will be operated at a loss, to such extent as will render the property valueless; and that this amounts to a violation of the State Constitution, which forbids the taking of private property without just compensation.

and also of the Constitution of the United States, in that it deprives complainant of its property without due process of law.

There is here nothing that affects the State in any valuable interest of her own, or affects her otherwise than as she is concerned in having a law of a public nature carried out. Clearly, then, according to the test we think the law applies, the State bears no such relation to the subject matter of this suit as renders her, in effect, a party to it; and if the injunction sought had been limited to staying the action of the commissioners in regard to rates only, the objection that she is a party would not obtain. But the bill goes further, and founds a complaint against the commissioners in connection with section 17 of the Act, which provides a penalty against any railroad company for violating the rules and regulations prescribed by them, and directs that they shall institute action through the Attorney-General to recover the penalty. Admitting violation of the rate regulations prescribed for it, the company, resting on alleged want of authority in the commissioners to fix for it the rates they did, prays that they be enjoined from instituting the action authorized. A further direction of the Act is that the suit "shall be in the name of the State of Florida." It needs no argument to show that in such a suit the State is a party, and that the injunction asked against the commissioners to stay the suit would be an injunction in fact against her. It is precisely the case which led to Re Ayers, where officers were enjoined from bringing suits in the name of the State, which was held to be void because in fact an injunction against the State, the court saying, if "officers, attorneys and agents are personally subjected to the process of the court so as to forbid their acting in its behalf, how can it be said that the State itself is not subjected to the jurisdiction of the court as an actual and real defendant?"

There is a class of cases against officers in which suits are held to be allowable, although the officers were acting under orders or authority of the Government. This is where they exceed their authority, and in their action commit a tort. "In these cases [the officer] is not sued as or because he is the officer of the government, but as an individual." Cunningham v. Macon & B. R. Co. supra.

There is another large class of cases in which suits against officers of the State have been sustained, though it was to enforce obligations of the State, or to compel performance of some act authorized by law of the State in behalf of anyone who may have had a substantial interest in its performance as an act on the part of the State. Thus, where a statute makes an appropriation of money out of the treasury of the State, for a certain defined purpose, and directs its payment by the proper officer, leaving in him no discretion to be exercised in regard to its payment, the party entitled may, on refusal of the officer to pay him, have a writ of mandamus against him to compel the payment, and the State need not be a party. High, Extr. Rem. §§ 101, 104.

So, as to the performance by an executive officer of any ministerial act for the State not requiring the exercise of discretion. Id. §§ 107, 110, 127. This is sometimes treated in the 2 L. R. A.

discussion of cases as if connected with the non-liability of a State to be sued, and as an exception to the rule which forbids a suit against her through her officers; but we think this is not strictly correct, and that in this country, at least, in regard to executive officers, an entirely different question is involved—to wit: the authority of one department of the Government, as constituted here, to interfere with the functions appertaining to another—and we treat the case before us in this view so far as it depends on the point raised by counsel growing out of this doctrine.

The point referred to is, that while, in the class of cases just mentioned, a suit against an officer refusing to act will be sustained, on the ground that the law speaks to him as a ministerial officer without discretion as to the thing directed to be done; on the other hand, if the law invests him with discretion in doing it, the courts will refuse to interfere with that discretion. Towle v. State, 8 Fla. 202; High, Extr. Rem. §§ 42, 80.

This is not contested by the opposing counsel, but he meets it on the ground that "The whole gist of the railroad company's case is that the commission has no discretion which authorizes it to fix rates in the manner fixed in this case; [and] admits that if the Act of the Legislature gives it such scope, its discretion is absolute between the nether limits of a living interest upon the investment and the upper limit of attainable profit; but it cannot go below the nether limit, for then it trenches upon constitutional rights. When there is no power there can be no discretion; and the commission reaches the limit of its power when in its downward course of reduction it reaches the point where a further descent would deprive the railroad company of a just compensation for its property."

There is no denial, and could be none, as will be evident from a slight consideration of sections 5 and 6 of the Act quoted above, that it gives discretion to the commissioners in the fixing of reasonable and just rates; and hence this qualified denial is but saying that the commission exercised its discretion to a wrongful extent. It may be granted that if, by enforcing the rates complained of, the company would have its property taken without just compensation, or would be deprived of its property without due process of law, the first would be a violation of the Constitution of the State, the second a violation of the Constitution of the United States, and that neither the Legislature nor the commission under her law could do either. But we are not at this point called upon to say whether such would be the effect of those rates, or whether the court has authority to adjudicate upon the reasonableness of the rates, or whether the judgment of the commission as to reasonableness is to be taken as conclusive. These are questions excluded from our consideration by the fact that the law refuses authority to enjoin the discretionary action of executive officers. It does not matter that the exercise of the discretion works an injustice or wrong.

In many of the reported cases (that of Towle v. State for one) the inhibition was held to apply, though the officer was legally wrong in the conclusion reached as to the rights of the party whose case was brought within his discretion; and we do not see that it makes any difference whether those rights are founded on mere legal protection or on constitutional protection. The simple test is whether the decision of the officer is one his discretion authorizes him to make; and if it is, the court is powerless to control him. Where this discretion exists, mandamus does not lie to direct the manner of its use, nor will injunction step in to control or intercept its use.

It is proper to say, however, that this restraint upon proceedings by the court does not intend a denial of the legal or constitutional rights of any person, but only that the party aggrieved must seek his redress in some other way than by a suit against the officer in fault. In the present case, for instance, if the commissioners have exercised their discretion in a manner to invade the legal or constitutional rights of the complainant, that will be available for defense in any action against said complainant founded on the violation of the regulations of the commissioners. This is clearly recognized in the case of Re Ayers, where the court, though holding the injunction against state officers restraining them from bringing suits in the name of the State to be void, intimated that rights which could not be thus enforced could be protected in defense of suits against the injured party. See opinion, 128 U. S. 494, 495 [31 L. ed. 226].

If the Act creating the commission was unconstitutional and void, it may be that the commissioners, not in such case being officers, but only individuals really unclothed with office, would be subject to suit, as a void Act could not confer any discretion on them; but its constitutionality is not contested, except against the extent of power claimed for the commission—"the power of the Legislature to create a commission with power to make schedules which shall be prima facie evidence of reasonableness of rates fixed by it," not being doubted by the company's counsel, save that "it cannot make them conclusive." In regard to this it is said that a conclusive determination of the reasonableness of rates by the commission would be the exercise of judicial power, which is prohibited by the Constitution of the State. But if this be so, it does not affect the question of the liability of those officers to the present suit. It does not remove the protection which they have by virtue of the discretion given to them to fix reasonable and just rates; a wrong exercise of that discretion, as we have said before, not varying the rule which relieves them from suit.

It is said, further, that if the power claimed is not a judicial one, then it is one that involves legislative power, and for that reason is prohibited by the Constitution of the State. If this has reference to the conclusiveness of rates, as the connection would seem to indicate, what we have just said respecting the exercise of judicial power applies equally here. But if it is meant that the power to fix rates is so far legislative that it cannot be delegated to a commission, that presents a more vital question, and, without considering whether it may be similarly disposed of, we go to its independent merits. It may be remarked in limine that the power of the Legislature to regulate and fix the charging rates of railroad companies chartered by the State, where the charter itself in a contractual view does not surrender the right to exercise the power, is not disputed; but that it is a power the Legislature may forego exercising; and when it does that it leaves its exercise to some other agency authorized by its law to act, to wit: the corporation. In many instances this is done as to all rates; and for the company before us it is done, except as to the maximum passenger rate. The regulating and fixing of rates, therefore, is not an inalienable, exclusive function of the Legislature, and if it may leave that to the corporation, why may it not delegate it to a different body? The public interest involved is the same, whether reached by the corporation or by a supervisory commission.

We are not without authority on the question. Our Act is taken almost entirely from an Act of the State of Georgia. In the case of Georgia Railroad Company v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694, the constitutionality of the latter Act was attacked, and on this subject of the delegation of authority to the commission was held not to be unconstitutional. The Georgia Constitution, like ours, gave authority to the Legislature to regulate rates. By the former, the Constitution "conferred upon the Legislature the power of regulating railroad freight's and passenger tariffs, preventing unjust discriminations, and requiring reasonable and just rates of freight and passenger tariffs." By ours "The Legislature is invested with full power to pass laws for the correction of abuses, and to prevent unjust discrimination and excessive charges by persons and corporations engaged as common carriers in transporting persons and property, or performing other services of a public nature; and shall provide for enforcing such laws by adequate penalties and forfeitures."

There is no material difference. The court says in its opinion in the case cited above that "It certainly was not contemplated that the details of rates to be fixed over the many miles of railway in the State should be settled and determined by the Legislature. The many influences that combine to cause changes in the ever varying vicissitudes of trade and travel were neither overlooked nor forgotten by that body. The utter impossibility of preparing, by the Legislature, just and proper schedules for the various railroads, with their differences of length, locality, and business, appears to us to be so clear and manifest as that to have entertained it would have been absolutely absurd. And especially so, when it is remembered that schedules, just and right where arranged for the months of winter, might be ruinously unjust and wrong for the months of summer; or that such as were proper for the year of the meeting of the General Assembly might the succeeding year well nigh bankrupt every railroad corporation in the State."

In Tilley v. Savannah Railway Commissioners, 4 Woods, 427, the same question as to the constitutionality of the Georgia Act was passed upon; the court discussing more fully the subject of delegation of authority to the commission to fix rates, and reaching the same conclusion. The reasons given are on the line of those in the Georgia case. Thus "The fixing of just and reasonable maximum rates for all the railroads in the State is clearly a duty which cannot be performed by the Legislature, unless it remain in perpetual session and devote a large portion of its time to its performance.

"The question, 'What are just and reasonable rates?' is one which presents different phases from month to month, upon every road in the State, and in reference to all the innumerable articles and products that are the subject of transportation. This question can only be satisfactorily solved by a board which is in perpetual session, and whose time is largely given to the consideration of the subject. It is obvious that to require the duty of prescribing rates for the railroads of the State to be performed by the General Assembly, consisting of a Senate with forty-four members, and a House of Representatives with 175, and which meets in regular session only once in two years, and then only for a period of forty days, would result in the most ill advised and haphazard schedules, and be productive of the greatest inconvenience and injustice in some cases to the railroad companies, and in others to the people of the State. It is impracticable for such a body to prescribe just and reasonable rates. To insist that this duty must be performed by the General Assembly itself is to defeat the purpose of that clause of the Constitution under consideration."

Under a Mississippi Statute, creating a commission with supervisory powers over railroad rates, it was held to be constitutional by the supreme court of the State, and also by the Supreme Court of the United States, although there was vested in the commission authority to regulate and change rates. Stone v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. 62 Miss. 607; Stone v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. 116 U. S. 307 [29 L. ed. 638].

The question of delegation of legislative power was not directly discussed in these cases, but was necessarily involved; and the authority given to the commission by the Act to regulate rates could not have been sustained, except upon the conclusion that such authority was constitutionally given. Other cases announcing the same conclusion are State v. R. Co. 87 N. W. Rep. 782, and Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dey, published in 35 Fed. Rep. 866.* We find no decision, and think there is no good reason to the contrary. There are cases upon similar statutes of other States where this question has been passed sub silentio, but this being only indirect support of our conclusion, these need not be cited. We hold that the Legislature, in the Act under consideration, did not delegate to the commission any power so far its own, exclusively, that it could not be delegated.

Under the views on which we decide this case, it is unnecessary to determine the other questions appearing in the record.

The bill should be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Frank J. HORNING, Appt.,

STATE, ex rel. Josiah S. GAMBLE.

(....Ind....)

1. A township trustee is the agent of his township in the transaction of its business, and acts in a fiduciary as well as an official capacity, and is amenable to the rule which forbids an agent or trustee to place himself in such an attitude towards his principal or cestus que trust as to have his interest conflict with his duty.
2. A vote by a township trustee in Indiana for himself for the office of county superintendent of schools is contrary to public policy, and for that reason an utterly illegal vote.
3. Where the announcement is made that a township trustee who has voted for himself for the office of county superintendent of schools has been duly elected, and is made upon the mistaken assumption that he had a right to vote for himself, the failure of those who had not voted for him to interpose further objection is not such an acquiescence in and tacit consent to the announcement of his election as amounted to an appointment of him to such office.

Ft. Wayne v. Rosenthal, 75 Ind. 156.

Niblack, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The proceedings in this case were based upon an information in the name of the State on the relation of Josiah S. Gamble, and against Frank G. Hornung, which caused the court below to be informed that on the first Monday in June, in the year 1885, the trustees of the several townships of the County of Fayette met at the office of the county auditor for the purpose of appointing a superintendent of the public schools for that county, and thereupon appointed the relator such superintendent; that the relator, who was at the time a citizen of the county, immediately qualified and entered upon the duties of the office; that on the 6th day of June, 1887, which was the first Monday of that month, the trustees of the several townships of said County of Fayette again met at the office of the county auditor for the purpose of appointing a superintendent of the public schools as the successor of the relator; that there were, at the time, nine, and only nine, townships in said County of Fayette, the trustees of all of which were present; that the defendant, Hornung, was then the duly elected and acting trustee of Connorsville Township, one of the townships of said county, and as such trustee was present at the last-named meeting, being also at the same time an applicant for the office of superintendent of public schools, to succeed the relator; that the trustees proceeded on the same day to determine by ballot who should be appointed to the office in question; that in casting their ballots four of such trustees voted in favor of the relator, and that the remaining four trustees other than the defendant, voted for him, the defendant; that in casting his ballot the defendant voted for himself; that the ballot so cast for himself by the defendant was counted for him by the trustees, which gave him an apparent majority of one vote; that the ballot thus cast by the defendant was an illegal vote, and ought not to have been counted for any purpose whatever; that the county auditor did not give the casting vote in favor of either one of the parties so voted for by the trustees; that the trustees thereafter adjourned, without taking any further action in the matter of the appointment of a superintendent of public schools; that by reason of the foregoing facts the defendant assumed that he had been appointed such superintendent of public schools, known as county superintendent, for, said County of Fayette, and took an oath of office, and executed an official bond, as the law required of persons appointed to that position; that on the 18th day of June, 1887, the defendant demanded the possession of the office of such superintendent, and deformed him, the relator, from the same; that the defendant had ever since intruded himself into said office, and wrongfully usurped the powers and duties pertaining thereto.

Wherefore, the defendant was required to answer by what authority he claimed to hold the possession of such office, and all other appropriate relief was invoked.

A demurrer to the information being first overruled, the defendant answers: first, in general denial; secondly, giving a history of the cause substantially the same as stated in the information, up to the time when the township trustees were about to commence to ballot for a county superintendent of schools, on the first Monday in June, 1887, and then averring that such trustees, before proceeding to ballot, selected Richard W. Sipe, one of their number, to act as chairman of their meeting, who acted accordingly, and the county auditor attended the meeting and acted as the clerk of the election; that the relator and the defendant and one other person were all applicants for the office which the trustees had met to fill; that without any formal agreement as to the manner of conducting the election, the trustees proceeded to express their individual choice as between the several applicants for the office of county superintendent of schools, by voting written ballots; that throughout thirty-five ballots the chairman, Sipe, and three others of such trustees voted for the relator, and that the defendant and three other of such trustees voted for him, the defendant; that the remaining trustees voted all the time for the other applicant above referred to; that on the thirty-sixth ballot all of the trustees voted as they had before, except that such remaining trustee voted for the defendant; that during all of the balloting the chairman and other trustees, including the county auditor, had full knowledge that the defendant was voting for himself; that after such thirty-sixth ballot was taken, Sipe, as chairman of the meeting, in the presence and hearing of all the other trustees, announced that the defendant was duly elected and appointed to said office of the county superintendent of schools; that none of the trustees made any objection to this announcement, and all acquiesced in and consented to the same; that said meeting thereupon adjourned without day; that immediately after such adjournment the county auditor, in a book kept for that purpose, made a proper record of the proceedings had by such trustees, showing that the defendant had been duly elected and appointed as such superintendent; that pursuant to such election and appointment the defendant on the 18th day of June, 1887, and after resigning the office of township trustee, took and subscribed the oath required by law, and executed an official bond, with approved freehold security, in the penal sum of $1,000, conditioned as the law prescribed; that immediately thereafter the county auditor reported to the superintendent of public instruction that the defendant had been appointed county superintendent of schools for Fayette County; that the defendant has ever since been recognized as such last named superintendent by the superintendent of public instruction; that, after executing a bond and qualifying as above stated, the defendant entered upon the discharge of his duties as such county superintendent, and has since continued in the discharge of such duties.

A demurrer was sustained to this second paragraph of answer, and a trial resulted in a finding in favor of the relator, assessing his damages at $425, and in the award of judgment accordingly.

The errors assigned upon the proceedings below, and the argument submitted in favor of the reversal of the judgment, present two questions for our decision: first, had Hornung, while acting as a township trustee, the lawful right to vote for himself for the office of county superintendent of schools, and to have his vote counted for himself in determining the result of the balloting? If not, was there such an acquiescence in, and tacit consent to, the announcement by the chairman of the meeting that he (Hornung) had been duly elected as such county superintendent, as amounted in law to an appointment to that effect?

A township trustee is the agent of his township in the transaction of its business, and hence in the performance of his duties he acts in a fiduciary, as well as an official, capacity. Therefore the rule which requires fair dealings and disinterested conduct on the part of an agent or trustee towards those he represents applies with full force to a township trustee. The law will not allow an agent or a trustee to place himself in such an attitude towards his principal or his cestui que trust as to have his interest conflict with his duty; and a township trustee is as much amenable to that rule as any other agent or trustee. As applicable to private rights, the enforcement of such a rule is imperatively necessary; and as a matter of public policy, the recognition of such a rule is of equal if not greater importance. Greenhood, Public Policy, 302.

A public officer is impliedly bound to exercise the powers conferred on him with disinterested skill, zeal and diligence, and primarily for the benefit of the public. It is also the duty of a public officer having an appointing power to make the best available appointment, and, in such a case, the right of appointment is not in any sense the property of the officer possessing the appointing power. It is the policy of the law to secure the utmost freedom from personal interest or undue influences in the selection of public officers, whether elective or appointive. Hence it is that the sale or absolute transfer of an office is prohibited, and that threats, bribery and other kindred influences used to obtain an office are made criminal; also that all contracts in restraint of the appointing power or of the elective franchise are void.

State v. Hoyt, 2 Oreg. 246, was based upon the following facts: In June, 1866, Hoyt was elected marshal of the City of Portland by the common council of that city, and entered upon the duties of the office. In July, 1867, the common council took proceedings for the purpose of electing a successor to Hoyt. That body consisted of nine members, and under the charter of the city five votes were required to elect a marshal. Rosenheim was at the time a member of the common council, and was voted for as a candidate for the office of marshal, receiving five, and only five, votes, one of which was cast by himself, and for himself. Rosenheim, claiming to have been lawfully elected marshal of the city, proceeded by information against Hoyt to obtain possession of the office. Previous to the time of the meeting at which Rosenheim claimed to have been elected, the common council had adopted a rule which was recognized as still in force, as follows: "Every member who shall be present when a question is put shall vote for or against the same, unless he be immediately interested, in which case he shall not vote." On behalf of Hoyt it was, among other things, contended that, under the operation of this rule as well as upon principles of public policy, Rosenheim voted for himself, which was an illegal vote, and that hence he did not receive the requisite number of legal votes to elect him as marshal. The court held that the rule in question was a binding rule upon the common council, and that in consequence Rosenheim's vote for himself was a nullity. Also that it is contrary to the policy of the law to permit a public officer having an appointing power to use such power as a means of conferring an office upon himself. We concur in both of the conclusions reached as above by the Supreme Court of Oregon; and consequently feel constrained to hold that Hornung's vote for himself for the office of county superintendent was contrary to public policy, and for that reason was an utterly illegal vote.

The announcement, by the chairman of the meeting at which Hornung was voted for, that the latter had been duly elected as county superintendent, was evidently made upon the mistaken assumption, but in the belief, that Hornung had the right to vote for himself if he chose to do so; and the reasonable inference from the antecedent facts is that no objection was made to, and that there was a seeming acquiescence in, that announcement by those who had voted for the relator only because Hornung had received an apparent majority of the votes cast on the last ballot.

The failure of those who had not voted for Hornung to interpose further objection to his selection ought not, under the circumstances, to be construed either into an implied or an informal vote in favor of his appointment. State v. Kilroy, 86 Ind. 118; State v. Sutton, 99 Ind. 300; State v. Porter, 12 West. Rep. 634, 118 Ind. 79; State v. Edwards, 14 West. Rep. 68, 114 Ind. 581.

A PPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Superior Court of Cook County (Shepard, J.), in favor of the plaintiff in a bill in equity to remove cloud on title. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Augustus N. Gage for appellant.

Mr. H. S. McCartney for appellee.

Oral. Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in equity, brought by Thaddeus Hampton, in the Superior Court of Cook County, against Henry H. Gage, to set aside three tax deeds as clouds on the titles to lots 36 and 37 on west half of block 1 in a certain subdivision of a certain eighty acre tract of land in Cook County.

The first tax deed named in the bill was executed on the 10th day of February, 1877, the second was executed on February 15, 1881, and the third on February 18, 1881.

The defendant, Gage, put in an answer to the bill, in which he denied complainant's title and possession and set up title and possession of the premises in himself. He alleged that he acquired color of title in good faith in 1877 while the property was vacant and unoccupied, and while it remained vacant he paid all taxes accrued on the property for more than seven years, to wit: for the years 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885 and 1886; and that afterward, and before the bill was filed, he took actual possession of the premises; and that since he took possession thereof he has continuously held the same and is now in the possession thereof.

Replication was filed to the answer, and the defendant also filed a cross bill in which substantially the same facts were set up as are contained in the answer. The complainant answered the cross bill and the cause proceeded to a hearing on the pleadings and proofs, and the court decreed in favor of complainant and dismissed defendant's cross bill.

The tax deed executed February 10, 1877, purporting to convey the premises in question to Henry H. Gage was color of title, and it is not questioned that the deed was made in good faith. When the deed was executed the premises were vacant and unoccupied, and the property remained vacant and unoccupied until September, 1887, when it was fenced by appellant.

As to the payment of taxes while the land was vacant, it is conceded that Gage proved payment for the years 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885 and 1886—five successive years, but it is insisted that the evidence fails to show payment for the years 1880 and 1881 by Henry H. Gage. We do not concur in this view. The receipt introduced in evidence for the tax of 1880 reads: "Received of Asahel Gage by H. H. Gage;" while the receipt for the taxes of 1881 reads, "Received of Asahel Gage." If the proof of payment rested alone on the words of the two receipts the position of appellee, that Henry H. Gage had failed to prove payment of taxes for the two years in question, might be sustained; but such is not the case.

Asahel Gage testified that he never paid any taxes on the property, that he never had in his possession any tax receipts for taxes paid on the property. And Henry H. Gage testified that he paid the taxes on the property from 1879 to 1886 both inclusive; that for the years 1880 and 1881 he paid the taxes. Upon cross examination the witness was asked:

"How did it happen that two of the tax receipts which were offered in evidence recited the payment of taxes by Asahel Gage, and two of them by Asahel Gage by Henry Gage?"

A. "I cannot state how the mistake occurred, or how the receipts were made out in that way. I paid, at the same time I paid these, over $1,000 for other taxes to the same collector of the West Side, and, until this case was called up, I did not find that there was any difference in the receipts—in the method of making out the receipts." Witness continues: "He has had the receipts in his possession since they were issued, paid for them with his own money."

The payment of taxes may be proven by parol evidence. Tax receipts may be explained, and if a mistake has been made in the description of the land or in the name of the person who actually made the payment, resort may be had to parol evidence to rectify such mistake. Here is the evidence of Asahel Gage, that he never paid any tax on the property; and that of appellant, who testified that he paid the taxes for the years in dispute with his own money. If these witnesses testify to the truth—and it nowhere appears that they are unreliable—the fact is beyond dispute that appellant paid the taxes for seven successive years.

In Hinchman v. Whistone, 23 Ill. 185, it was held that proof of payment of taxes may be made otherwise than by the production of tax receipts. It is there said: "No reason is perceived why the payment of taxes may not be proved . . . by the verbal evidence of a witness as well as the payment of money in any other case."

In Coleman v. Billings, 80 Ill. 185, where the

to be adverse, must be under a claim of title hostile to the right of the true owner. Possess v. Lawson, 28 Mo. 28. Title to land, under the Statute of Limitations, cannot be acquired by one who has never been in actual possession or paid taxes. Barnard v. Beecher, 71 Cal. 22. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, the title to a piece of land forming part of a larger tract, which is assumed as an entirety to the real owner, cannot be acquired by adverse possession unless the adverse claimant pays or offers to pay the taxes on the land in his possession. McNobis v. Justiniano, 70 Cal. 386. The Amendment of April 1, 1872, to Civil Code, § 282, requiring the adverse possessor of land to pay all taxes assessed thereon, in order to acquire a title by adverse possession, does not affect adverse holdings prior to the date of its passage. Heilbron v. Heinlen, 73 Cal. 374. The amendment was not retroactive, and did not at all affect adverse holdings prior to the date of its passage. Sharp v. Blankenship, 80 Cal. 388; Johnson v. Brown, 88 Cal. 391; Heilbron v. Heinlen, 73 Cal. 374. The payment of taxes on land taken in connection with an actual possession by the taxpayer and other facts in evidence, tended to show both a claim of ownership and the extent of the claimant's possession. Baum v. George, 55 Ala. 392; Jay v. Stein, 49 Ala. 514; Angell, Lim. § 282, note 6; § 287, Green v. Jordan, 55 Ala. 294. The fact that taxes had been paid, if essential to the plaintiff's claim through adverse possession, is only a matter of evidence, and not necessary to be pleaded. Ball v. Nichols, 73 Cal. 224. An adverse possession of the premises by the defendant, under claim and color of title made in good faith, with payment of the taxes assessed thereon, after the title of the heirs was perfected by congressional confirmation and before the patent issued, continued for the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations of the State, was a bar to any recovery by the heirs upon the patent. Langdon v. Hanes, 22 U. S. 21 Wall. 221 (22 L. ed. 600).

Limitation of actions to overturn tax titles. Within the proper and constitutional bounds, it is entirely competent for the Legislature to prescribe a short period—e. g., three, five or seven years—within which the courts may take cognizance of actions brought to overturn tax titles. *Thomas v. A statute requiring suit against a tax purchaser for recovery of land to be commenced

A statute requiring that "Any suit against the tax purchaser, his heirs or assigns, for the recovery of the land sold for taxes, or to defeat or avoid a sale or conveyance of land for taxes, shall be commenced within three years from the time of recording the tax deed," does not apply where the owner is in possession. *Spartock v. The Mississippi Code of 1880, § 642, which provides that "actual occupation for three years, after one year from the day of sale, of any land held under a conveyance by a tax collector, in pursuance of a sale for taxes, shall bar suit to recover such land or nullify such title, because of any defect in the sale of such land for taxes, or in any precedent step to said sale," cannot be availed of where the occupant receipts showed payment by Billings and Parsons, it was held that it would have been competent to prove (if such was the fact) that the taxes were in fact paid by Billings and the name of Parsons was by some inadvertence included in the receipt.

As the law has heretofore been settled by this court, we regard the evidence sufficient to establish seven successive years' payments of taxes by appellant. The appellant Gage having established color of title made in good faith, and seven successive years' payment of taxes on the property while it was vacant and unoccupied, the next question to be considered is whether, after the completion of the seven years' payment of taxes, he acquired possession of the land so as to bring him within the provision of section 7 of chapter 83 of the Statute entitled Limitations, which reads as follows:

"Whenever a person having color of title, made in good faith to vacant and unoccupied land, shall pay all taxes legally assessed thereon for seven (7) successive years, he or she shall be deemed and adjudged to be the legal owner of said vacant and unoccupied land, to the extent and according to the purport of his or her proper title."

It is clear from the evidence that the property was vacant until July, 1887; and on the 18th day of that month Henry H. Gage employed the surveyor of Cook County to survey the lots and put a post and four-board fence around the property. On July 28 the surveyor notified appellant that the work was done. Within a few days after appellant received the notice he went to see the property and found that the surveyor had made a mistake and fenced lots 86 and 87 on the east half of the block 1 instead of lots 86 and 87 on the west half of the block. The surveyor then made a new survey and removed the fence and put it around the lots in controversy. The fence was completed by the 10th day of September, 1887, and appellant then paid the surveyor for his labor.

Thus far there is no controversy between the parties; and it is an undisputed fact that on the 10th day of September, 1887, appellant Gage had the property in controversy inclosed with a post and four-board fence. This act of appellant gave him possession of the property under color of title, by taking possession after he had paid taxes for seven successive years while the lots were vacant; he did all the law required and his title to, and rights in, the property became fixed. He then had, not only a title which he could invoke as a shield or defensive title to protect him in the possession of that he then had two years in which to bring suit. Steeb v. Stebbins, 25 Kan. 318. But where no right is given to the owner to sue for the land when the possession is vacant, the owner cannot be out off without giving him an opportunity to show cause against the tax title. Where the actual possession of land sold for taxes was in no one, and after two years the original owner entered, it was held that the holder of the tax title could maintain ejectment, notwithstanding the lapse of the two years. Myers v. Conradt, 25 Kan. 211. The Iowa five years' Statute of Limitations applies to an action brought by one claiming under a tax deed. The party holding under the tax deed must, within five years, either himself take actual possession of the property, or bring a suit to recover possession. Barrett v. Holmes, 108 U. S. 351 (18 L. ed. 351). One who has for five years had constructive possession of unoccupied land, under a tax deed based on a taxes, may defend himself by pleading possession, as aforesaid, for seven years. Moore v. Brown, 28 U. S. 11 How. 414 (15 L. ed. 732); Meahan v. Forsyth, 65 U. S. 24 How. 175 (15 L. ed. 730).

When statute begins to run. But in some States the period of limitation does not commence to run until the delivery and recording of the tax deed. Douglas v. Tullock, 84 Iowa, 282; Edgerton v. Bird, 8 Wis. 387; Black, Tax Titles, § 220. A claim of title under a tax deed makes his possession under color of title date from the date of the deed. De Graw v. Taylor, 37 Mo. 350. And in Alabama it begins to run from the time the tax deed is executed. Jones v. Randie, 68 Ala. 385; Pugh v. Youngblood, 60 Ala. 394. In Pennsylvania it has been held that the statute begins to run from the time the purchaser takes possession, not from the day of sale. Wain v. Shearman, 8 Berg & R. 387; Cramer v. Hall, 4 Watts & S. 39, nor from the date of the record of the deed. Baldwin v. Merriam, 18 Neb. 189. But since the Act of 1884, which provides a remedy for the owner in case of a vacant possession, the limitation commences from the day of the sale. Robb v. Bowen, 9 Pa. 71; Bogers v. Johnson, 65 Pa. 68; Johnston v. Jackson, 70 Pa. 164. So in Arkansas, it begins to run from the date of the sale, whether such purchaser is in possession or not. Mitchell v. Bitter, 22 Ark. 173. In Wisconsin, a tax deed of unoccupied lands, duly recorded, draws after it constructive adverse possession of land. Coleman v. Peshtigo Lumber Co., 30 Fed. Rep. 317. The special statute (Wag. Stat. 1877, § 331, 332) has no application except where the tax deed is valid upon its face. Although void tax deeds have been held good as color of title under the general statute, the question of the color of title does not arise under the special statute, which is based upon the recording of the tax deed. Peares v. Titworth, 8 West. Rep. 373, 37 Mo. 688. In Wisconsin a void tax deed will not set the statute running in favor of the holder unless his possession is actual, open and notorious. Lain v. Roperdon, 13 Wis. 66; Cutler v. Huribut, 28 Wis. 158; Lindsay v. Fay, 35 Wis. 462. In Iowa the occupant who has been in possession under claim of title for the requisite period, with or without a deed, is protected. Hamilton v. Wright, 30 Iowa, 465. Where one, having entered upon land as a mere intruder, records a tax deed, it is equivalent to a new entry under claim of title and from that time his claim is adverse and the statute runs in his favor. Hinkley v. Dester, 13 Ill. 708; Moss v. Spear, 35 Cal. 84; Downman v. Cockrill, 8 Kan. 311. Blackwood v. Van Vleet, 30 Mich. 118; Link v. Doerfer, 48 Wis. 386; Jones v. Davis, 24 Wis. 229; Whitney v. Gunderson, 33 Wis. 388; Frents v. Klotsch, 33 Wis. 419.

of law by unfounded and protracted litigation until the statute has run against him, he is not without remedy in a court of equity. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Dico, 14 Fed. Rep. 422. Where the purchaser goes into possession, continues to hold the land, and pays taxes thereon for seven years, he will be protected, although the deed is void on its face. Dalton v. Lucas, 61 Ill. 307. Under the Illinois Statute, a defendant in ejectment who has been in possession of the land by actual residence thereon, having a connected title in law or equity, deducible from the State or the United States, or from any person authorized to sell the land for nonpayment of the lots, but, if another should, by some means, obtain possession of the property, he had a title under which he might sue and recover the possession of the property.

This is not a new question in this court. In Hale v. Gladfelder, 53 Ill. 91, a title acquired in the same manner as appellant acquired his title was fully considered, and it was there held that where the bar of the statute has become complete, under the second section of the Act of 1839 (which is section 7 of our present Limitation Act), by the concurrence of claim and color of title acquired in good faith, payment of taxes for seven successive years under such color of title and the actual taking of possession of the premises, such bar can be used as a shield to protect the possession against everyone; and if the possession be invaded or the premises again become vacant and another make entry, even if the latter hold the paramount title, the holder of the color of title may sue and recover his lost possession.

The bar of the statute having become complete, the right of the person entitled to its benefits to have and enjoy the possession is as perfect as though he were actually invested with the title; and as against him the holder of the paramount title cannot use it for the purpose either of recovery or defense.

The same doctrine was announced in the late case of McDuffee v. Sinnott, 7 West. Rep. 695, 119 Ill. 450. It is there said: "In view of the repeated decisions of this court it would be a fruitless consumption of time to enter upon a discussion of the cases decided outside of this State, for, whatever the rule may be elsewhere, it is now well settled in this State that whenever the bar of the statute has become absolute and the party entitled is in possession under it, it is thereafter just as available for attacking as for defensive purposes; and its availability in this respect will not depend at all upon the occupant continuing in the actual possession of the property. His rights in that respect are precisely the same as those of any other absolute owner of land. He can vacate it or occupy it, just as convenience or interest may dictate." It will not be necessary to cite other cases in this State on the question as the law is too well settled to admit of controversy.

It appears, however, from the evidence, that in the latter part of December, 1887, appellee or his agent visited the property and, as they claim, found the most of the fence on the north and east side of the lots gone, but on the south and west sides the fence was mainly standing as originally erected. Finding the property in this condition appellee refenced it, using that portion of the fence and material which had been put on the property by appellant, and supplying enough other material to make a good and substantial fence.

The act of refencing the property conferred no rights upon appellee. As has been heretofore said, when Gage, in September, 1887, fenced the property he lawfully acquired the possession thereof; that possession was never relinquished or abandoned, and no person had any right to invade that possession. When the agent of appellee visited the property in December, 1887, although some of the fence had been torn down by some unauthorized person, there was enough to notify him that the property had been reduced to possession by another.

It is not necessary that a man should live on property in order to obtain or hold possession of it. Possession of land may be acquired and held in different modes; by inclosure, by cultivation, by the erection of buildings or other improvements, or in fact by any use that clearly indicates an appropriation to the use of the person claiming to hold the property. Truesdale v. Ford, 87 Ill. 210.

When appellee saw that the property had been reduced to possession by another, by inclosing it with a fence, he had no right to interfere in any manner whatever with the possession of the property. His entry was that of a wrong-doer; he was a trespasser. Lee v. Mound Station, 6 West. Rep. 829, 118 Ill. 319.

If he claimed the title when he found the lots in the possession of another, his remedy was ejectment. Where the title could be settled in a court of law, surely he could not lay a foundation for a bill in equity by unlawfully invading the possession of another; equitable rights cannot be acquired in that way.

In Comstock v. Henneberry, 66 Ill. 218, where a bill in equity was filed by one in the actual possession of the land for equitable relief, as it appeared that the possession was obtained unlawfully and forcibly it was held that he could not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong, and that he would be treated in equity as out of possession.

In Hardin v. Jones, 86 Ill. 818, where a bill was filed to quiet title, the doctrine of the case supra was approved and it was held that the possession that confers jurisdiction must have been acquired in a lawful way. If obtained by violence or by the use of unfair or corrupt means a court of equity will not lend its aid.

Gage v. Williams, 6 West. Rep. 477, 119 Ill. 564, is cited and relied upon by appellee as an authority to sustain his position. The facts in that case, however, are so different from the facts shown here that the decision can have no bearing. There the property was in possession of Goslee through whom the complainant derived title as early as 1869, and one Ben Allen had charge of the property for Goslee from 1869 to the winter of 1885. In 1881, while Ben Allen occupied the relation of tenant, he took a lease from the appellant in the case; a leasing by the tenant of Goslee from a stranger could not lawfully deprive Goslee of his possession. Moreover, if the appellant in the case cited ever had possession there was evidence that such possession was abandoned.

Reliance is, however, placed by appellee on the case of Fort Dearborn Lodge v. Klein, 3 West. Rep. 88, 115 Ill. 177. We do not think that case has any bearing here. There is but one question decided in that case; that is, the plea of liberum tenementum is a proper plea in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and that it was error to instruct the jury to disregard such a plea. As a technical rule of pleading the doctrine of the opinion may be sustained; but it was not intended by that decision to overrule the former decisions of this court where questions similar to the one involved in this record were presented, nor was it supposed that the case had any bearing upon such cases. The doctrine of this court is uniform that a man cannot take the law into his own hands and regain by force a possession on which he may be entitled to recover in an appropriate action.

Allen v. Tobias, 77 Ill. 169, is a case in point. It was there held, where a party's land is in the actual possession of another, even though unlawfully, he has no right forcibly to repossess himself, but must resort to the action of forcible entry and detainer or the action of ejectment.

It is there said the fence inclosing the disputed ground was placed there by appellant, and by the structure he was in the actual possession of the premises and entitled to hold the possession until a better title should be shown.

It was this fence the defendants in a forcible manner broke down and destroyed, and the plea is, it was their property. This may be; and if it was, the law has provided abundant means through and by which they could assert their rights.

They could have brought an action of forcible entry against appellant, or ejectment, and had no right to use force to repossess themselves. It was to prevent such conduct as is here recorded against appellees that the Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer was passed.

In Reeder v. Purdy, 41 Ill. 279, upon a careful review of the authorities, it was held that the common-law right to enter and use all necessary force to obtain possession from him who may wrongfully withhold it has been taken away by our Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer. It was also held that any entry was forcible, within the meaning of the statute, that is made against the will of the occupant. See also Page v. Du Puy, 40 Ill. 508, and Dearlove v. Herrington, 70 Ill. 251.

When appellees found that appellant had fenced the property and had thus reduced it to possession he had no right, against the will of appellant, to invade that possession; but if he claimed title and the right of possession it was his duty to bring an appropriate action in which the title or right of possession might be determined.

The judgment of the Superior Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

William LEVERING.

(....Mass....)

1. A plaintiff in a suit for malicious prosecution upon a criminal charge may show his general good reputation known to the defendant when the prosecution was commenced as tending to show that the prosecution was without probable cause.

2. Testimony of statements tending to show the guilt of accused, made by witnesses to the justice who issued the warrant in a criminal case in the absence of the one making the complaint, is not admissible in favor of the latter in a subsequent suit brought against him for malicious prosecution by the person arrested.

3. Evidence in an action for malicious prosecution, that defendant had stated before the complaint was made that he had heard that the person upon whose statements he acted in commencing the prosecution had been in jail, may properly be allowed to go to the jury as tending to show how far defendant was warranted in believing the statements and how far he did in fact believe them.

ON defendant's exceptions. Overruled.

This was an action for malicious prosecution. Defendant's premises were forcibly entered and a quantity of his wines and liquors feloniously stolen and carried away. Defendant made oath to a complaint before Emery Grover, Esq., a trial justice, charging plaintiff with said larceny. She was arrested and afterwards found not guilty and discharged, after which she brought this action.

At the trial in the superior court before Thompson, J., plaintiff was permitted to show, against defendant's objection, her general reputation in the community for honesty of character.

The defendant's evidence tended to show that on July 27 he was absent, and that upon his return on the morning of July 28, one Madden, his hired man, informed him that his, Madden's, wife had confessed to him that she, in company with the plaintiff and another, had broken into the premises and stolen the said wine; that one Hewett, a boy, also informed him that he saw an axe, which was found on the premises, in the hands of the plaintiff's daughter on said day; that said Madden and Hewett went to the office of said justice on said July 28, and related said facts and confession, and that said justice informed Madden that the defendant was the proper person to make complaint, which Madden communicated to the defendant; whereupon he appeared, July 29, before said justice and swore to the said complaint, said Madden and Hewett being present.

The defendant offered to introduce as testimony, and to show by said Emery Grover, Esq., as part of his case, the statements of said Madden and Hewett to the said justice on said July 28, but such statements were excluded by the court, not being made in the presence of the defendant; whereupon the defendant excepted thereto.

In rebuttal, and against the defendant's objection, the plaintiff was allowed to put the following question to the plaintiff's husband, who was a witness:

Q. In conversation with Levering, defendant, before the complaint, did he say that he had heard that Mrs. Madden had been in Dedham jail? A. Yes.

To which question and answer the defendant excepted.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

Mr. T. J. Morrison for defendant.
Mr. Henry F. Naphe for plaintiff.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is some conflict of authority as to the competency of evidence of the reputation of the plaintiff in a trial of an action for malicious prosecution. There are many cases in which it is held that in actions of this kind, as in actions of slander, the general bad reputation of the plaintiff may be shown in mitigation of damages. There are also decisions that in suits for malicious prosecution such reputation may be shown to meet the allegation of want of probable cause. Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 241; Pullen v. Glidden, 68 Maine, 559; Barron v. Mason, 31 Vt. 189; Rodriguez v. Tadmire, 2 Esp. 721; Gregory v. Thomas, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 286; Boatick v. Rutherford, 4 Hawks (N. C.) 83; Gregory v. Chambers, 78 Mo. 294; Rosenkrans v. Barker, 115 Ill. 331, 3 West. Rep. 433.

But the cases do not go so far as to permit proof of particular instances of bad conduct. In determining whether there is probable cause for a prosecution for the commission of a crime, the known character or general reputation of the person suspected is always an element of some importance; for, as was said by Chief Justice Shaw in Bacon v. Towne, ubi supra: "The same facts which would raise a strong suspicion in the mind of a cautious and reasonable man against a person of notoriously bad character for honesty and integrity would make a slighter impression, if they tended to throw a charge of guilt upon a man of good reputation."

In a suit of this kind, where the prosecution complained of was for an offense implying moral turpitude, the plaintiff's general reputation at the time of the prosecution, if the defendant was where he would be likely to know it, is always involved in the issue, and the defendant may properly be permitted to show that it was bad. We see no good reason why the plaintiff should not be permitted, on the other hand, to show affirmatively that it was good. It is true that everyone is presumed to be of good character until the contrary appears, and this presumption ordinarily saves the necessity of proof. Indeed, in civil cases, as a general rule, evidence of reputation is not competent upon a question as to liability for a particular act. But whenever character is in issue the rule is different.

One charged with a crime is not obliged to rest upon a presumption of good character. In favorem libertatis he may prove the fact, if he can, by a weight of evidence far more effective than any mere presumption. A plaintiff in a suit for a malicious prosecution upon a criminal charge has the burden of proving that the prosecution was without probable cause. In defending against the prosecution he would have had the right to show his good reputation although his character was not attacked otherwise than incidentally by the prosecution itself. The same incidental attack upon his character necessarily appears in the suit for the malicious prosecution. To prove that the attack was originally made without probable cause, we think he should be permitted to show his good reputation known to the defendant when the prosecution was commenced.

In several of the States there are adjudications to this effect. Woodworth v. Mills, 61 Wis. 44; Blizzard v. Hays, 46 Ind. 166; Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575; Miller v. Brown, 3 Mo. 127; Scott v. Fletcher, 1 Overton (Tenn.) 433. The defendant's exception to the admission of this kind of evidence must be overruled.

Testimony of statements by Madden and Hewett, to the justice who issued the warrant, made in the absence of the defendant, was rightly excluded. The statements cannot be treated as facts tending to show the plaintiff's guilt and competent as evidence for that purpose, which the defendant may be presumed to have known, even though his knowledge of them is not distinctly shown: See Bacon v. Towne, ubi supra. They are mere declarations of third persons, which do not appear to have been communicated to the defendant, and which have no bearing upon either of the questions at issue in the case.

The third exception presents a question of more difficulty. To show that the prosecution was not without probable cause, the defendant relied upon a statement of Mrs. Madden, communicated to him by her husband, that she, accompanied by the plaintiff and another, broke into the defendant's premises and stole his wine. It became a question for the jury to determine how far the defendant was warranted in believing her statement, and how far he did in fact believe it.

It is quite clear that it would not be competent to attack the credibility of a witness in a trial, by proving that he had been confined in jail, or that he had been guilty of any unlawful or criminal act. Nothing less than proof of conviction of a crime would be admissible. But this rule rests upon considerations of public policy which forbid the introduction of evidence of particular acts, involving a trial of new and unexpected issues, for which the opposing party could not be expected to be prepared. There can be no doubt that one's known acts of misconduct, indicating his character, may properly be considered in determining his credibility.

A witness was permitted to testify that the defendant, before the complaint was made, said "that he had heard that Mrs. Madden had been in Dedham jail." If that statement tended to show, as against the defendant, that she was less credible than other persons, it was competent evidence upon the question whether there was probable cause for the prosecution. If it had no proper bearing upon his credibility, but at the same time indicated distrust of her on the part of the defendant, it was competent on the question whether the prosecution was malicious.

It may be argued with much force that one who should say colloquially of another, that he had been in jail, would probably mean that he had been there under such circumstances as to affect his reputation, and to indicate that he was untrustworthy. So, to say of another that one has heard that he has been in jail implies some degree of credence in the story.

The evidence in the present case seems to have been of little importance. Yet it purported to show what was in the defendant's thoughts before the complaint was made. Upon the facts disclosed we cannot say that the jury might not properly consider it.

Exceptions overruled.

2. The words, in a contract for the sale of sugar to be shipped from a foreign port, "the sugars to be thoroughly sampled and tested on arrival" will not imply a stipulation on the part of the sellers to assume any risk as to its condition or quality upon arrival at the port of destination.

(February 27, 1880.)

ON plaintiffs' exceptions. Overruled.
The action was contract to recover damages for an alleged breach of warranty as to the test and color of 1200 tons of Manilla sugar, sold by defendants to plaintiffs. Trial was had in the Supreme Judicial Court before Allen, J., where the jury returned a verdict for defendants; and plaintiffs alleged exceptions.

NOTE.—Sale; completion of contract by delivery. Delivery is complete upon execution of contract. Gutzmer v. Moyer (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 489. Where the goods are to be forwarded by a carrier, the vendor must enter them so that the carrier may be responsible for their value if lost. Clarke v. Hutchins, 14 East, 475. If the goods are to be delivered at a stipulated place, the vendor before suing for the price must tender them there (Neill v. Whitworth, 18 C. B. N. S. 485, L. R. I. C. P. 684); unless, indeed, the vendee has refused, or put it out of his own power to complete his contract. If there be no stipulated place, it is the vendee's business to fetch them. Glazebrook v. Woodrow,

The facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Chas. Theo. Russell, Jr., for plaintiffs.

Mr. L. S. Dabney for defendants.

Morton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract between the parties is in the form of a letter written at Boston by the agents of the defendants, addressed to the plaintiffs. The material parts of it are as follows: "We have made sale to you of 1200 tons extra Manilla sugars, about No. 9, D. S. in color, at 10.10 per ton f. o. b.; and we understand it is your intention to load same on The Republic on her arrival at Manilla. It is further understood that the sugar is sold on a basis of 88° pol'r with 8 d per cwt per degree downward and fractions of a degree in proportion. The sugars to be thoroughly sampled and tested on arrival. In due season we shall expect satisfactory banker's credits at 6 mos. to be forwarded to our friends at Manilla by cable."

Under this contract the defendants delivered free on board The Republic at Manilla 1200 tons of sugar which, as the jury have found, was equal to the test and standard required in the contract, if that test and standard is to be applied to the sugar at Manilla. But, upon the arrival of the ship in New York the sugar was sampled and tested and it was found that it failed to test 88 degrees by the polariscope, and was not equal in color to extra Manilla sugar about No. 9 Dutch standard.

There was evidence tending to show that most cargoes of sugar coming from Manilla lose some weight during the voyage and are more or less sweated even if there is no actual contact with salt water, and that in this case the sugars were sweated and some salt water penetrated through the deck of the ship; that they were exposed to wet when discharged, and thereby lost in strength and color.

The only question now presented to us is whether the standard guaranteed in the contract is the standard and quality of the sugar as it was upon its delivery on board the ship in Manila, or the standard in New York after its arrival. The question is not free from difficulty; but upon the whole we are of opinion that, as was ruled at the trial, the defendants fulfilled their contract when they delivered at Manila, sugar of the color and strength specified therein, and that they are not responsible for any risks of the voyage which caused a deterioration of the sugar. Both parties agree, and it is clear that upon the delivery of the sugar on board the ship and the payment for it the property in it passed to the plaintiff.

It is equally clear that the defendants did not assume any risks of damage to the goods by the perils of the sea. It was a sale of certain goods of a specified quality at Manila and not at New York. The nature and scope of the transaction being that of a completed sale of goods which were to be exposed to the perils of the sea and other risks of a long sea voyage, and which were taken entirely out of the custody or oversight of the sellers, it is not to be presumed that they assume any risks of its future condition, unless there be an express and clear stipulation to that effect.

The plaintiffs contend that such a stipulation is implied in the words, "the sugar to be thoroughly sampled and tested on arrival." This is certainly not an express stipulation that the sugar, upon arrival in New York, shall be of a specified quality. It cannot be claimed under this clause that if the goods were damaged by a peril of the sea, the defendants would be responsible. It does not import a warranty against damage by perils of the sea; and we cannot see that it necessarily or reasonably imports a warranty against damage from wet weather or from sweating or other causes of deterioration operating during a long voyage. The clause in question seems to be an independent clause, inserted probably because it was thought important or desirable that the parties should know the condition of the sugar upon its arrival. Such knowledge might be important in case of any controversy as to the condition of the sugar when shipped. But whatever the reasons for its insertion we cannot reasonably construe it as importing a stipulation which is contrary to the spirit and scope of the contract which contemplated a sale and delivery at Manila.

Exceptions overruled.

James BUCK, Admr. of George H. Bennett, Deceased.

1. In an action for damages for causing the death of a person, a general averment

NOTE.—Damages for death caused by negligence; action statutory. In England and Pennsylvania the action is given for the benefit of the immediate family of the deceased, to the exclusion of the next of kin, and includes only husband and wife, parents and children. Pa. R. Co. v. Keller, 67 Pa. 300. As the remedy exists, and is created only by statute, it follows that it can only be pursued in the mode and under the conditions specified therein. 3 Wood, Railway Law, 1531. If the statute provides that the action shall be brought by the executor or administrator of the deceased, no other person can maintain an action; Wilson v. Bumstead, 12 Neb. 1; Nash v. Tousey, 25 Minn. 5. And if the damages recovered are for the benefit of the husband, widow, parent or next of kin, the declaration must allege the fact, and the existence of such beneficiary, as, if no beneficiary survives the deceased, no recovery can be had. Schwarz v. Judd, 25 Minn. 371. Where the statute is for the benefit of the husband, widow, parents, and the children of the parent killed, only one action can be maintained. Houston & T.C.R. Co. v. Moore, 49 Tex. 81; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. LeGierse, 51 Tex. 189. In order to uphold an action, the injury must have been inflicted under such circumstances that the deceased, if he had survived the injury, could have maintained an action. Quincy Coal Co. v. Hood, 77 Ill. 68. There can be no recovery of substantial damages in the absence of any evidence of any considerable expense, loss or damage incurred between the time of the injury and the death. Tully v. Fitchburg R. Co. 134 Mass. 499. The fact that death and the injury were not simultaneous must be proved by the plaintiff; and 3 L. R. A.

that his widow and child, for whom the action is prosecuted, sustained damages in a specified sum, is not insufficient in respect to their pecuniary loss, where the complaint alleges that the deceased was in the employ of the defendant, which was a railroad company, as a brakeman, that he left a widow and one child four years old; as it is an unavoidable inference that he was in the vigor of manhood and at the time engaged in earning money for their support.

The same rules of evidence prevail that would if the action was brought by the deceased himself, and the negligence of the company must be established as fully in the one case as in the other. an action for negligently causing the death of a brakeman by failure to furnish safe appliances, on the ground that he was killed on Sunday while working in violation of the Sunday Law.

2. A railroad company is liable for negligence in permitting a car to be used from which the reach rod was absent from the brake beam in front of the wheels, causing the beam to hang lower and more forward than it otherwise would have done, making it dangerous to brakemen going between cars to uncouple them, where the absence was known, or might have been known, to the company.

A brakeman on a railroad train is not chargeable with contributory negligence in going between cars to uncouple them, by reason of the absence of the reach rod from the brake beam on one of them, which was not known to him and was not obvious, and could not have been discovered except by stooping down and looking under the car.
5. Where the material facts to show the liability of a railroad company were a hidden or latent defect in a car by the absence of a reach rod from a brake beam, which increased the ordinary and obvious perils of the service of a brakeman, and its agency in producing an injury, a special verdict which shows the manner in which the accident and injury occurred and the condition of the car and appliances, need not be required to describe the appliances.

Parsons v. Mo. Pac. R. Co. 12 West. Rep. 615, 94 Mo. 286. In an action by the widow of a switchman who was killed while climbing upon the switch engine, by the breaking of a rod alleged to have been negligently allowed to get out of repair, it is not error for the court to instruct the jury that if defendant was negligent plaintiff should recover such damages as the jury deem a fair and just compensation, having reference only to pecuniary injuries, other instructions negating the right to recover if deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The party injured is presumed to have been duly careful until the contrary is proved. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 400. The question of contributory negligence, in an action for damages against a railroad company, is generally a question for the jury under proper instructions; and when so submitted the verdict is conclusive on that point. Herbert v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 3 Dak. 88.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Buck, as administrator of the estate of George

H. Bennett, deceased, commenced suit against the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago Railway Company, alleging that the company had wrongfully caused the death of the decedent, to the damage of his surviving widow and child.

The complaint was in three paragraphs. It is charged in the first two paragraphs that the intestate was in the employ of the railway company as brakeman, and that he was fatally injured while uncoupling cars, on account of dangerous and defective appliances and machinery which the company negligently supplied. The same facts, substantially, were stated in the third paragraph, with the addition that the accident and fatal injury to the plaintiff's intestate was caused by the careless and negligent habits and by the incompetency of the engineer who had control of the engine at the time the accident happened, and that the incompetency and negligent habits of the engineer were known to the company and unknown to the intestate.

No question is made as to the sufficiency of the complaint, except it is urged that it does not sufficiently appear by any averment therein that the widow or child of the decedent sustained damage in any wise on account of the defendant's negligence.

The averments in the complaint relevant to the point thus made are that Bennett was in the employment of the defendant as brakeman at the time of his death, and that he left surviving him, as his next of kin and only heirs, his widow, Fidella J. Bennett, and his daughter, Longretta May Bennett, both of whom are still living—the latter being four years of age. It is also averred that "Said administrator brings this action for the use and benefit of said widow and child, who, by reason of the death of said decedent, as aforesaid, have sustained damages in the sum of $10,000."

For the appellant it is insisted that the general averment that the widow and child of the decedent had sustained damages in a specified sum was not sufficient, but that the pecuniary loss, either present or prospective, resulting to them from the intestate's death should have been specially pleaded. Reagan v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 51 Wis. 599, is relied on to sustain the view thus contended for.

Without pointing out the distinction between the case cited and that under examination in respect to the question involved, it is sufficient to say it appears in the complaint in the present case that the decedent was at the time of his death in the employ of the railroad company as a brakeman, and that he left a widow and one child four years old. It is an unavoidable inference, therefore, that he was in the vigor of manhood, and that he was at the time engaged in earning money for the support of his wife and child. Kelley v. Chicago etc. R. Co. 50 Wis. 881.

Section 284, Revised Statutes 1881, gives a right of action to the personal representative for the benefit of the widow and children or next of kin of one whose death has been caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, provided the former could have maintained an action against the latter had he lived. While there is some discord in the decisions of courts in respect to the right to maintain the action, even for nominal damages, without averring and proving actual pecuniary loss by those for whose benefit the suit is brought, there can be no doubt but that, within the rule generally prevailing, the law will imply substantial pecuniary loss in some amount to the wife and child from the death of one who sustained the relation of husband and father to them, and who was at the time presumably receiving wages, and who was therefore possessed of the ability to discharge his obligation to support those dependent upon him. Atchison etc. R. Co. v. Weber, 83 Kan. 543; Houghkirk v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 92 N. Y. 219; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 187.

Whatever the rule may require as applied to other cases, and in respect to the quantum or character of proof on the subject of pecuniary loss, there can be no doubt but that a general averment of damages in a case like the present is sufficient as against a demurrer to the complaint. It may be well to observe here, as applicable to this question, which is presented in another aspect later on in the record, that no precise rule for estimating the loss recoverable under the statute can be laid down. When the relation of the party whose death has been caused, to those for whose benefit the suit is being prosecuted, has been shown, and his obligation, disposition and ability to earn wages or conduct business, and to care for, support, advise and protect those dependent upon him, the matter is then to be submitted to the judgment and sense of justice of the jury. Howard Co. v. Legg, 98 Ind. 523; Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 29 N. Y. 282; Castello v. Landwehr, 28 Wis. 522.

The jury returned a special verdict, which so far as they are material to the questions for decision, exhibited the following facts:

The deceased, a man about thirty years of age, in good health, and of industrious habits, was in the employment of the defendant railway company as brakeman on a freight train. On Sunday night, November 25, 1883, the train of which he was one of the crew left Michigan City for LaFayette. Between 9 and 10 o'clock the train was stopped at the crossing of the Pan Handle Railroad for the purpose of taking on more cars. It was part of the duty of the decedent to couple and uncouple cars which were to be attached to or detached from the train. Soon after the train stopped, he went in between the engine and the car attached to it for the purpose of uncoupling the car from the engine. The car was loaded with lumber, and belonged to the defendant company, but the decedent had never seen it until after it was loaded, when starting from Michigan City. The reach rod which, when properly adjusted, held the brake beam in place, was, and had been for several days, absent from the brake beam, in front of the wheels on the car next the engine. The absence of this rod was unknown to the decedent, but the jury find that it was or might have been known to the defendant. Its absence caused the beam to hang lower and more forward than it otherwise would have done; but the fact that the rod was gone was not discoverable except by one stooping down and looking under the car.

While attempting to uncouple the car, being for some reason unable to get the coupling pin out of the draw bar, the decedent held the pin up as far as he could get it, and then signaled the engineer to move the engine forward. The engineer obeyed the signal, but immediately, and without warning, reversed the lever, and threw the engine back, crowding the decedent against the car, and then again moved forward. While so crowded back, and before he could recover or extricate himself from his position, the decedent's feet were caught by the defectively attached brake beam, and he was thrown under and run over by the car, which was moving forward. In this way he received injuries which are particularly described, and which resulted in his death the following morning. It was found that the decedent left a widow and child, as alleged in the complaint, and that they were damaged by his death in a specified sum. There was judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

The appellant insists that the judgment ought to be reversed, and urges as one of the reasons that the jury found that the injury which resulted in the intestate's death was received on Sunday, while he was engaged at common labor in pursuance of a contract with the railway company, and that it was not made to appear that the work about which he was engaged was a work of necessity.

We had occasion to consider this question in Louisville Railway Company v. Frawley, 7 West. Rep. 44, 110 Ind. 18, where it was presented in substantially the same manner as in the present case. Our conclusion there was that a person injured by the negligent omission of another to perform a legal duty would not be denied a recovery even though it appeared that the injured person was, at the time of receiving the injury, acting in disobedience of his collateral obligation to the State, which required of him the observance of the Sunday Law. If the railway company violated its duty by furnishing machinery and appliances which it knew were defective, the danger to an employé who was required to use the appliances in ignorance of their defective condition, was the same on one day as on another. That they were being used on Sunday rather than on Monday neither contributed to, nor was it the efficient cause of, the injury which gave rise to this action; nor can the railroad company now interfere and become the champion of the Sunday Law as an excuse for its wrong, or to defeat a recovery. Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 28.

It is quite true that a plaintiff will in no case be permitted to recover when it is necessary for him to prove his own illegal act or contract as a part of his cause of action, or when an essential element of his cause of action is his own violation of law. Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198; Coppel v. Hall, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 568 [10 L. ed. 245]; Steele v. Durkhardt, 104 Mass. 59; McGrath v. Merwin, 112 Mass. 467.

But where he can prove his cause of action without proving that he was violating the law, even though it appears incidentally that he was at the time acting in disobedience of some statute, unless his illegal act was the efficient or proximate cause of the injury complained of, or unless the illegal act or contract is the foundation of his action, a recovery may be sustained nevertheless. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 178, 179.

Whoever travels about from place to place for the purpose of gaming, with cards or otherwise, acts in violation of a criminal statute. It would hardly be claimed that a recovery against a common carrier would be denied if it appeared incidentally in evidence that a passenger injured through the carrier's negligence was traveling in violation of the statute against gaming. Why should a brakeman who is required to work in violation of the Sunday Law be denied a recovery? The gist of the action in the present case is the negligent failure of the railway company to furnish safe and suitable appliances, whereby the death of the plaintiff's intestate was wrongfully caused while he was in the company's service as a brakeman. The contract of employment and the time when the injury occurred were mere incidents to, and were in no respect the foundation of, the action. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley, supra; Frost v. Plumb, 40 Conn. 111, 18 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 537.

It may be conceded that the decisions in some of the States are not all consistent with the conclusions above stated; but in our opinion these conclusions are in accord with the better view of the subject, and have the support of the weight of authority.

The defendant presented to the court forty-three separated instructions, and asked that they be given the jury. Of these, twenty were given and the balance refused. The refusal to give these instructions is made the ground of complaint. It has frequently been ruled that where the jury has been required to return a special verdict, general instructions as to the law of the case are not proper. The court should explain to the jury distinctly what facts are material to be found within the issues, and give them such instructions as will enable them to find and settle the facts, so that the law may be applied to the facts found by the court. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley, supra; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Flanagan, 12 West. Rep. 190, 118 Ind. 488.

Within this rule, an examination of the instructions given by the court leaves no doubt that the jury were adequately directed in respect to the facts necessary to be covered by the special finding. Leaving out of view all of the facts found relating to the alleged negligence and incompetency of the engineer, and eliminating from the special verdict everything in the nature of conclusions of law, and it seems to us the facts found make a case justifying a recovery. They show that the railroad company failed in its obligation to supply its employé with safe and suitable appliances and machinery to do the work required of him, and that it required him to use machinery which it knew to be defective. This established the company's negligence. The special verdict also shows that the defect in the machinery was unknown to the decedent; that it was not obvious, and could not have been discovered except by stooping down and looking under the car. This showed that the employé was not guilty of contributory negligence in going in between the cars to uncouple them, notwithstanding the defective condition of the appliances. It is settled beyond controversy that railroad employés are presumed to understand the nature and hazards of the employment when they engage in the service, and that they assume all the ordinary risks and obvious perils incident thereto. Such risks are presumably within the employé's contract of service. Jennet Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy, 18 N. E. Rep. 80 (present term).

This does not mean, however, that the latter may not repose confidence in the prudence and caution of the employer, and rest on the presumption that he has also discharged his duty by supplying machinery free from latent defects which expose the employé to extraordinary and hidden perils. Indiana Car Co. v. Parker, 100 Ind. 181; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 218 [25 L. ed. 612].

While the employer may expect that an employé will be vigilant to observe, and that he will be on the alert to avoid, all known and obvious perils, even though they may arise from defective tools and machinery (Atlas Engine Works v. Randall, 100 Ind. 298), yet the latter is not bound to search for defects, or inspect the appliances furnished him to see whether or not there are latent imperfections in or about them which render their use more hazardous. These are duties of the master, and unless the defects are such as to be obvious to anyone giving attention to the duties of the occasion, the employé has a right to assume that the employer has performed his duty in respect to the implements and machinery furnished. Brailbury v. Goodwin, 6 West. Rep. 590, 108 Ind. 286; Litt's Rock etc. R. Co. v. Leverett, 48 Ark. 333; Fit. Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 38 Mich. 133; Hughes v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 27 Minn. 187; Wood, Master & S. § 376.

The facts found very clearly furnish a basis for the application of the foregoing principles; and these principles, when applied to the facts found, sustain the judgment of the court upon the special verdict. Many of the instructions asked would, if they had been given, necessarily have required the jury to return very much of the evidence as part of their special verdict, while others would have required the statement of mere conclusions which the jury could not properly draw. For example, in one of the instructions the court was asked to require the jury to find what was the proximate cause of the death of Bennett. In another, the court was asked to require the jury to describe in their verdict the appliances attached to the car for the purpose of braking it. The facts showing the manner in which the accident and injury occurred, and the condition of the car and the appliances attached having been particularly found and set out in the special verdict, it became a question for the court to determine whether or not the intestate's death was proximately caused by the negligent omission of duty on the part of the railroad company.

We are unable to perceive how the court would have been aided in arriving at a correct conclusion, if the jury had been required to describe the appliances in their verdict. The material facts in that connection were that there inhered in the appliances a hidden or latent defect, which increased the ordinary and obvious perils of the service in which the intestate was engaged, and which made them an efficient agency in producing the fatal injury.

We have examined the other instructions asked and refused, and, without commenting upon them in detail, we need only say the court committed no error in refusing them.

It is contended that the court erred in overruling a motion made by the appellant for a venire de novo. In this we do not concur. It must now be accepted as settled that a special verdict will not be considered as so uncertain, ambiguous, or defective as that no judgment can be rendered thereon, because some of the issues in the case are not affirmatively or expressly settled or determined thereon one way or the other. If the verdict is silent concerning any of the facts in issue, the court will assume, upon a motion such as that under consideration, that the party upon whom rested the burden of proof in respect to those facts failed to prove them. If the failure to find the facts was contrary to the evidence, it may furnish a sufficient reason for a new trial; but the failure does not render the special verdict objectionable, nor does it afford any ground for a venire de novo. Glantz v. South Bend, 8 West. Rep. 646, 106 Ind. 305; Deeter v. Sellers, 102 Ind. 458; Mitchell v. Colglazier, 4 West. Rep. 476, 106 Ind. 464.

It may be conceded that there are some merely evidentiary facts found in the special verdict, and that it also embraces many statements which are essentially conclusions of law. Notwithstanding all this, it seems clear to us that, stripped of all these, the verdict is yet sufficient to lead up to and support the judgment, and that the motion cannot be successfully urged on that account.

Questions are made and discussed concerning the propriety of rulings of the court in admitting evidence tending to show that the engineer who had the engine in charge at the time the decedent was injured was negligent and incompetent. According to our view of the case, there was no reversible error in any of these rulings, for the reason that the special verdict sustains the judgment, even though all the facts pertaining to the competency or conduct of the engineer be eliminated from the case. While we have discovered no error in the rulings, we do not regard them as of sufficient materiality to justify us in prolonging the opinion by setting them out separately, and examining them in detail.

The only other question which requires consideration relates to the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence certain declarations of the decedent which were made immediately after he was injured, and substantially while he was being extricated from under the wheels of the car which had passed over him. The conductor of the train testified that he was on the caboose when he received notice that the decedent was hurt, and that he immediately ran forward and found him under the rear end of the second car from the engine.

The following is the testimony of the conductor upon which the objection is predicated: "When I took him out I asked him, 'How did this happen?' He told me that he was uncoupling the engine from the first car, but could not get the pin clear out of the draw bar, and had to hold it up, and halloed to the engineer to go ahead. He started, and by some cause 'threw the engine over' and came back against him before he could get out, and crowded him back against the car, and the brake beam, catching his leg, pulled him down, and the cars ran over him."

It is not always easy to determine when declarations having relation to an act or transaction should be received as part of the res gestæ, and much difficulty has been experienced in the effort to formulate general rules applicable to the subject. This much may, however, be safely said: that declarations which are the natural emanations or outgrowths of the act or occurrence in litigation, although not precisely concurrent in point of time, if they were yet voluntarily and spontaneously made so nearly contemporaneous as to be in the presence of the transaction which they illustrate and explain, and were made under such circumstances as necessarily to exclude the idea of design or deliberation, must, upon the clearest principles of justice, be admissible as part of the act or transaction itself. Toledo & W. R. Co. v. Goddard, 25 Ind. 185; Lund v. Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. 41; Com. v. McKee, 3 Cush. 181; Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 73 Ga. 217; Travelers Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 397 [19 L. ed. 487]; People v. Simpson, 48 Mich. 474; Keyser v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 10 West. Rep. 648; Kirby v. Com. 77 Va. 681; Galveston v. Barbour, 62 Tex. 172; State v. Horan, 82 Minn. 394; Little Rock etc. R. Co. v. Leverett, supra; State v. Ah Loi, 5 Nev. 99; Hanover R. Co. v. Coyle, 55 Pa. 396-402; Durkee v. Central Pac. R. Co. 69 Cal. 533; Lambert v. People, 29 Mich. 71; Hill v. Com. 2 Gratt. 594; Jordan v. Com. 25 Gratt. 945; Harriman v. Stowe, 57 Mo. 97; Entwhistle v. Feighner, 60 Mo. 215; Elkins v. McKean, 79 Pa. 501; Hart v. Powell, 18 Ga. 689; Driscoll v. People, 47 Mich. 413; Casey v. N. Y. Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 518; McLeod v. Ginther, 80 Ky. 399; 1 Whart. Ev. §§ 258-267.

Any other rule would, in many instances, operate to defeat the accomplishment of justice by excluding evidence of the most trustworthy character. While some of the cases cited above carry the doctrine to its extreme length, they all illustrate and apply the general principles consistent with the conclusions we have heretofore enunciated.

The declarations under consideration were made within not to exceed two minutes of the occurrence, while the declarant remained in the presence of the train, and the alleged defective machinery which was instrumental in producing his hurt, and before he had been removed from the spot where he received his fatal injury. The surrounding circumstances, in the presence of which the declarations were uttered, were therefore silent witnesses in corroboration of his statement. This, taken in connection with the condition of the decedent, who was suffering under the shock of an injury from which he died in about six hours afterwards, necessarily excludes the idea of calculation or ability to manufacture evidence for future purposes. The court committed no error in admitting the evidence.

There are a number of incidental questions of minor importance presented and discussed by counsel; but, so far as they are material to the case as we have felt constrained to consider it, they have all been disposed of by what has preceded.

Without entering upon a detailed examination of the evidence which tends to support the verdict, we content ourselves with saying that, while some of the criticisms of counsel seem plausible, and carry with them much force, we are nevertheless constrained to hold, since there was some evidence which the court and jury, whose duty it was to judge of its weight and credibility, accepted as sufficient, that the judgment cannot now be disturbed.

The judgment is therefore affirmed, with costs.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Fountain Circuit Court (Robb, J.), sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action to enjoin the sale of certain real estate. Reversed. The facts are fully stated in the opinion. Messrs. J. E. Schoonover and J. McCabe & Son for appellant. Mr. G. W. McDonald for appellees.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by Rebecca Royal against the Aultman-Taylor Company, of the State of Ohio, and Perry Glascock, Sheriff of Fountain County, to enjoin the defendant from selling certain real estate alleged to belong to the plaintiff.

It appears from the complaint that on the 11th day of November, 1881, the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land in Fountain County, and that she conveyed it by warranty deed to George W. Hyatt on the date above mentioned, subject to certain conditions, which are recited in the deed. The conditions were, in effect, that Hyatt should pay to the grantor the sum of $50 on the first day of March of each year, for and during the term of her natural life. It was further stipulated that, in case Hyatt thereafter failed, for the period of three consecutive years, to pay the sum of $50 annually, then the grantor might revoke the conveyance by repaying the amount theretofore paid, and by executing and placing upon record in the recorder's office of Fountain County a written declaration revoking the deed.

It was further recited in the deed that, upon the making and recording of such declaration, and the repayment of the money paid, the conveyance was to become null and void, and the title was to revert to the grantor. It is averred that while Hyatt so held the title, the Aultman-Taylor Company recovered a judgment against him, upon which execution had been issued and placed in the hands of Glascock, as Sheriff of Fountain County. It was also averred that the sheriff had levied upon and advertised the land conveyed to Hyatt by the plaintiff, upon the conditions above mentioned, for sale, and that the sale was fixed for the 4th day of April, 1885.

The complaint charged that Hyatt had wholly failed to make any payments, as required by the terms of the deed, and that the plaintiff had demanded of him "more than once a year each year after the date of said deed" that he make payment of the money due her on account of the provisions written in the deed. It is averred, further, that the plaintiff, on the 16th day of March, 1885, executed and placed upon record a written revocation of the deed to Hyatt, agreeably to the stipulations therein written. A copy of the deed, and the subsequent revocation thereof, are made part of the complaint.

The only question involved in the present appeal relates to the propriety of the ruling of the court below in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. It is conceded that the deed created in the grantee an estate upon condition subsequent, and that the estate created was liable to be defeated upon the failure of Hyatt to pay according to the condition in the deed.

The contention in support of the ruling below is that, inasmuch as by the stipulation in the deed the grantee was required to pay the grantor $50 annually on the first day of March, and since it was further stipulated that in case he should fail, for three consecutive years, to make payment, "then the said Rebecca Royal may revoke this deed," it was therefore necessary, in order to render the condition available, that the grantor shall have gone upon the land on the first day of March each year, and demanded payment of the amount due, and that upon the third successive default she must then have revoked the deed. In short, the argument is that there could be no forfeiture without making a demand of payment on the day each payment fell due, and that the right of revocation was limited by the word "then," so that if it was not exercised immediately after the third consecutive demand and refusal the right was forever waived. We do not concur in this view.

It is quite true that it may be regarded as in some sense a general rule that a forfeiture cannot be insisted upon, unless the party entitled to take advantage of the condition first demands performance of that upon which the continuance of the estate depends. Lindsey v. Lindsey, 45 Ind. 552; Cory v. Cory, 86 Ind. 567; Ellis v. Elkhart Car Works Co. 97 Ind. 247.

This rule applies in the class of cases where the performance of the condition depends upon something to be done by the party entitled to insist upon performance, or upon his election or pleasure, or upon facts or circumstances peculiarly within his personal knowledge. In other words, where it in any way depends on the pleasure of the party for whose benefit the condition is to be performed in what manner or at what time a thing shall be done, or whether it shall be done at all, the party to be benefited must request performance. Whitton v. Whitton, 88 N. H. 127.

Where, however, the continuance of an estate depends upon the performance of a specified act, which is to be done at a fixed time, no demand is necessary; because the party bound has equal knowledge of the thing to be done, and of the time when it is to be done. He must therefore tender performance at his peril, or make it appear that performance has been expressly waived. Ellis v. Elkhart Car Works Co. supra; Rouell v. Jewett, 69 Maine, 298; Whitton v. Whitton, supra; 1 Shars. & B. Lead. Cas. Real Prop. 145.

While a condition may be waived by a party who has the right to avail himself of it, mere indulgence or silent acquiescence in the failure to perform is never construed into a waiver, unless some element of estoppel can be invoked. Carbon Block Coal Co. v. Murphy, 101 Ind. 115, and cases cited.

It is apparent that the inducement or consideration upon which the deed in the present case was made was the agreement of Hyatt to pay the grantor a specified sum of money annually, during the period of her natural life. The estate of the grantee was dependent upon the condition that he pay a certain sum on a fixed date each year; and it was stipulated that, in the event of failure for three consecutive years, the conveyance might be revoked, and the estate reverted in the grantor in a specified manner. This agreement was neither unreasonable nor opposed to public policy, nor was it repugnant to the estate created. The parties had therefore the right to make it. It was written in the deed, which was presumably in the grantee's possession. It was not necessary, therefore, that there should have been notice or a demand for payment in order to apprise the grantee of the thing to be done, or of the time when it was to be done. If there was a waiver of performance by express agreement, or if the plaintiff is in any way estopped to avail herself of the forfeiture, the facts must be made to appear by answer.

The judgment of the Aultman-Taylor Company was a general lien on the actual interest of Hyatt in the real estate in question. It cannot stand in the way of the enforcement of whatever rights the plaintiff may have had as against her grantee. The complaint stated facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to relief.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

ST. JOHNSBURY & LAKE CHAM- PLAIN R. CO.

v.

Andrew J. WILLARD.

1. Where a railroad company took title to a portion of mortgaged premises, from one who acquired title by adverse possession subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, and the mortgage was thereafter foreclosed by a suit in which the validity of such title could have been litigated but was not,—held, that the company was estopped by the decree of foreclosure, from setting up the title so acquired by it, in a proceeding thereafter instituted by it to condemn the mortgaged land to railroad uses.
2. Improvements made for a public use by a railroad company lawfully in possession with the right to condemn for such use at any time, do not belong to the owner of the land, and the value thereof will not be allowed him as damages on condemnation.
3. The maxim Quotquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, does not apply in such a case.

PETITION for the appointment of commissioners to assess the value of land taken for railroad purposes. Heard on commissioners' report at the June Term of the Caledonia County Court, 1886, Ross, J., presiding. Judgment for the defendant to recover of the petitioner the sum of $60 with interest from July 1, 1880. Exceptions by the defendant. Judgment reversed and amended.

The commissioners reported that the value of the entire five and one fourth acres taken for railroad purposes was, at the time of the hearing in 1885, $125; that the value of the smaller parcel, being five and one fourth acres less the three and one fourth acres conveyed by Hovey, was $60; and that the value of both parcels was the same July 1, 1890, when the petitioner took possession.

Mr. Andrew J. Willard, defendant, pro se:

1. The commissioners have no jurisdiction to determine the title to the premises.

Cent. Vt. R. Co. v. Woodstock R. Co. 50 Vt. 452, 459.

The petitioner is estopped by the foreclosure proceedings.

2. When the decree in those proceedings became absolute the petitioner lost all its rights of all kinds in the premises; and the defendant was entitled to recover as damages the value of the premises as they stood, including the betterments, at the time of the appraisal in 1885.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1869 Trudell mortgages to Brown. In 1871, the mortgage being overdue, but the mortgagor being still in possession, the Essex County Railroad Company, by virtue of some arrangement with the mortgagor, the terms of which do not appear, and with the knowledge of the mortgagee, but, as far as appears, without any agreement with him, enters upon the land in question, and surveys, locates and constructs a railroad across the same, and puts it in operation.

In 1864 Hovey is in adverse possession of three and one fourth acres of the five and one fourth acres in question, parcel of the mortgaged premises, and continues in such possession until he thereby acquires title thereto, which title he conveys to the Essex County Railroad Company; all which is after the execution of the mortgage, and before the St. Johnsbury & Lake Champlain Company succeeds to the rights, title and privileges of the Essex County Company on July 1, 1880, and goes into the possession and operation of the road. In 1888 the defendant becomes the owner of the mortgage, and forecloses it against the mortgagor and the St. Johnsbury & Lake Champlain Company, and obtains a final decree in December, 1884, and is put into possession in February, 1886, by virtue of a writ of possession; whereupon the St. Johnsbury and Lake Champlain Company brings this petition to condemn the land.

No question is made in argument as to the validity of the original mortgage in respect to the three and one fourth acres, on the ground that at the time of the execution of the mortgage they were in the adverse possession of Hovey; but the question of defendant's right to damages therefor is left to stand upon the effect of the decree irrespective of that consideration; and the question is, Does that decree, excluding that consideration, estop the petitioner from now setting up the title acquired from Hovey? The petitioner does not really claim that it does not. It certainly does if the validity of that title could have been litigated in the foreclosure suit. And it could have been; for, as the original validity of the mortgage as to this land is not questioned, the case stands in this behalf, and perhaps would stand any way, like the ordinary case of a title acquired after the execution of a mortgage that extinguishes the mortgage lien; and such titles may be the subject of adjudication in a suit to foreclose. Wilson v. Jamison, 36 Minn. 59, 1 Am. St. Rep. 635, with note.

The remaining question relates to the amount of damages.

The defendant claims that inasmuch as his decree became absolute, it was effective to give him the title to the corpus of the railroad itself; and that in this proceeding he is entitled to its value as damages as well as to the value of the land taken for its construction. He also claims that the Essex County Company was a trespasser when it entered and constructed its road, and invokes the doctrine of the common law, that structures placed upon land by a trespasser inure to the benefit of the owner of the land.

But the company was not a trespasser as to either the mortgagor or the mortgagee—not as to the mortgagor, for he consented to the entry and construction of the road; not as to the mortgagee, for as to third persons a mortgagor in possession is regarded as the owner, and the mortgagee as having only a lien or security. Cooper v. Cole, 88 Vt. 185.

The effect of the decree of foreclosure was to cut off the right of redemption and thereby convert defendant's conditional title into an absolute title; but in other respects the rights of the parties were left to be determined by the deed. Carpenter v. Millard, 88 Vt. 9.

Hence, as far as the defendant's title is concerned, the case stands as it would had the mortgage been an absolute deed when it was given, with the mortgagor's consent to entry and construction effective to shield the company from being a trespasser as to anyone.

It comes to this, then: a railroad company, instead of exercising its right of condemning land for its road, enters upon it by consent of the owner and constructs its road, but never acquires title or pays for the land damages or makes any agreement in respect thereto, and, with matters standing thus, operates its road for more than fifteen years without objection by anyone, and now for the first time institutes proceedings to have the land condemned to public use.

In the circumstances it is clear that the owner is not entitled to the improvements, and cannot have their value as damages. He has no claim in justice to have expenditures for such a purpose inure to his benefit. He is entitled to be paid the damages he has sustained, and nothing more. The maxim, Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, does not apply. That maxim has always had exceptions, and they increase with the ever varying necessities and exigencies of society.

The improvements in question were made for a public use by one lawfully in possession with the right to condemn to such use at any time; and herein lies the distinction between this case and Price v. Weehawken Ferry Co. 81 N. J. Eq. 81, relied upon by the defendant. In that case the company had no right to take the land on compensation; and the court said that therefore the maxim above referred to applied, but said it does not apply when the right to take exists. N. Hudson Co. R. Co. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 454; Chief Justice v. Nesquehoning Valley R. Co. 87 Pa. 28, and Jones v. N. O. & S. R. Co. 70 Ala. 227.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for the defendant for $125, and interest thereon from July 1, 1880, the time when the petitioner took possession.

Reed, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and defendant Wakefield entered into a contract for the sale by the former to the latter of the real estate in question, it being a farm of 200 acres in Monona County. By the terms of the agreement Wakefield assumed an indebtedness of $1,400, which was secured by a mortgage on the premises. He also agreed to convey to plaintiff 820 acres of land in Woodbury County, and to pay him $1,700 in three payments, which he was to secure by a deposit of collaterals.

At the time of the transaction plaintiff and his wife executed a deed of the premises, which they acknowledged before Wakefield, who was a notary public. No person was named in the deed as grantee, the agreement being that Wakefield should fill the blank by inserting the name of the person to whom he might sell the place.

At that time Wakefield was indebted to Charles Tabor in the sum of $1,700, and, being unable to pay the amount on the day it was due, he inserted Tabor's name in the deed, and delivered it to him as a security. In a few days, however, he paid the indebtedness, and Tabor delivered the deed to him. He then erased Tabor's name and inserted that of defendant Henry Cooper and delivered the deed to him. The transaction between him and Cooper will be more fully noticed hereafter. On the day of the transaction he delivered to plaintiff three notes of one L. L. Scott, amounting to $1,700, which were secured by a second mortgage on real estate; and some days afterwards, plaintiff being dissatisfied with the security, he gave him a bond, by which he undertook to convey to him an additional eighty acres of land, the object of the transaction being to give plaintiff additional security for the

The fact that, at the time the grantor in a quitclaim deed executed it and left it with his agent for delivery, the name of the grantee and the amount of the consideration were not written in does not render the deed void, where the agent had the authority to fill out the blanks in a certain way, and did so fill them out before the deed was delivered. McClung v. Steen, 32 Fed. Rep. 373. In Iowa the court said the doctrine that authority cannot be conferred by parol rests largely, if not entirely, on the common-law doctrine in relation to instruments under seal; and that as the rules of law as to seals have been abolished in the State, and a seal was unnecessary to the validity of the deed, it would seem that as the reason for the rule had ceased the rule itself should no longer prevail. *Swartz v. $1,700. At the time of the transaction he also gave him a bond binding himself to convey the Woodbury County land on the first of March, 1886, at which time plaintiff was to surrender possession of the premises in question. He held title bonds for the Woodbury County land, and the purchase price had not all been paid at that time.

These facts were known to plaintiff when he entered into the contract; and it was the understanding that Wakefield should pay the balance due on the land, and obtain a conveyance before the time agreed upon for the execution of the deed to plaintiff. Wakefield, however, had deposited the title bonds with a bank as collateral security for a debt he was owing it; and some time after the transaction with plaintiff, by an arrangement between him and the bank and Cooper, the latter assumed the indebtedness to the bank, and the bonds were transferred to him as collateral security. Wakefield was indebted to him at the time in a considerable sum, and the principal object he had in view was to obtain security for that debt—the value of the collaterals being in excess of the debt to the bank assumed by him.

Wakefield also held a title bond for the eighty acres, which he undertook to convey to plaintiff as additional security, and the bond was transferred to Cooper in the same transaction. Cooper subsequently either sold the bonds or paid the money due thereon, and obtained conveyances of the property, and has disposed of it; so that Wakefield is not now able to perform his undertaking to convey to plaintiff. Neither has he paid the mortgage on the farm, or any part of the $1,700, which he agreed to pay plaintiff. The Scott notes also were worthless, and Wakefield is understood to be insolvent. These facts afford the ground for plaintiff's claim for a rescission of the conveyance.

It was practically conceded on the argument that if there were no intervening rights they would, as against Wakefield, afford ground for rescission. At least the claim was not disputed by counsel, and for the purposes of the case its correctness may be conceded. But Cooper claims to be an innocent purchaser of the property; and in view of this claim it becomes necessary to consider the transaction in which the deed from plaintiff was delivered to him. Before doing that, however, it is proper to say that the transaction between plaintiff and Wakefield was an absolute sale of the property. It was only as to the undertakings of the latter that the contract remained executory, and as against him plaintiff is entitled to rescission on the ground solely that he has put it beyond his power to perform the undertakings on his part which were the consideration for plaintiff's agreement.

It may be conceded that the deed, while it remained in the condition in which it was when delivered to Wakefield, was not effective, and did not convey the title. But it was the distinct understanding of the parties that Wakefield might fill the blank by inserting the name of the purchaser from him, and deliver it to such purchaser; and when he inserted Cooper's name, and delivered the instrument to him, he acted in pursuance of that agreement, thus performing the very act which the parties intended should be done, with the object of accomplishing the purpose they had in view when they made the agreement, viz.: the transferring of the title to the purchaser. This court has frequently held that the vendor will not be permitted, under such circumstances, to question the title of an innocent purchaser for value. Owen v. Perry, 25 Iowa, 412; Clark v. Allen, 34 Iowa, 190; Swartz v. Ballou, 47 Iowa, 188.

It is true that in each of those cases the defendant was a subsequent grantee, claiming under the one whose name was inserted in the deed after it passed from the hands of the grantor; and he was protected on the ground that he was an innocent purchaser from one who, as a consequence of the plaintiff's act, was apparently clothed with a title. But in a case like the present, where there was an express authority to insert the name of a subsequent purchaser, and deliver the instrument to him for the purpose of passing the title to him, and that authority was unrevoked, the equities in his favor, if he is a purchaser without notice and for value, are equally as strong.

We come, then, to the question whether Cooper stands in that position. Some time before the transaction between plaintiff and Wakefield the latter had purchased a tract of land from Cooper. A conveyance of the land was executed and delivered by Cooper, and Wakefield gave him a mortgage back to secure $2,800 of the purchase price, but neither of these instruments had been recorded. Wakefield sold the land to one Smith, and, under an arrangement entered into by the parties, the deed from Cooper to Wakefield, and the mortgage from the latter, were destroyed, and Cooper deeded directly to Smith, who paid the purchase price to Wakefield. It was in that transaction that the deed from plaintiff was delivered to Cooper. There is a conflict in the evidence as to the purpose of that delivery. Cooper claims that the transaction was an absolute sale of the property in question to him, and so testified. Plaintiff pleaded that the deed was delivered as a mere security, and Wakefield testified that the transfer was intended merely as a security for the $2,800 due for the land sold to Smith, and the other indebtedness he was owing Cooper.

So far as the principal question in the case is concerned, viz.: as to whether the deed should be canceled, it would make no difference which of these claims is correct; for, as Cooper relinquished the security he then had for the $2,800 due him from Wakefield, in consideration of the transfer, he will be protected, if he had no notice of plaintiff's claim, whether it was intended as an absolute sale or merely as a security. In the latter case he is a mortgagee for value, the surrender of the former security constituting the consideration, and is entitled to the same protection as an absolute purchaser. But in view of the fact that in a cross petition he demanded judgment for possession of the property, and for the rents and profits, plaintiff having refused to surrender possession, we are required to determine the question.

It must be admitted that upon the evidence the question is not free from doubt. But upon a careful consideration we have reached the conclusion that there is a fair preponderance in favor of the claim that the transfer was intended as a security; and we deem it unnecessary to do more than to state our conclusion. A discussion of the evidence would not be profitable, nor would such discussion be a matter of any interest, either to the parties or the profession.

Having reached that conclusion, the only question remaining is whether Cooper had notice of the circumstances out of which plaintiff's right arises when he accepted the security; and it is only necessary to say that the evidence is overwhelming that he did not. Indeed, plaintiff did not learn that Wakefield had pledged the title bonds as security to the bank until after the transfer of the land to Cooper, and he took no steps to terminate the transaction until after that. The transfer of the bonds to Cooper was a subsequent transaction, and was entirely distinct from that in which the land was conveyed to him. He probably had knowledge of the terms of the contract between plaintiff and Wakefield when he accepted the bonds, but the prior transaction with reference to the land is not affected by that knowledge. Neither is he chargeable by plaintiff's possession of the property with notice of the right he is now asserting; for when he took the land plaintiff was entitled to possession under his contract with Wakefield, and he was then asserting no other right.

A purchaser is bound to take notice of the right under which one in possession claims; but that is the extent of the rule. He is not chargeable with notice of a right or claim not asserted, or one which may subsequently accrue. As Cooper is but a mortgagee, he is not entitled to possession, or the rents and profits, but is entitled to have his lien preserved.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

William WEEKS

v.

Abial TRASK.

(.....Maine.....)

Making a claim to land and erecting a fence thereon, after an award by arbitrators as to the boundary line, finding that the land belongs to the adjoining owner, does not constitute a breach of a stipulation in the submission "to abide by and perform the award," for which assumpsit will lie; but the remedy is by an action of tort.

ON defendant's exceptions, from the Supreme Judicial Court, Lincoln County. Sustained.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by William Weeks against Abial Trask, in which the plaintiff declared on an agreement entered into by him and the defendant, to refer their differences as to the true boundary line between adjoining lands and mutual claims of trespass thereon, to arbitrators. After setting out the agreement, and the making and publishing of the award, the declaration alleges:

"Said defendant then and there neglected and refused to abide by and perform said determinations and awards of said referees, and still neglects and refuses . . . whereby said defendant has become liable to pay to said plaintiff the sum of $300 as liquidated damages," etc.

The plaintiff set out the following breaches of the award: "1. That heretofore, to wit: on the 8th day of September, A. D. 1883, and after the said award was made to the parties thereto agreeably to the terms of the submission, and notice thereof had been duly given to and received by them, the said defendant, without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, entered upon the land of the plaintiff easterly of and bordering upon the division line between the plaintiff's land and the defendant's land, as established by said award, and about four rods easterly of said division line, and then and there upon the plaintiff's said land built a fence about 180 rods long, and the defendant then and there claimed that the land upon which said fence was so built was his own land, in violation and disregard of the award aforesaid, by which award said land upon which said fence was so built was determined and decided to be the land of said plaintiff; and in violation and disregard of the division line between the lands of the plaintiff and the defendant as determined and established by said award. 2. That defendant joined in a deed to a third party of a portion of the land which had been decided by the award to belong to plaintiff. 3. That the defendant heretofore, to wit: on the 8th day of September, A. D. 1883, ignored and disregarded the division line determined and established by said award as aforesaid, by then and there crossing easterly over and across said line, and claiming that the division line was to the eastward of the line established by said award, in violation of said award."

The defendant filed a special demurrer, assigning, among others, the following causes:

1. That in and by said declaration the said Abial Trask is not charged with doing any act which by the alleged agreement and awards set forth in said declaration he was restrained or prohibited from doing, nor with neglecting or refusing to do any act which he was by said alleged agreement or awards required to do.

2. That it appears by said declaration that if the said William Weeks has any cause of action against the said Abial Trask, as therein alleged, the same is by an action of trespass or writ of entry, and not in assumpsit.

3. That the alleged agreement set forth in said declaration is unconscionable, without consideration, and void.

5. That the controversy related to the title and possession of real estate not described or located in the agreement or awards.

6. That the boundary line was not so defined and described as to be capable of location upon the face of the earth, and was not designated by any permanent, definite and ascertainable monuments or objects.

"8. That the said alleged agreement and award as sought by the said declaration to be applied to the alleged causes of action therein set forth is against public policy, in restraint of the legal and constitutional rights of the parties, and in derogation of the authority and jurisdiction of the courts."

The demurrer, having been joined, was overruled by the court; and defendant alleged exceptions.

Mr. G. B. Sawyer, for defendant:

This award did not settle the boundary any more effectually, or give to the parties any greater rights, than would be done and given by deeds of conveyance or partition.

Goodridge v. Dustin, 5 Met. 868.

That being accomplished the submission and award have performed their office and the parties are left to their ordinary remedies at law for the protection of their several possessions.

Jackson v. Gager, 5 Cow. 888; Sellick v. Addams, 15 Johns. 197.

A submission covers only matters in dispute, doubt or controversy between the parties at the date of its execution.

Thrasher v. Haynes, 2 N. H. 429.

Messrs. H. Ingalls and W. H. Hilton for plaintiff.

Virgin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Assumpsit to recover $800 as liquidated damages for the alleged breach of a written agreement "to abide and perform an award" by which the arbitrators found and established the division line between the adjoining tracts of lands of the parties. It is well settled that a published award, made under a written submission giving authority "to find and establish the boundary line between the adjoining lands of different proprietors, is conclusive on the parties, and they are estopped thereby to dispute it when thus established." Tyler v. Dyer, 18 Maine, 46; Sweeney v. Miller, 84 Maine, 888; Buck v. Spofford, 85 Maine, 526; Goodridge v. Dustin, 5 Met. 868; Thayer v. Bacon, 8 Allen, 163; Searle v. Abbe, 18 Gray, 409; Shaw v. Hatch, 6 N. H. 162; Russell v. Alard, 18 N. H. 222; Orr v. Hadley, 86 N. H. 575; Marshall v. Reed, 48 N. H. 86.

Moreover a controversy as to the location of the division line between adjoining lands necessarily involves the title of the strip of land lying between the two lines claimed by the respective parties. And though the award does not attempt in terms to transfer from one party to the other the intervening strip, nevertheless, without making any new line, it does "find and establish"—that is, ascertain and confirm what was before doubtful—the pre-existing line, on the respective sides of which the parties had held the title ever since they became the proprietors of the adjoining lots. Searle v. Abbe, supra.

Furthermore, the particular locality of the line upon the face of the earth having been thus ascertained and fixed, transit in rem arbitratum. Duren v. Getchell, 55 Maine, 241, 249.

Thenceforth, relying upon the finality of that line through the estoppel of the parties to deny it and its necessary consequences, a writ of entry might be maintained by either party against the other who should disavow the demandant of his land bordering on it (Goodridge v. Dustin, supra); or trespass would lie against whichever of the parties committed acts of trespass on the other side of the line. Sellick v. Addams, 15 Johns. 197; Shaw v. Hatch, supra.

Assuming, then, that the declaration sufficiently alleges that the defendant's acts complained of were committed upon the land, the title to which was in controversy until the award virtually determined it to be in the plaintiff, the demurrer directly presents the question whether the defendant's going upon the land after the publication of the award, and then and there, in disregard of the award, erecting the fence and claiming the land as his own, constitute a breach of his stipulation in the submission "to abide by and perform the award" for which assumpsit will lie; or whether the plaintiff must resort to his action of tort for remedy. This precise question has been decided in New Hampshire, where it was held that entering upon the disputed land, removing the stone monuments erected by the arbitrators to designate the division line found and established by their award, and denying that to be the true line, did not constitute that to be a breach of the arbitration bond conditioned "to abide by and perform the award."

Richardson, Ch. J., said the words "abide by" did not mean to acquiesce in, but simply to await the award without revoking the submission, adding: "The award is conclusive between the parties, and the defendant may be liable in trespass for what he has done." Shaw v. Hatch, supra.

A like view was adopted in Marshall v. Reed, 48 N. H. 86.

Doubtless a revocation of the authority of the arbitrators before the award is made is a breach of such a stipulation. King v. Joseph, 5 Taunt. 452; Brown v. Leavitt, 26 Maine, 251.

So is putting it beyond the power of the arbitrators to make an award—as the marriage of the female party. Charnley v. Winstanley, 5 East, 266; or preventing one of the arbitrators from taking part in an award as to costs which were a part of subject referred. Quimby v. Meloin, 35 N. H. 198.

So is refusing to pay money in accordance with the award. Thompson v. Mitchell, 35 Maine, 281; Plummer v. Morrill, 48 Maine, 184.

Also refusing to do any act other than the payment of money required by the award, such as transferring a piece of a vessel; and when the submission is not under seal, assumpsit will lie. Gerry v. Eppee, 62 Maine, 49, 51, 52.

To "abide the order of the court," in a hasty proceeding, said Shaw, Ch. J., means "to perform," "to execute," "to conform to." Hodge v. Hodgdon, 8 Cush. 294, 297.

A docket entry under an action at law "to abide the decision" in a certain equity suit has been held to mean, not that the action at law should be dependent on the final determination of the suit in equity, but that so much of the issue as was common to both should be decided in the former the same as in the latter. Hodges v. Pingree, 108 Mass. 585.

The debtor's stipulation in his bail bond "to abide, do and perform" the judgment, "means," said Peters, J., "to submit to; to stand to; or to abide. The words are an useless iteration, employed to add force and expression to the idea conveyed by the words "to abide." Hewins v. Currier, 62 Maine, 236, 237.

While these illustrations show that these words take some shade of meaning from the subject matter with which they are connected, our opinion is that in cases of this sort they mean in substance that the parties will not in any wise revoke or prevent the making and publication of the award; that when made and published it shall be final; and that they will perform any act required by the award, which is within the scope of the authority conferred on the arbitrators by the submission. The award in this case having been made in pursuance of the submission, leaving nothing to be done by either party, the submission and the award, like a deed of partition, have performed their office; and whatever controversy the parties may have subsequently had in relation to the premises, the ordinary remedies at law afford to each ample redress. Exceptions sustained.

Lacy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of Alexandria, rendered on the 30th day of March, 1887.

The suit was brought by the appellant, James A. Marshall, for himself and on behalf of the other creditors of the appellee corporation, "The Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank of Virginia," a broken bank, to reduce into possession and distribute amongst said creditors the assets of the said bank, and to charge the individual defendants, who were the officers and directors of said bank, with the difference between the assets and liabilities of the said bank, upon the ground that the said directors had not had a meeting for at least one year prior to the first day of December, 1876, the date of the suspension and failure of the said bank, and for at least one year prior to the ascertainment of the embarrassed condition of said bank, which occurred some time before its said suspension; and that they did not give that care, supervision and attention to the business affairs of said corporation which the duties of the office and the nature of the trust reposed in them required, but, on the contrary, neglected the same and intrusted entirely the business concerns of the bank to the president and one, and possibly two, directors, who recklessly and improvidently loaned the money and securities of the said defendant corporation to various embarrassed and insolvent corporations, firms and individuals without taking proper and sufficient security for the protection of the depositors and creditors of the said bank, and being themselves connected with or interested in said embarrassed and insolvent corporations; by reason of which said conduct upon the part of said directors the appellant insists that heavy losses had fallen upon the bank, and that the said directors are individually and personally liable to the depositors and creditors of the said bank for the losses so occasioned by the neglect of the duties of their office as directors.

The bank answered the bill of the plaintiff through its president, and the directors answered individually, wherein negligence is denied; and it is also denied that the business of the bank was intrusted wholly to the president, but it is admitted that "instead of regular formal weekly meetings of the board, as prescribed by the by-laws of the bank, informal meetings were substituted, it being proved, soon after the bank went into operation, that formal weekly meetings were unnecessary."

The questions involved were referred to a commissioner in chancery for examination and report.

The commissioner reported that the said directors not only did not exercise ordinary care and diligence, but that they were guilty of gross negligence:

First, that the board of directors only met in 1878 three times; in 1874 twice; in 1875 once; in 1876 twice; in 1877 five times; in 1878 once. Second, that from the organization of the bank down to its suspension, December 1, 1876, there never was an examination made by the board of directors, or by any committee appointed by them, of the books, papers, funds, stocks or bonds of the bank, or statement called for from other banks of the account of the said The Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank with them. Third, that, notwithstanding the fact that a committee was twice appointed for the purpose, an examination was never made of the books, and no report ever made or called for from the committees appointed. Fourth, that the president, without authority, took from the cash drawer, from time to time, sums of money aggregating $2,187.83, leaving nothing but tickets for the said sums of money; that in 1874 the said president caused McKim & Co., of the City of Baltimore, to sell the coupon bonds issued by the said The Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank and deposited with the said McKim & Co., and appropriated the proceeds to his own private use, and never made any entry on the books of the bank prior to September, 1876, overdraw his account $341.64, and in other ways converted to his own use the property of the bank—said several sums aggregating $11,713.97. That the directors negligently failed to look at the books, into the cash drawer, or exercise any care whatever to discover these things; and when at last the facts did come to their knowledge, they did not remove, but continued, this president, and allowed him to manage the books of the bank almost alone. Fifth, the account of the Alexandria Passenger Railway Company, which had this same president of the bank for a time, and a director of this bank for its president afterwards, whose treasurer was the cashier of this bank, was overdrawn $11,841.91, which was decreased by crediting notes aggregating $6,500, which were neither paid nor renewed; and the overdraft continued to increase until the suspension of the bank, which was at that time $7,580.45, but was manipulated so as to make it appear to be only $674.58. Sixth, that one P. B. Stilson, borrowed $2,000 by depositing the notes of one J. A. Clark for $4,000, secured by a deed of trust in Maryland, and also the notes of one B. G. Daniels. The Clark note was perfectly good, and in November, 1873, Stilson was allowed to withdraw it, and only leave the Daniels notes, which were perfectly worthless. Seventh, that the Washington & Ohio Railroad Company, whose president was for some years one of the directors of this bank, was loaned, on May 8, 1872, $5,000, without a meeting of the board; and when the whole balance on hand was $9,373.98; July 5, 1873, $3,000 was lent, when only $6,396.71 was on hand; and on July 17, 1872, $5,000 was lent, when only $3,238.47 was the balance on hand. That nothing was ever paid on these notes until the appointment of a receiver. There were numerous other notes aggregating large sums, for the security of which the bank held second mortgage bonds of the road, which proved to be worthless. The commissioner says that from the testimony it may be possible to class the original transaction of making the loan to this company as an error of judgment; but it was more than an error of judgment to sit idly by when the said company did not have the means to pay its renewals, nor take the trouble to renew the notes when they became due, and make an effort to collect the debt or to regain additional security, especially when the testimony discloses that nearly everyone else who had loaned money to the road was demanding and receiving additional security, and that the said The Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank was almost the only holder of the notes of the said company; that the dividends on the collaterals were not sufficient to pay the notes. The evidence shows that the bonds of the company were sold to pay interest, and that the published statements of the condition of the company disclosed the fact that the earnings of the company were not sufficient to pay the operating expenses and interest on the debt. Eighth, that Jamieson & Collins owed the bank at suspension $3,311.62, for which there was no security, and no indorser except one of the makers, and that a new note was discounted for them amounting to $1,211.62, a few months before the suspension of the bank—to wit: on the 30th of August, 1876—this Jamieson being the brother of the president. Ninth, Robert Jamieson, himself not solvent, and the brother of the president, with indorsers both worthless, was loaned thousands of dollars, and at the suspension owed $2,300, some of his paper being altogether without an indorser; and the books of the bank showed that a note of Jamieson for $500, deposited for collection by W. F. Vincent, was protested November 8, 1873.

And he reports the names of the directors and their several periods of service.

The capital stock of this bank was only $10,000, and of that only $6,200 was paid at the time of the suspension of the bank. The bank closed its doors and ceased to do business December 1, 1876. An assignment of assets was made September 18, 1877. A receiver was appointed May, 1878. The commissioner classifies the directors and their period of service, and ascertains the amount for which the several classes are in his judgment liable. He ascertained that Robert Bell, Jr., William Cogan, Andrew Jamieson, and the estate of John W. Stewart are severally liable for principal and interest to March 15, 1886, $38,574.82; that said Robert Bell, Jr., Emanuel Francis, William Cogan, Andrew Jamieson, and John W. Stewart were directors of the bank from its organization to the appointment of a receiver; that Lewis Stein, John P. Agnew, and John C. Graham's estate are severally liable for the amount of $35,917.09, the said Lewis Stein, John P. Agnew, and John C. Graham having been directors from May 13, 1873, to the appointment of a receiver; that Lewis McKenzie and Jefferson Tacey's estate are severally liable for $21,642.71.

This report was excepted to: first, to the amount of principal ascertained by the commissioner to be due to the depositors and allowing 6 per cent interest thereon; second, to the amounts ascertained by the commissioner to be due from the several debtors of the defendant bank, and also to the amount of the overdraft of the Alexandria Passenger Railway Company; third, to the special commissioner finding the facts proved; fourth, to the conclusions of the said report, by which they are held responsible for the several sums reported as respectively chargeable to them on account of alleged negligence or improper conduct in the discharge of their duties as directors, evidence taken in the cause being wholly insufficient, as these defendants allege, to show any negligence or improper conduct which show either of said defendants so liable.

On the 30th of March, 1887, the Circuit Court of Alexandria City rendered a decree in the cause, whereby the said report, so far as it finds the directors of the Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank, or any of them, personally responsible for the losses sustained by the bank, be and the same is overruled, it appearing to the court that no such dereliction of duty on their part is shown as to fix upon them such personal liability; and that as to the said directors and personal representatives of such as are dead the plaintiff's bill be and the same is hereby dismissed, with costs. It is further adjudged, ordered and decreed that the said report be and the same is hereby confirmed and ratified in all other particulars. From this decree the plaintiff applied for and obtained an appeal to this court.

By the appellees no error is assigned, so the question involved here does not raise any other question than the single inquiry, Was there such negligence on the part of the directors of this bank as to make them, or any of them, personally liable for its losses? There is no dispute as to what the losses have been and their several amounts, and of the terms or periods as to which each director is liable, if at all.

The appellees insist, through their learned counsel, that, while there have been errors of judgment and unfortunate loans made, there has been no negligence.

The liability of directors for losses growing out of their mismanagement of the concerns of the bank, and their negligence in the discharge of their duties, has been often the subject of judicial investigation and decision. It is a question at this day well understood by the profession, and is not controverted to any degree by the learned counsel in this case. We find the settled rule upon this subject well stated in a recent work of great practical usefulness.

The American & English Encyclopedia of Law, under the head "Banks," speaking of directors, says: "The directors of a bank have the general control and government of its affairs, and constitute the bank. They are bound to exercise ordinary skill and diligence, and are liable for losses resulting from mismanagement of the affairs and business of the bank"—citing United Society of Shakers v. Underwood, 9 Bush, 609, which appears to have been criticised in Zinn v. Mendel, 9 W. Va. 580, 597, and by Mr. Redfield in 18 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 218. Dunn v. Kyle, 14 Bush, 184; Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 52; Chester v. Halliard, 84 N. J. Eq. 841; Spring's App. 71 Pa. 11.

Then it is further said: "But for excusable mistakes concerning the law, and for errors of judgment, when acting in good faith, they are not liable"—citing Spring's App. and Dunn v. Kyle, supra; Godbold v. Branch Bank at Mobile, 11 Ala. 191; Hodges v. New Eng. Screw Co. 1 R. I. 813. See 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. of L. 114-116.

Morse, in his work on Banks and Banking, says: "If bank directors do not manage the affairs and business of the bank, according to the directions of the charter, and in good faith, they will be liable to make good all losses which their misconduct may inflict upon either their stockholders or creditors, or both. [Hodges v. New England Screw Co. supra.] They may be held to account to an injured party in a court of chancery [Bank of St. Marys v. St. John, 25 Ala. 566]; or they, or any one of their number who shared in the wrong doing, may be sued at law for damages. [Conant v. Seneca Co. Bank, 1 Ohio St. 298.] They are required simply to show a reasonable capacity for the position they accept, to use in it their best discretion and industry, to show the scrupulous bona fides and conscientiousness in every matter, however minute, which is exacted rigorously of all trustees of the property of others, and to obey accurately the requisitions of the charter or of the general law under which they are organized." Morse, Banks & Banking, 133.

Mistakes as to what is the law serve to excuse cases where correct knowledge could be reasonably expected only from a professional man; and even in such cases, if the directors feel any doubts, they may be guilty of neglect if they fail to seek and be guided by competent legal advice. But ignorance of any fact in the bank's affairs, which it is their duty to know, can never be set up by them in defense or exculpation for any act which the existence of that fact should have prohibited. Id. 185.

"The high degree of confidence and responsibility resting upon directors of corporations has often led the courts to regard them as trustees, and to declare the relationship existing between them and the stockholders to be that of trustees and cestui que trustent respectively. If this can be asserted with regard to the generality of corporations, it is peculiarly and exceptionally true with regard to banking corporations. The directors of a bank are not trustees for the stockholders alone, but they owe an even earlier duty to the depositors. The law is, as it ought to be, very jealous in exacting the strict and thorough performance of these duties; and it is in the scrutiny of possible breaches of them that the rigid rules which govern trustees have been applied. It is not enough to exculpate a director that no actual dishonesty can be shown; that he cannot be positively proved to have been influenced by interested motives." Id. pp. 113, 114.

Mr. Morawetz, in his work on Private Corporations, says, as to the degree of care to be exercised (§ 552): "Attempts have been made to define the degree of care and prudence which directors must exercise in the performance of their duties. In some of the cases it has been said that, inasmuch as directors are usually not paid for their services, they are to be regarded as mandataries—persons who have gratuitously undertaken to perform certain duties—and are bound to exercise only ordinary care and prudence, and that they are liable to the corporation only for what is called cra-ra negligencia, or gross negligence. But all this is at the most misleading. The plain and obvious rule is that directors impliedly undertake to use as much diligence and care as the proper performance of the duties of their office requires. What constitutes a proper performance of the duties of a director is a question of fact which must be determined in each case in view of all the circumstances. The character of the company, the condition of its business, the usual methods of managing such companies, and all other relevant facts must be taken into consideration. It is evident that no abstract reasoning can be of service in reaching a proper solution."

Directors or trustees of a corporation are bound to manage the affairs of the company with the same degree of care and prudence which is generally exercised by business men in the management of their own affairs. Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65; Charitable Corp. v. Sutton, 2 Atk. 405; Litchfield v. White, 8 Sandf. 545; Hodges v. New Eng. Screw Co. supra.

Directors are not merely bound to be honest; they must also be diligent and careful in performing the duties they have undertaken. They cannot excuse imprudence on the ground of their ignorance or inexperience or the honesty of their intentions; and if they commit an error of judgment through mere recklessness or want of ordinary prudence and skill, the corporation may hold them responsible for the consequences. See the case of Hun v. Cary, 82 N. Y. 65, Earl, J., saying in delivering the opinion in that case: "One who voluntarily takes the position of director, and invites confidence in that relation, undertakes, like a mandatory, with those whom he represents or for whom he acts, that he possesses at least ordinary knowledge and skill, and that he will bring them to bear in the discharge of his duties. Such is the rule applicable to public officers, to professional men, and to mechanics; and such is the rule which must be applicable to every person who undertakes to act for another in a situation or employment requiring skill and knowledge; and it matters not that that service is to be rendered gratuitously. The defendants voluntarily took the position of trustees of the bank. They invited depositors to confide to them their savings, and to intrust the safe keeping and management of them to their skill and prudence. They undertook not only that they would discharge their duties with proper care, but that they would exercise the ordinary skill and judgment requisite for the discharge of their delicate trust."

Directors can never set up as a defense that they were ignorant of a provision of the company's charter or by laws. See Spering's App. supra, and the opinion of Chief Justice Green in Hodges v. New Eng. Screw Co. 1 R. I. 812.

We cannot better close the discussion upon this question than by citing the case of the Mutual Building Fund & Dollar Savings Bank v. Bossieux, 4 Hughes, 887, much relied on by the learned counsel for the appellant, who says: "This question has been the subject of investigation and judicial determination by the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Virginia."

Judge Hughes, in an elaborate opinion, stating the law with great force and clearness, exhibiting a thorough and patient examination of all the authorities, held the defendant directors liable upon this ground: "Gross inattention and negligence allowing fraud or misconduct on the part of agents, officers, or codirectors, which could have been prevented if they had given ordinary care and attention to their duties." Indeed, this opinion is not only the most thorough examination, but the ablest exposition of the law upon the subject the writer has been able to find, after examining many authorities, and he might well be content to rest the law of this case upon the opinion of Judge Hughes. In it he reviews the case of Spering's Appeal, and shows that the very principle was declared in that case upon which he found the directors of the Dollar Savings Bank liable. He declares that "Negligence may be of such a character as to amount to fraud"—citing Jones v. Olark, 25 Gratt. 655, and Neal v. Olark, 95 U. S. 707 [24 L. ed. 586].

In that case Judge Hughes says: "It will abundantly appear, from authorities and reported cases to be cited in the sequel, that the managing officers of corporations are personally liable for the results of gross negligence, or what the jurists call crassa negligentia. If, by reckless inattention to the duties confided to them by their corporation, frauds and misconduct are perpetrated by officers, agents and codirectors, which ordinary care on their part would have prevented, then I think it may be said with truth that it is now elementary law, to be found in all the books, that directors are personally liable for the losses resulting. Moreover, all authorities now tend to the conclusion that directors of banks and other moneyed corporations hold the relation to stockholders, depositors, and creditors of trustees to cestui que trust, and, as such, are personally responsible for frauds and losses resulting from gross negligence and inattention to the duties of their trust." Mutual Bldg. Fund & Dollar Sav. Bank v. Bossieux, 4 Hughes, 888, and the authorities cited in the opinion.

We will now proceed to briefly review the facts of this case, to which this well established rule of law is to be applied. The question arises in this case as between the directors and the depositors, and not between the directors and the stockholders. The by-laws of this bank prescribed weekly meetings. It is conceded that these were scarcely ever held, the answer admitting that formal meetings were not held.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Alexandria City that "It appears to the court that there has been no such dereliction of duty on the part of the directors or any of them, as to fix upon them personal responsibility" cannot be sustained upon any sound principle whatever. Upon what principle can Andrew Jamieson be held not to be personally liable for the acts already detailed concerning him? The commissioner reports that he took $2,187.88 out of the cash drawer; that he withdrew, without authority, the bonds of the bank deposited elsewhere, caused their sale, and appropriated the money to his own use; overdraw his account $341.64, and in other ways converted to his own use the property of the bank aggregating $11,718.97.

The passenger railway was allowed to overdraw its accounts to the amount of thousands—$11,814.91 at one time. The notes of the company were discounted to the amount of $6,500, and at maturity neither protested, renewed, collected nor sued on; and the overdraft was allowed to increase for a year and more, without security, until it reached $7,530.45, which was entirely lost to the bank; he being the president of this company part of the time, and one of the bank directors being president of the company the other part of the time in question, while the treasurer of the railway company was the cashier of this savings bank. Stilson was allowed to withdraw the sole valuable security for his note of $2,000, and that was lost. He lent his brother $3,311.62, practically without any security, and that was lost; and actually lent him $1,211.62 a few months before the bank closed its doors—lending to Robert Jamieson, with no security except worthless indorsers, $2,800, when he had already gone to protest on a note of $500.

But the codirectors seek to escape responsibility for all this, including the large loss to the Washington & Ohio Railroad, by claiming to have no actual knowledge of it all. Did they exercise ordinary diligence to inform themselves, as their duty certainly required that they should? They were required to meet weekly by their own by-laws. They did not always meet semi-annually, meeting sometimes once a year, as we have stated. They were in duty bound to cause the books of the bank to be examined at regular intervals. This they never did at all throughout their whole career.

nor did they ever call for a statement of their accounts with other banks. Their vaults and their cash drawer were emptied by illegal abstractions and insolvent loans; and they admit that they never knew it, and plead this as their exculpation.

The stock subscribed for was not paid up, as has been stated, and yet such part as was paid up was treated as a loan and interest paid on it, and a large part had never been paid up at the time of the suspension, and some of it has not yet been paid up. Having a bank with so small a nominal capital, with empty vaults and despoiled cash drawer, they owed, at the suspension of the bank, to depositors who had intrusted to them their money, $58,063.68, on which they have been able to pay only 10 per cent. If these directors had any duty to perform whatever toward their depositors, the records of this case do not show its performance. They plead ignorance. One of their number was the president of the Washington & Ohio Railroad in its last hours, and knew its condition, and secured himself, but the notes due the bank were allowed to sleep unprotected, unsecured, unrenewed, uncollected and unsued on. One of their number was the president of the Alexandria Passenger Railroad Company, and knew its condition. One of their number was the brother of their defaulting debtor, Jamieson, who was insolvent at the time of the loan of thousands to him without security.

It is difficult to concede that they could have been ignorant of all this; but, suppose they were, their duty required that they should have looked well into all these matters; and if they have negligently trusted them to others, and loss has occurred, should it fall on them or upon the depositors who had trusted them, and whose trust they had accepted, and to whom they had solemnly promised such care and attention as was to be expected of good business men?

We think the record shows that these directors and all of them have been guilty of such negligence in the premises as makes them personally liable for the losses caused by their negligence; and we are of opinion that the Circuit Court of Alexandria City erred in holding them exonerated. While this is true, there is nothing in the record which shows any bad faith, or tends to show any dishonesty on the part of some of these gentlemen, who appear to have confided their duties to others, and to have been betrayed by them; but this was such negligence as will fix liability upon them. Their act in assuming this attitude of trust and confidence was voluntary, and led to the confidence which has resulted in loss.

We are of opinion to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court of Alexandria City appealed from, and to render such decree here as the said court ought to have rendered.

tools, machinery, implements and appurtenances, and all the franchises thereunto belonging or appertaining," acquired only the improvements belonging to the State in its corporate capacity, as distinguished from what was subject to public use under common right, and did not acquire any exclusive right of navigation; therefore it has no right of action against a railroad company for the obstruction of navigation by repairing a bridge, where this was done under a license which was valid against the public, and the improvements included in the lease were not injured or interfered with.

3. The obstruction of navigation by the repairing of a bridge over a river in replacing a draw span, which bridge is maintained under lawful authority, creates no right of action in favor of parties entitled to navigate the river, if the repairs are made in such a manner as not unreasonably to obstruct the navigation, although it was possible to have opened the draw and constructed the new one upon the edge of the river, thus avoiding all obstruction to navigation, but which would have involved unreasonable delay and expense.

APPEAL by plaintiff, from a judgment of the Louisville Law and Equity Court (Harris, J.), in favor of the defendant in an action for damages for obstructing Green River. Affirmed.

The facts as found are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wright & McElroy and Alex. P. Humphrey for appellant.

Messrs. John Mason Brown and George M. Davis for appellee.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The Legislature of Kentucky chartered the Memphis, Paducah & Northern Railroad Company on March 25, 1878. It also incorporated the Chesapeake, Ohio & Southwestern Railroad Company on January 19, 1882. The last named corporation was at the time of its creation the owner of so much of the first named road as had then been constructed from Memphis, Tenn., to Paducah, Ky.; and its charter conferred upon it certain powers and privileges that had been granted to the Memphis, Paducah & Northern Railroad Company.

The charter provision of the last named corporation, which was, by reference to it in the appellee's charter, made a part of it, and which is material to the proper consideration of the questions now presented, is as follows: "Sec. 19. The board may provide for the construction of telegraph lines, workshops, warehouses, bridges (so as not unreasonably to obstruct the navigation of any navigable stream) and other buildings and erections, and for conducting them, and such other operations as may be necessary and convenient to the most efficient operation of the railroad of the company for the common carriage of freights and passengers."

Prior to 1883 the appellee's road had, in conformity to its charter, been extended from Paducah northward to Louisville; and as a part of this extension, and under its legislative grant, the company had erected across the Green River, at Rockport in this State, a bridge, with a revolving or draw span, so as to admit of the passage of boats and other craft navigating the river. In November, 1883, it became necessary to replace this draw span with a new and more improved one; and to this end the appellee caused notice to be published that it would close the channel of the river under the span from December 5 to about December 31, 1883. It also had notice of its intention to do so, served

Jurisdiction of United States Courts. The compact between Virginia and Kentucky, providing that the navigation of the Ohio should be free, was sanctioned by Congress, and is obligatory, and can be enforced by the supreme court. Pa. v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 54 U. S. 18 How. 518 (14 L. ed. 249). In the exercise of its original jurisdiction, the supreme court may, on complaint by a State of the erection of a bridge, refer the case to a master to take proof. Pa. v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co. 50 U. S. 9 How. 647 (13 L. ed. 294). In a suit brought in a federal court, where jurisdiction depends on citizenship of the parties, for the abatement of a bridge across a navigable river which is the boundary of upon the appellant, the Green & Barren River Navigation Company, a lessee from the State under an Act approved March 9, 1868, of the locks, dams and other improvements erected by it upon Green and Barren Rivers, and the owner of a line of steamboats plying upon these waters between Bowling Green, in this State, and Evansville, Ind.

There is no complaint of want of proper notice. Accordingly the railroad company, over the protest of the navigation company, closed the draw span by the erection of false work under it, and it thus remained until January 22, 1884, a period of forty-seven days. No unnecessary time was consumed, however, in the erection of the work, and during fifteen of the forty-seven days navigation was prevented upon the appellant's line by ice in the Ohio River.

The lower court in its finding of facts found that the obstruction of navigation might have been altogether avoided by throwing open the draw span, and erecting the false work along the river bank, upon the edge of which the draw pier stood. Doubtless this would have been possible; but it would not only not have served the railroad, but have been an unusual mode of erecting such structures, requiring more time for its completion, and involving 50 per cent, or at least a much greater, cost. While the navigation was thus obstructed the navigation company continued the operation of its line, save when prevented by ice, by running one of its boats upon the upper and the other upon the lower end of it, and by transferring its passengers and freight from one boat to the other over the deck of a barge anchored under the bridge. It brought this action to recover damages consequent upon the obstruction.

The lower court found that it caused one of the appellant's boats to remain idle and partially manned at Rockport during the closing of the span, at an expense of $1,585.25.

We fail to understand why this was either a necessary or a reasonable result. The bridge was not far from the middle point upon its line of navigation. It seems to us that one boat could have been constantly plying between the bridge and one end of the line, and the other between the bridge and the other end, the two meeting at the bridge, thus avoiding the detention of one boat at the bridge while the other went from it to the other end of the line and returned. As it was a finding of fact, however, we will regard it as well founded. The judge below also found that a reasonable rent of the barge, etc., was $1,551, thus fixing the entire damage at something over $3,000; but he dismissed the claim, upon the ground that the legislative grant to the railroad company to make the improvement was valid, and that it in doing so had kept within its terms.

The Green and Barren Rivers are navigable streams, and entirely within the boundary of this State. They are public highways by nature or of common right. They exist by common law, and the public can only be deprived of their free use by legislation. Although they are national as well as state highways, and besides serving the purposes of internal commerce also facilitate commerce between the States, yet it is well settled that in the absence of legislation under that clause of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States, a State has plenary power over a navigable stream altogether within its borders. In such a case, until Congress intervenes, the Legislaon navigation. Hamilton v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., 119 U. S. 290 (30 L. ed. 998). An Act of Congress, admitting a State, which provides that a river shall be a common highway and forever free, does not affect the power of the State in respect to bridges over it. Hamilton v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co., supra. The erection of a bridge over the Willamette River at Portland is not a violation of the Admission Act of Oregon. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U. S. 1 (31 L. ed. 629). A bridge constructed over a navigable river, in accordance with the legislation of both the State and Federal Governments, must be deemed a lawful structure, however much it may interfere with the public right of navigation. Miller v. Mayor of N. Y., 109 U. S. 885 (27 L. ed. 971). Under the Rhode Island Act authorizing the construction of a bridge over a river, in such place and manner as commissioners might determine, they could erect a bridge high above the river, and extending beyond the bank to an avenue, thereby establishing an abutment. Sullivan v. Webster, 5 New Eng. Rep. 381, R. I. Index B1, 38. The Statutes of New York authorize boards of supervisors, upon the application of one town legally, to require a stream forming the boundary between two towns to be bridged at the joint expense of said towns, and compelling each town to raise money to pay its share of the expense by an issue of bonds. Kirkwood v. Newburg, 45 Hun, 323, 12 N. Y. S. R. 420. Where a bridge was originally constructed, and has for a number of years been maintained, by two adjoining towns, upon a highway running along the line between the towns, it is the duty of both towns to keep it in repair; and both are liable for injuries sustained by reason of its being out of repair. Getty v. Hamlin, 48 Hun, 1, 11 N. Y. S. R. 93.

Railroad bridges over navigable streams. Where a railroad company has been granted the right to build a bridge over a navigable stream, the proper and necessary repair of such bridge without negligence cannot subject the company to liability for damages caused thereby; and injuries suffered by the driving of piling in the making of such repairs, by a person rafting the logs on the stream, is damnum absque injuria. Central Trust Co. v. Wabash etc. R. Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 508. A railroad company chartered in another State may be obliged, by the condition of a state statute which recognizes it as a corporation of that State, to construct and maintain a drawbridge in the channel of a river which is crossed by the company's road, on the line between two States. New Orleans etc. R. Co. v. Miss., 112 U. S. 12 (23 L. ed. 619). If by the Act of the Government subsequent to the building of the bridge, or by any other means not within the control of the company erecting the bridge, the currents were so radically changed as to materially obstruct the navigation and make the passage of the draw dangerous, it would have been incumbent on the bridge company to change the piers in conformity to the new condition of things; but if the change in the current to the draw by the excavation was slight, the failure to exercise proper skill in such erection will constitute such negligence, though ever so much care is used in its erection. The failure to build the bridge in the manner prescribed by law is negligence per se. St. Louis & St. P. Packet Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 755. Where, before a bridge over a navigable stream, authorized under a general Act, was built, a canal was ordered by the Government to be constructed, it became the duty of the bridge company to plan and build their bridge with reference to the canal through which the principal traffic of the river would pass; but the company were only required to use reasonable diligence and skill in forming and executing their plans, and were not required to foresee and absolutely anticipate the effect upon the current of the river of a factor not yet in existence; and if the piers of the bridge were made parallel, as far as possible, with the currents of the river and the necessities of the canal, with the result that the passage of the draw is reasonably safe, negligence cannot be imputed to the company. St. Louis & St. P. Packet Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 755.

ture of the State is sovereign. It may, as to such a stream, and in the absence of national legislation, enact a law which incidentally may have a material influence upon commerce between the States. Such a river is not outside of state jurisdiction so long as Congress does not interfere. The mere grant of the power to the national Legislature to regulate commerce between the States is not per se an inhibition upon state legislation as to a navigable river entirely within its boundary. It is quite proper that it should in such a case regulate its internal commerce as a part of its internal police.

The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking upon this subject in the case of Hamilton v. Vicksburg Railroad Company, 119 U. S. 260 [80 L. ed. 893], said: "As has often been said by this court, bridges are merely connecting links of turnpikes, streets and railroads; and the commerce over them may be much greater than that on the streams which they cross. A break in the line of railroad communication from the want of a bridge may produce much greater inconvenience to the public than the obstruction to navigation caused by a bridge with proper draws. In such cases the local authority can best determine which of the two modes of transportation shall be favored, and how far either should be made subservient to the other."

We regard it as now settled beyond question that a State Legislature may at least authorize the building of a bridge or other structure tending to obstruct the navigation of a navigable river, which is altogether within its own boundary; and it is only when Congress, by virtue of the constitutional provision, acts as to such obstructions that its will must be obeyed so far as may be necessary to insure free navigation. Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245 [7 L. ed. 412]; Cardwell v. American River Bridge Co. 118 U. S. 205 [28 L. ed. 959]; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635 [25 L. ed. 336]; Hamilton v. Vicksburg R. Co. supra. In fact, many of the cases hold that the obstruction may go to the extent of entirely destroying the navigation of the stream.

The appellant contends, however, that it stands in a different attitude from the general public as to the right of the State to obstruct Green River, or to authorize it to be done by the building or repairing of a bridge. It insists that the Legislature had no right, after making, and during the continuance of, the thirty years' lease to it, to pass any law repealing or abridging the privileges conferred by it, because to do so would impair the obligation of the contract; and that the State cannot obstruct its navigable streams, or authorize it to be done, if Congress has legislated as to it under the commerce clause, or if to do so would violate a contract made by the State with an individual or a corporation. It becomes necessary, therefore, to ascertain what rights the appellant did in fact acquire by its lease.

The rights of the parties to this controversy are not to be determined by the relative importance of river or railroad transportation to the commerce of the country. We have no right to compare benefits, or contrast injuries. Whether one, and, if so, which one, is to be subservient to the other is a question addressed to the Legislature, and not to the judiciary. Prior to March 9, 1868, the State had improved the navigation of Green and Barren Rivers by means of locks and dams, and tolls were charged for their use. The money thus realized proved inadequate to maintain and operate the improvements, and the enterprise was a losing one to the State. The Legislature, by an Act of the date last named, incorporated the appellant, and, in the language of the second section of the Act, leased to it the "Green & Barren River line of navigation, and their tributaries, together with the grounds, houses, waterworks, rents, profits, tools, machinery, implements and appurtenances, and all the franchises thereunto belonging or appertaining."

The Act requires the company to keep "the line of navigation" in repair, and to permit all water craft to navigate the rivers upon the payment of certain rates of toll prescribed by it. The constitutionality of this Act, and the validity of the lease based upon it, were maintained by this court in the two cases of Melley-nolds v. Smallhouse, 8 Bush, 447; and Sinking Fund Comrs. v. Green Navigation Company, 79 Ky. 73.

What, then, was the extent of the property right thus acquired by the appellant? Manifestly it did not confer upon it an exclusive right of navigation. It was not a lease of the rivers themselves. The company did not during the term of the lease acquire such a right in them as it would have obtained under a lease of a canal or turnpike. The public had a natural right to use them before the State improved them. They were not the subjects of private ownership. The company acquired no exclusive right of fishing in them, or using the water for motive or irrigating purposes. What, then, was intended by the expression "line of navigation," as used in the Act? The history of the matter, and the existing circumstances, will serve to explain it.

The rivers themselves were navigable streams, open to public use by common right. The State had, however, erected locks and dams, and other subsidiary improvements. Tolls were being charged for their use, by the State, when the lease was made. These improvements belonged to it, and not to the public by any common right. They constitute its line of navigation; and it leased what belonged to it in its corporate capacity, as distinguished from what was subject to public use under common right. Properly speaking, these improvements were all the State had to lease; and although the grant should be construed strictly, yet a fair interpretation of the Act of the Legislature confines its operation to the property of the State. The fourth section requires the company "to use due diligence in keeping up said line of navigation in good repair." These words certainly refer to the improvements only, and aid us in reaching a conclusion as to what was meant by the words, "the line of navigation."

The company acquired no peculiar right in the navigation of these rivers under its lease. As to it the appellant occupied the same attitude as the general public; and as none of the improvements have been injured or interfered with, and as the license to bridge the river was valid against the public, it results that the appellant cannot complain if the appellees in repairing its bridge has kept within the grant. It is not a case of two interfering franchises, because the contract between the State and the navigation company invested the latter with the exclusive proprietorship, during the lease, of the improvements only, and not the navigation of the river.

This court, in effect, so held in the case of Green Navigation Company v. Palmer, 88 Ky. 646, and it is unnecessary to consider the question of the power of the State to barter away the control of its navigable streams, which is a part of its internal police power, because it has not attempted to do so in this instance. It is reasonable to suppose that the parties so understood the contract. If the bridge had not been constructed when the lease was made, then the acquiescence of the appellant in its construction under legislative grant, and the knowledge that it would necessarily need repair, show how it regarded the contract. Upon the other hand, if it had already been constructed, then the company knew that its repair and renewal would follow as a duty to the traveling public, and as necessary to its convenience and safety; and it is unreasonable to suppose that the parties intended to enter into a contract for bidding such repair.

The work was done at a season of the year when it was likely to interfere with navigation the least. Ample notice was given that it would be done, and it was done as expeditiously as possible. In fact it is not claimed that there was any unreasonable delay, or that the obstruction continued longer than was necessary. It is plain that nothing was done negligently or wantonly, but that the appellee acted in good faith, and with proper precaution. While it was possible to have opened the draw and constructed the new one upon the edge of the river, and thus have avoided all obstruction to navigation, yet the railroad company was not required to take an unusual course in constructing its improvement, and one which would involve unreasonable delay and expense. It was done in such a manner as "not unreasonably to obstruct the navigation;" and the appellee is entitled to the protection of the rule of damnum absque injuria.

Judgment affirmed.

CASE certified from the Circuit Court for Union County (Van Syckel, J.). Judgment for plaintiff on demurrer.

Statement by Beasley, Ch. J.:

The declaration was founded on a building contract, under seal, whereby it was alleged the plaintiff agreed to "erect and finish" a certain dwelling-house "agreeably to the drawings and specifications by Oscar S. T., architect, within the time aforesaid, in a good, workmanlike, and substantial manner, to the satisfaction, and under the direction, of said architect, to be testified by a writing or certificate under the hand of said architect; that the plaintiff was to furnish all materials, etc.; and that for his work and materials he was to be paid the sum of $8,050; that, if the defendant requested, alterations, additions or omissions, at a reasonable valuation, were to be deducted from or added to the contract price; that the defendant did request certain alterations (which were specified), which were made, to the value of $600; that it was further provided that, in case of a dispute arising as to the true construction or meaning of the drawings or specifications, the said architect was to decide the same, whose decision should be final and conclusive.

Full performance on the part of the plaintiff is alleged. The breach is that the said architect "willfully and fraudulently decides that the aforesaid alterations, deviations and additions are within the true construction of said drawings and specifications referred to in the said contract, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to be paid the fair and reasonable value thereof, and willfully and fraudulently withholds from the plaintiff, and refuses to sign, the certificate required by said contract for the fifth and last payment called for thereby; which fraudulent and willful decision of the architect, and fraudulent and willful withholding of the said certificate, have been brought to the knowledge of the said defendant by the said plaintiff, but the said defendant, though often," etc., "hath not paid the said sum of $600," etc.

This count was demurred to, and the issue thus raised was certified for the opinion of the supreme court.

Mr. Craig A. Marsh, for defendant, for the demurrer:

The production of the certificate of the architect is made a condition precedent by the contract sued on.

See Barton v. Hermann, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 379; Morgan v. Birnie, 9 Bing. 672; Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, 11 Week. Rep. 261, 7 L. T. N. S. 786.

The condition precedent being shown by plaintiff's own pleading not to have been performed, action cannot be maintained.

Morgan v. Birnie, 9 Bing. 672; Byrne v. Sisters of Charity, 45 N. J. L. 213; Westwood v. Secretary of State for India, 11 Week. Rep. 261.

The allegation of fraud on the part of the architect does not dispense with the necessity of performance of the condition precedent. The builder may compel the architect to deliver the certificate by bill in equity, or he may sue him for the fraud. Even if the defendant were a party to the alleged fraud it would be more logical to sue the guilty parties for the tort or to proceed in equity to compel the production of the certificate; and in the absence of any direct precedent on the point in this State, that rule should be adopted in preference to the illogical rule obtaining in some States where courts of equity and of law are combined, and the code system of pleading prevails.

Kimberley v. Dick, L. R. 13 Eq. 1; Pauley v. Turnbull, 3 Giff. 70; Ormes v. Beadel, 2 Giff. 166, cited in note to Atwell v. Atwell, 1 Moak, 534; Milner v. Field, 5 Exch. 829.

The plaintiff must show either performance of the condition precedent, or that the defendant wrongfully prevented such performance by his willful or fraudulent act.

Bishop, Cont. §§ 586, 1422; Hinde v. Henry, 86 N. J. L. 828.

Respecting building contracts, Addison clearly recognizes the principle contended for: that where the certificate is withheld there must be shown the collusion of the employer, to entitle the builder to recover on the contract.

Add. Cont. Morgan's ed. p. 395, § 861, Abbott & Wood's ed. p. 578. See also Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278; McAndrews v. Tippet, 89 N. J. L. 109; Byrne v. Sisters of Charity, 45 N. J. L. 213.

If the plaintiff has any cause of action it is in tort for the fraud.

6 Walt's Act. & Def. p. 515, § 5 and cases cited; Del. & H. Canal Co. v. Pa. Coal Co. 50 N. Y. 250.

Mr. Edward M. Collie, for plaintiff, contra:

Collusion by the owner is not necessary—the fraudulent and willful withdrawing of the certificate by the architect is sufficient to charge the owner.

Byrne v. Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth, 45 N. J. L. 214, relied on by defendant, does not decide the question.

Any confusion that exists, as to the law, results from statements of text writers; notably, 2 Addison, on Contracts, 3d Am. ed. § 861, where the law is stated to be: "But the employer is not responsible for any misconduct of the architect or surveyor in refusing to certify, not brought about by his instrumentality or interference," citing Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278; but the statement is not supported by the citation.

Fraud on the part of an engineer or architect who was to certify as to the performance of a contract, as a condition precedent to a recovery, will allow the contractor to recover, upon proof of the quantity and value of the work done.

Beasley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A comprehension of the facts stated in the summary of the declaration prefixed to this opinion will make it manifest that the question to be decided is, Can the defendant cheat the plaintiff by due course of law? The case, in brief, is this: the plaintiff has done work for the defendant to the value of $600, which work was additional to that specified in the written contract. The money was payable on the certificate of the architect, whose decision was to be final. Such architect fraudulently decided that the work in question was not additional, but was embraced in the contract; and, the defendant being notified of the facts, refused to pay the demand. As the demurrer confesses the truth of this statement, it will be observed that the defendant stands now before the court, saying: "I admit that this money is due for additional work; I admit that the architect fraudulently certifies to the contrary; and I claim that, by a correct application of legal principles, I have the right to take advantage of this fraud, and to appropriate to myself the moneys that are its fruits." The inquiry is, Does the law, in reality, justify this immoral attitude?

It should be premised to the inquiry that, if this action will not lie, neither will any action lie against the defendant founded on the facts stated, either at law or in equity. As such a result would be one much to be deprecated, and would stand as a blot on the jurisprudence of the State, it would seem that the most cogent reasons should be forthcoming to afford a satisfactory answer to the interrogatory, Why should a man be permitted to take advantage of the fraud of another? The only known reply is that the plaintiff has covenanted to that effect; that he has agreed that the action of the architect, whether honest or dishonest, shall be conclusive.

It is proper to say, in limine, that it is not by any means deemed certain that this contract, if to be read in the sense just specified, is sustainable in law. It is assumed that a man cannot contract that he himself may commit a fraud. For example, this defendant could not have agreed that this money should not be payable except on his own written certificate, and that he might fraudulently withhold such certificate. If such a stipulation would, as it is thought, be expunged from the instrument on grounds of public policy, how can the party legally stipulate that another may commit this same crime for him?

The capacity of parties to a contract to provide that one or the other, as the case turns out, may be cheated, does not appear to be a faculty requisite in the transaction of any legitimate business; while, at the same time, its existence is palpably offensive to good morals, and consequently may well be said to be adverse to the public welfare. The consequence is that it is, in my opinion, doubtful whether such an agreement can be legally made; but it is not deemed necessary to pursue the inquiry, inasmuch as, by proper rules of construction, applied to the facts set forth in this record, the proper conclusion is that the contract existing between these parties does not contain this stipulation so highly questionable. The inquiry is, What did these parties mean? Did they intend, or, by reason of the language employed, must it be concluded de jure that they intended, to be bound by the award of the architect, even though such award was the creature of fraud?

The clause thus referred to is in the common form that has long been in frequent use, and yet it may be safely said that it is most improbable that it would have been adopted in a single instance, if it had expressed in plain terms the meaning that it is now contended lies latent in its expressions. It is hard to believe that any self-respecting man would put his name to an agreement that a third party might do in his favor a fraudulent act; nor does it seem probable that to the ordinary mind any suggestion of so extraordinary purpose would be made by the generality of the expressions of this clause of the contract under criticism; and this last is an important consideration, for it is truly remarked by Chief Justice Gibson in Navigation Company v. Moore, 2 Whart. 491, that in the interpretation of contracts "The best construction is that which is made by viewing the subject of the contract as the mass of mankind would view it; for it may be safely assumed that such was the aspect in which the parties themselves viewed it."

Tested by this standard, it would seem to be certain that the construction of this term of the contract insisted on by the defense in this case cannot prevail.

But the adverse argument is that the agreement of the parties is to be ascertained from the plain language used by them, and such agreement is to be enforced, no matter what the intention may have been. This is the general rule, beyond a doubt; but such required literalism is not to be pushed to the preposterous length of requiring that by its operation the general intention of the parties as evidenced by their contract itself, shall be frustrated or perverted, either in whole or in part. The terms employed are servants, and not masters, of a perspicuous intent; they are to be interpreted so as to subserve, and not to subvert, such intent.

As an illustration it plainly appears on the face of this instrument that it was the evident and sole purpose of the provision in question to provide for the fair and definite decision of certain matters; and it is now said that, by force of the terms used, the decider is empowered to cheat either party at will; and yet it is obvious that the existence of such a power in the agent has no tendency to effectuate the object in view, but, so far as it can operate, is destructive of it. The stipulation giving the quality of finality to the action of their agent is part of a contrivance of these parties to insure fair dealing between them in certain particulars; there seems to be no reason why they should impart to such a contrivance a fraudulent potency. It was quite reasonable for these parties to say to their agent, "Decide honestly between us, and your decision shall be final;" but it was utterly unreasonable for them to agree to abide by such award, if it were fraudulent.

For my own part, I do not believe that in the history of the human race the transaction has occurred in which a man has consciously agreed that another should be clothed with the power to cheat him, and that the decision of the fraud doer should be conclusive on the subject; and in the present instance such a stipulation can be constructed only by an abstract interpretation of the conventional terms; for if such language be construed as a part of an integer, and in view of the purpose in hand, it can be made to produce no such result. There is no more important rule of construction than that which requires that words shall be interpreted in the reflected light of the context in which they are found; and applying this rule to the case in hand, it is not perceived how it can be reasonably said that these parties have given to the provision in question that noxious efficacy that is sought to be imparted to it.

That the clause under discussion cannot be, out and out, construed literally, appears to be undeniable. This and similar engagements are never so read. Undoubtedly, if we construe these terms with entire literalness, the builder is required to produce, before he can claim the money due him, the certificate of the architect. There are no exceptions provided for nor indicated, if the language is thus alone regarded. But suppose the money be earned, and the architect die before the signing of the certificate, is the claim lost or forfeited? Such a result, it is presumed, would not be claimed; and yet it is avoidable only in one way, and that is, to construe the terms of the contract reasonably, as applied to their subject, and not literally. The exception can stand on no other ground than this, for the maxim, Actus Dei nemini facit injuriam, is never applied in violation of a contract.

Looking to the letter alone, these parties have said that under all possible circumstances the certificate shall be a condition precedent to the right to payment. Admitting this as the true construction, the impossibility of the performance of such condition would not avoid it; and that such an effect has never been judicially given to such provisions shows conclusively that they have been interpreted according to their spirit, and not in subservience to their very letter.

And, indeed, in my view, the entire legal course that has been pursued in the construction of submissions to arbitration, in the common-law form, can be explained only on the ground that they have been construed liberally, and not with literal narrowness. In all these submissions the stipulation is in the most unqualified form that the award shall be final and conclusive, but if such award be tainted with fraud, it is set aside on the application of the party; and yet it is plain that such party could not be permitted to make such application, if its submission is to be read by its letter, and thus made to mean an engagement on his part to abide by the award, whether honest or dishonest. In such cases it has never been pretended that the parties, by the terms of their submission, reasonably understood, meant anything of the kind. The grounds of decision in that entire class of cases would seem to be precisely applicable to the present case.

As another illustration of the principle that a literal interpretation is out of place, when its adoption will run counter to the expressed general object of the contract, reference may be made to the familiar case of clauses so frequent in leases, that if the rent is in arrear for a certain time the instrument shall become void. In all these instances the courts have declared, notwithstanding the literal meaning of the terms, that the lease, on the happening of the event, is not absolutely vacated, but only becomes voidable at the option of the lessor.

In looking to the authorities, I do not find that the point in question has ever been put under the consideration of any of the courts of this State. The subject was not discussed nor considered in any of the three cases cited in the brief of the counsel of the defendant in the decision of which I participated. With respect to the English Law touching this topic, I am inclined to think that it is still in a fluent condition and that the last word in reference to it has not yet been spoken.

In Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278, the allegation was that the arbiter had "wrongfully and improperly" neglected and refused to make his certificate—a form of allegation that manifestly did not involve the question of fraud on his part—so that this decision has no place in the present inquiry.

Milner v. Field, 5 Exch. 899, goes beyond the requirements of the present case, for it maintains that even the collusion of the party in the fraud of the arbiter will not dispense with the production of the latter's certificate. The decision of the court is contained in four lines, and has no reference to either legal principles or authority; and in Clarke v. Watson, just referred to, which was decided ten years subsequently, in the opinions expressed a different doctrine is stated; and in Batterbury v. Vyse, 2 Hurl. & C. 41, this latter view appears to be the one sanctioned.

Even the gross misconduct of the arbiter, without the imputation of fraud, in the case of Pawley v. Turnbull, 7 Jur. N. S. 792, was declared by Vice-Chancellor Stuart to dispense with the production of the certificates, and the payment of the money due was decreed notwithstanding their absence.

This attitude of the authorities, it is deemed, fully justifies the remark already made, that the principal question has not been definitely settled by the courts at Westminster. The matter has been more definitely treated by the American tribunals, and the results reached seem to be very generally in accord with the views propounded in this opinion. Of this line of cases the following are leading illustrations: Balt. & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. 447; Lynn v. Balt. & O. R. Co. 60 Md. 404; Herrick v. Belknap, 27 Vt. 678; Snell v. Brown, 71 Ill. 183; Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143; Thomas v. Fleury, 26 N. Y. 26; Bowery Nat. Bank v. New York, 63 N. Y. 836; Martin v. Leggett, 4 E. D. Smith, 255.

In Batolador v. Kinkbride, 26 Fed. Rep. 899, the question present in this case was put directly in question, and was pointedly decided; 3 L. R. A.

for the inquiry was whether the plaintiff was dispensed from producing a certificate, if it had been refused by the fraud of the arbiter without collusion with the defendant. The jury was instructed at the trial by Mr. Justice Bradley that, if such fraud was shown, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that ruling was upon reconsideration declared to be right, both by the distinguished judge before whom the case had been tried, and by his associate, Mr. Judge Nixon. This case in itself is of great weight, and appears to be supported by the general current of American authority. Nor does it seem to me that by the adoption of the foregoing theory of exposition these arbitration clauses will be shorn of any beneficial efficacy. The awards authorized by them will, for all useful purposes, be in truth finalities. They cannot be impeached for the want of skill or knowledge of the arbiter, nor on the ground that his judgments do not square with the judgments of other persons—such awards can be vitiated by fraud alone, which must be proved to the satisfaction of a jury, under a watchful, judicial supervision. In fine, it appears to me that the foregoing construction of the clause of the contract in question rests upon the triple ground of legal principle, authority, and public policy. I think on this issue the plaintiff should have judgment.

Magie, J., dissenting:

It is conceded that the contract sued on does not impose on the owner an absolute obligation. By its terms his obligation to pay arises only upon the performance of a condition precedent, viz.: the production by the builder of the specified certificate by the architect named. A count on such a contract must show performance of the condition precedent, or a valid excuse for nonperformance. Unless one or the other is shown, the count will be bad on demurrer. Since the count in question admits nonperformance of the condition precedent, the sole question presented by the demurrer is whether it shows a valid excuse for nonperformance. Whether the builder, in such a case, has or has not a remedy in some other action or court is unnecessary to settle. If he has been defrauded by the architect or the owner, or both, it is inconceivable that he should be without remedy. If, in the absence of fraud, his contract deprives him of a resort to an action, he cannot complain, for courts can only construe and enforce his own contract voluntarily made.

The excuse alleged in this count for nonperformance of the condition precedent is that the architect willfully and fraudulently withheld his certificate. There is no allegation that the owner was connected with the act or omission of the architect other than the averment that the willful and fraudulent conduct of the architect has been brought to the owner's knowledge, but that he had not paid, and had refused to pay, the sum claimed. The argument in support of the count was principally directed to the maintenance of the proposition that an architect's fraud in withholding such a certificate, with which fraud the owner was in no way connected, excused its production, and fixed the owner's liability. The contention is that where the refusal is fraudulent the contract does not require production.

But the terms of the contract make no exception whatever. Its stipulations require the production of the certificate as a prerequisite to liability. It is insisted, however, that an impossibility of performance, occasioned by the death of the architect, would excuse performance, and that, on similar grounds, an impossibility occasioned by his fraud will also excuse. It is a familiar doctrine that one who has contracted to do an act will be excused, if performance has become impossible by the act of God or of the law. But this doctrine has never been extended to impossibilities not created by vis major. He who engages that an act shall be done by another must procure that act to be done, or submit to the consequences of failure. Doughty v. Neal, 1 Saund. 215; Lamb's Case, 5 Coke, 23 b; 5 Vin. Abr. 239; Campbell v. French, 6 T. R. 200; Hesketh v. Gray, Sayer, 185.

The contract before us, however, is, not that the architect shall make a certain certificate, but that the owner shall be liable only in case he does make such a certificate. The architect's act is thus made a condition precedent.

Professor Langdell, in his summary of principles established by the cases on contract selected by him (Vol. 2, p. 1075), shows that an act of God will not excuse the nonperformance of a condition precedent, although it would excuse the performance of the same act when regarded as a covenant or promise. This doctrine obviously applies whenever the act to be done as a condition precedent furnishes the quid pro quo for the liability to arise on performance. Poussard v. Spiers, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 410; Storer v. Gordon, 8 Maule & S. 808; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514.

Mr. Justice Drake considered that the doctrine was also applicable to cases where the condition precedent is the performance of an act which will protect him who is to become liable from undue liability. Roumagne v. Mechanics Ins. Co. 13 N. J. L. 116.

But it need not be determined whether the death of the architect would have excused the production of his certificate. In my judgment, an impossibility arising from such an intervention of higher power would have furnished such an excuse. But it cannot be argued therefrom that an impossibility produced, not by the intervention of superior power, but by the misconduct of the very person whose act is stipulated for, will furnish a like excuse; for, if it be admitted that the true theory of the doctrine which excuses performance, when rendered impossible by vis major, rests rather on a construction of the contract as not including performance under circumstances not contemplated by the parties, than on a destruction of the obligation by a superior and resistless force subsequently intervening (as was suggested by Sir James Hannen in Bailey v. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B. 180), yet the conclusion argued for does not follow. No violence is done to the contract if the case of the death of the architect be treated as excepted, because both parties must have known that such an event would render performance impossible. But when the parties expressly stipulate for an architect's certificate it is obvious that they had in contemplation his conduct, including his ability to do the act, his willingness to do it, and his honesty in doing it. His conduct was thus expressly stipulated for, and to eliminate any part of that stipulation does violence to the contract.

It may be true that the builder would not have entered into this contract if it had expressed that the owner would not become liable if the architect fraudulently withheld a certificate. It is probably equally true that he would have refused to sign, if it had expressed that the owner would not become liable if the architect became unable or unwilling to make a certificate. Yet it is well settled that he has made precisely such a contract and it seems to me to be a novel mode of discovering the construction of a contract, plain upon its face, which evades its direct meaning, on the ground that if the parties had understood that meaning they would not, in the judgment of the court, have made such a contract.

That the inability or unwillingness of the architect to make the certificate will not excuse its production has been established in the analogous case of insurance contracts, where the insurer's liability does not arise until the production of a certificate by some person designated or described in the contract. In the leading case in this State, the person thus designated was a clergyman, who declined to certify to the amount of loss, because he had no such knowledge of the property consumed as would justify him in so doing. All the judges concurred in holding that the procuring of the required certificate was a condition precedent, and that its nonproduction was not excused by reason of the inability or unwillingness of the clergyman to make the certificate. Roumagne v. Mechanics Ins. Co. 13 N. J. L. 110.

The case was afterwards overruled upon another point, but the doctrine for which I have cited it has not been questioned. In that case the court approved and followed Worsley v. Wood, 6 T. R. 710, where it was held, in an action on such an insurance contract, that the "unjust and wrongful" refusal of the minister and church wardens (who by the terms of the contract were to certify to the loss) to make the certificate would not excuse its nonproduction. This doctrine generally prevails in reference to such conditions contained in insurance contracts. Johnson v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 49; Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 25 [7 L. ed. 835]; 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 507 [9 L. ed. 512]; 2 Wood, Ins. § 416, and cases in note.

Had courts applied to these analogous cases the rule of construction contended for here, it is obvious they might have discovered other exceptions from the contract.

So it is to be noted that when courts thus construe conditions precedent contained in building contracts they have not limited the exception to the case of fraud on the part of the certifying architect. Thus, in Bovary Nat. Bank v. New York, 68 N. Y. 386, the Court of Appeals of New York held an unreasonable withholding of such a certificate a sufficient excuse for its nonproduction; and in Batchelor v. Kirkbride, 26 Fed. Rep. 899, Mr. Justice Bradley is reported to have charged a jury, in an action involving such a contract, that if the architect withheld his certificate fraudulently or unreasonably, and without collusion with the owner, its production would be excused.

Such constructions obviously deprive the owner of the protection he sought to secure; for he required the builder to stipulate that no liability should exist until a person in whom he had confidence should certify to certain facts necessary to his protection. The builder, being master of the contract he should make, chose to submit to the requirement. But, as now construed, the owner is made liable, not on the expressed judgment of the person selected by him, but on the verdict of a jury determining whether that person withheld his judgment honestly or fraudulently, reasonably or unreasonably. The owner may well say, Non in hac fide-ra teni. It is urged that the architect in such cases occupies a position like that of an arbitrator whose award may be set aside for fraud. But it is settled that an award cannot be thus dealt with, except where the submission has been made a rule of court, in which case the court exercises an equitable jurisdiction. Sherron v. Wood, 10 N. J. L. 7.

The result is that I cannot yield to the construction of this contract, which finds an exception to its terms in the case of an impossibility arising from the mere act of the architect, with which the owner had nothing to do.

The remaining question is whether the count exhibits any other excuse for nonproduction of the certificate. Such an excuse would exist if the owner had prevented its production. Where performance of such a condition precedent has been prevented by the party who is to become liable on performance, prevention takes the place of performance and the liability will arise. 2 Langd. Cas. Cont. 1087; Add. Cont. § 826; Bull. N. P. 161; Hotham v. East India Co. 1 T. R. 688; 1 Benj. Sales, 106, and note.

If, therefore, the owner has procured or induced the architect to fraudulently withhold the required certificate, his liability will arise without its production; for his act has thus prevented performance, and he will not be permitted to thus defeat his liability. This was the view of Mr. Justice Knapp in Byrne v. Sisters of Charity, 45 N. J. L. 214.

There has been some vacillation in the English decisions with respect to this doctrine. In Milner v. Field, 5 Exch. 829, the withholding of such a certificate by fraud and collusion with the owner was held only to give a right to a cross action.

In Clarke v. Watson, 18 C. B. N. S. 278, it was intimated that, if an owner colluded with a surveyor to withhold such a certificate, he could shelter himself from liability under such wrongful act.

But in Batterbury v. Vye, 9 Hurl. & C. 42, a declaration on a building contract which stipulated for the production of an architect's certificate before liability should attach was held to be good, because it averred that its nonproduction was caused by the neglect of the architect in collusion with, and by the procurement of, the owner. The doctrine of the case last cited must, in my judgment, prevail, for it imposes a just obligation on the owner, and prevents his gaining advantage from his own wrong. Does the count in question show such an excuse? The contention is that the owner's collusion with the architect may be inferred from the averment that the owner refused to pay after the conduct of the architect had been "brought to his knowledge." It is not averred upon what ground his refusal was put, and since it may have been on other grounds, the charge does not necessarily import collusion or procurement. In my opinion, the demurrer was properly interposed to this count.

It is proper to point out that the case before us does not show the relation between the owner and the architect. When the latter is so employed as to become the agent of the owner with respect to the building, a new element is introduced which may require a different result. The adverse cases in other courts show, in some instances, the existence of such a state of facts.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO MUTUAL LIFE INDEMNITY ASSOCIATION et al., Appts.,

v.

George HUNT, Attorney-General.

1. Jurisdiction to decree the dissolution of a corporation may be conferred upon courts of equity by statute; and such jurisdiction is so conferred by the Illinois Act of 1883 (1 Starr & C. 1345) in reference to mutual benefit societies.

2. A proceeding to dissolve a mutual benefit society, or to remove its officers, for failure to make proper reports, or for improperly conducting its business, instituted under § 10 of Act of 1883, is not a criminal prosecution within the meaning of section 23, article 3, Illinois Constitution which requires criminal prosecution to so that the exercise of corporate functions cannot be restored; (4) by forfeiture, which must be declared by judgment of the court. Penobscot Boom Co. v. Lamson, 15 Maine, 224, 33 Am. Dec. 600. As a general rule, to constitute a dissolution of a corporation by a surrender of its franchise, or misuser or nonuser, the surrender must be accepted by the government, or the default must be judicially ascertained and declared. Bradt v. Benedict, 17 N. Y. 99. The power to dissolve corporations for cause was always legal, and not equitable. This is familiar doctrine and never disputed. Cady v. Centreville Knit Goods Mfg. Co. 48 Mich. 189. See Atty-Gen. v. Bank of Michigan, Hart. Ch. (Mich.) 315; Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 1 Edw. Ch. 84, 3 Paige, 428; Gaylord v. Fort Wayne, M. & C. R. Co. 6 Biss. 288; Atty-Gen. v. Tudor Ice Co. 104 Mass. 389.

be carried on "in the name and by the authority of the People of the State of Illinois," but is a civil proceeding to protect property rights, and may be brought in equity, by the Attorney-General in his own name.

2. Minors are not, merely because of their minority, disqualified from becoming members of mutual benefit societies, in the absence of any statute on the subject; and their admission is not such a violation of the policy of the law as will subject such a society to dissolution.

3. The use of advance mortuary assessments to pay current expenses is such a violation of law as will warrant the dissolution of a mutual benefit society, where the statute provides that no part of the funds collected for the payment of death benefits shall be applied for any other purpose.

4. The creation of a Tontine Reserve Fund, to be distributed among permanent members after a certain period, out of moneys collected for death benefits, is a violation of the statute which requires such moneys to be devoted to payment of death benefits only, and will warrant a dissolution of the society.

5. A promise to members to refund to them, at the expiration of a certain period, all the reserve fund to which they would be equitably entitled, is a violation of the statutory prohibition against the receipt by members of mutual benefit societies of any money as profit.

6. Limiting and perpetuating the administration of the society in the hands of the manager and secretary, by means of a system of blank proxies unadvisedly signed by applicants for membership, is a violation of the provision of the statute requiring the affairs of mutual benefit societies to be managed by not less than five trustees.

7. Numbering certificates of membership much higher than the actual number issued operates as a fraud upon those becoming members in reliance upon such false numbers, and is an improper practice, whether or not done with an actual intent to deceive and defraud.

8. It is a breach of official duty for the officers of a mutual benefit society to fail to keep correct and intelligible books of account, whether such failure results from design, carelessness or want of skill.

(January 25, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendants, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Cook County dissolving a mutual benefit society, on an information in equity by the Attorney-General. Affirmed.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George Hunt, Atty-Gen., Campbell & Custer and Joseph A. Griffin for appellee.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding instituted by the Attorney-General under the 12th section of the Act of 1848, providing for the organization and management of mutual benefit societies. 1 Starr & Curtis, Stat. 1348.

That section provides that whenever any corporation, association or society, organized or having transacted business under the provisions of said Act, shall neglect or refuse to make its annual statements as required by the Act, or whenever the auditor shall find, upon examination, as provided in section 10 of the Act, that any willfully false or untrue statements in any material respect have been made, or that the business of the corporation, association or society has been conducted fraudulently, or in willful violation of any of the provisions of the Act, or that the corporation has transacted business different from that authorized by its certificate of incorporation, "he shall communicate the fact to the Attorney-General, whose duty it shall be to apply to the circuit court where its principal office is located, for an order requiring the officers, or directors, trustees or managers of such corporation to show cause why they should not be removed from office, or its business closed; and the court shall thereupon hear the allegations and proofs of the respective parties; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said court that any one or more of them have been guilty of fraud or any material irregularity or violation of law to the injury of said corporation, association or society, or of noncompliance with any of the provisions of this Act, the court shall decree a removal from office of the guilty party or parties, which decree shall forever debar him or them from holding a similar office, and shall substitute a suitable person or persons to serve until the regular annual meeting, or until a successor or successors are regularly chosen or elected, or if it shall appear to said court that the interests of its members or the general public so require, the court may decree a dissolution of such corporation, association or society, and a distribution of its effects."

Counsel for the association insist that the Attorney-General was without authority to institute the present proceeding, because, as they allege, no sufficient report was made to him by the auditor of public accounts. The contention is that such report was jurisdictional, or rather a condition precedent, and that until it was made, the Attorney-General had no power to act. And it is further argued that, to justify the institution of proceedings, the report of the auditor should have contained, not merely the conclusions at which he arrived from an examination of the affairs of the association, but also the facts upon which those conclusions were founded.

We are of the opinion that the power of the Attorney-General to file the information in no way depended upon the communication made to him by the auditor, but came within the purview of those powers which are inherent in his office. See Hunt v. Chicago Home B. Co. 20 Ill. App. 255; 8 Q. 11 West. Rep. 41, 181 Ill. 638.

The section of the statute under consideration conferred no new powers upon him, but vested the auditor with the supervision of associations organized under the statute, and made it the duty of the Attorney-General to take proper legal proceedings whenever the auditor should communicate to him the fact that an association or its officers had so conducted as to give occasion for the removal of the officers from their offices, or the closing of the business of the association.

When being abandoned by common consent, a court of equity has jurisdiction to decree a dissolution, and to distribute the common fund among the several contributors in proportion to the amount contributed or paid by them respectively. Burke v. Hoper, 19 Ala. 133. They may be dissolved by forfeiture of their franchises and judgment of dissolution obtained in a proper judicial proceeding. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1004.

Jurisdiction of courts of equity. Chancery has jurisdiction to enjoin a corporation from abuse or excess of franchise, or other violation of public law to public detriment, on information in equity, filed as office by the Attorney-General. Atty-Gen. v. Bank of Niagara, 104 N. Y. 314; Atty-Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 25 Wm. 543. But it cannot take cognition of stance of a nation, on procuring a judgment, or Ins. Co. v. Evans, 1 N. Y. 2 John. 133; Mass. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 1 N. Y. 2 John. 133. It cannot take cognition of stance of a nation, on procuring a judgment, or Ins. Co. v. Evans, 1 N. Y. 2 John. 133; Mass. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 1 N. Y. 2 John. 133. It cannot take cogni-

But even if this were otherwise, the communication by the auditor to the Attorney-General was sufficient to answer the requirements of the statute. The principal objection urged to it is that it stated conclusions, and not facts. In this counsel are clearly mistaken. The auditor's communication transmitted to the Attorney-General the report of an examination of the books, papers and affairs of the association by an expert employed for that purpose by the auditor, and requested him to institute proceedings under the section of the statute above quoted. The examiner's report consisted in part of a detailed statement of the facts ascertained on the examination, and copies of forms and documents used by the association in the management of its business, and in part of deductions and conclusions drawn by the examiner therefrom. It is perhaps not altogether formal in its statement of conclusions, but when considered either in relation to the facts stated or the conclusions drawn, it is clearly sufficient to show the existence of one or more of the grounds enumerated by the statute upon which it became the duty of the Attorney-General to institute proceedings against the association.

It should be observed that no particular form is prescribed by the statute for the communication by the auditor to the Attorney-General. It is only provided that when the auditor, on examination, finds either that the annual statement of the association is willfully false in some material respect, or, that the business of the association has been conducted fraudulently or in violation of some provision of the statute, or that the association has transacted business different from that authorized by its certificate of incorporation, "he shall communicate the fact,"—that is, the fact of having so found—to the Attorney-General. The mode of making the communication is left entirely with the auditor. It doubtless may be made by communicating the finding alone, but we see no objection to the mode adopted in this case, viz., by transmitting to the Attorney-General the entire report of the examiner, so long as it shows one or more of the necessary findings.

In such cases the general rules of equity jurisprudence and partnership apply. Gorman v. Russell, 14 Cal. 331; Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 57. The jurisdiction of courts of equity over such voluntary associations and their funds is maintained, independent of the Statute of Uses, or of any prerogative power, on the ground of the trust nature of the fund, the charitable uses for which it is designed, and the inadequacy of legal remedies. Burke v. Hoper, 19 Ala. 133. Courts of equity will always interfere with all voluntary associations wherever necessary in the interests of their members, or society, or to prevent injustice, imposition or fraud, and will act on the same general principles invoked and practiced in partnership cases. Lowry v. Stotter, 7 Phila. 297; Torrey v. Howard, 10 Am. & Pa. 423; Bacon, Ben. Societies, § 57. A new association being formed on the dissolution of the old, composed of some of the members with other persons, members of the same church, and made subject to such laws and restrictions as the church might prescribe, while an unauthorized dismissal of some of the members by the arbitrary act of the minister in charge, without a trial or hearing, might afford grounds for legal proceedings to compel their restoration, such nugatory act would not authorize a court of equity, at their instance, to decree a dissolution of the association, or a distribution of the common fund among the members. Burke v. Hoper, 19 Ala. 133.*

It is urged that a court of chancery has no jurisdiction. This contention is based upon the theory that the proceeding is in the nature of a quo warranto to remove the officers of the association from office and impose upon them the penalty prescribed by the statute, viz.: that of debarring them from afterward holding a similar office, or, to oust the association of its corporate franchise and distribute its effects. It is said that the proceeding, so far at least as it relates to the officers of the association, is highly penal, and so not within the proper jurisdiction of a court of equity.

It will be noticed that the relief provided by the statute is in the alternative, viz.: the removal of the officers from office and the appointment of others in their places, the decree to operate, as a legal consequence, to debar the persons removed from office from afterward holding a similar office, or the dissolution of the association and the distribution of its effects. As the court saw fit to apply the latter remedy only, we have nothing to do with the question of its jurisdiction to administer the former, and the case may be decided precisely as though the dissolution of the association and the distribution of its effects was the only mode of relief provided by the statute.

It is doubtless the rule that, in the absence of statutory provisions, courts of equity have no jurisdiction to decree the dissolution of a corporation by forfeiture of its franchises, either at the suit of an individual or at the suit of the State. Atty-Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 871; Blee v. Bloom, 5 Johns. Ch. 806; State v. Merchants Ins. & T. Co. 8 Humph. 285; Atty-Gen. v. Bank of Niagara, 1 Hopk. Ch. 354; Doremus v. Dutch Reformed Church, 8 N. J. Eq. 832; Doyle v. Peerless Petroleum Co. 44 Barb. 289; Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 1 Edw. Ch. 88; Strong v. McGagg, 55 Wis. 624; 2 Morawetz, Corp. § 1040.

But in the cases holding this rule it is uniformly admitted, whenever the question has arisen, that jurisdiction to decree the dissolution of a corporation may be conferred upon courts of equity by statute.

In this State statutes have been passed vesting courts of equity with jurisdiction to decree the dissolution of corporations in a great variety of cases. Thus, by the twenty-fifth section of the statute in relation to corporations, courts of equity are given full power, on good cause shown, as a portion of the relief provided for by that section, to dissolve or close up the business of a corporation organized under that Act, and to appoint a receiver of its effects. 1 Starr & Curtiss, Stat. 618.

Similar power is given by the twenty-fifth section of the statute in relation to fire, marine and inland navigation insurance companies (Id. 1824); also by the Act of February 17, 1884, in regard to the dissolution of insurance companies. Id. 1853.

Under neither of these statutes has the power of courts of equity to decree the dissolution of corporations in proper cases been seriously questioned; but when properly invoked, it has been uniformly exercised. St. Louis & S. Coal & Min. Co. v. Sandoval Coal & Min. Co. 2 West. Rep. 620, 116 Ill. 170; Life Association of America v. Fassett, 102 Ill. 815. Such power was directly affirmed by this court, after full and elaborate consideration, in Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593, and Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82; and the question therefore is no longer an open one.

The point made by counsel, that, by transferring jurisdiction of suits to dissolve corporations from courts of law to courts of equity, the corporations affected are deprived of the right of a trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution, is fully and satisfactorily answered by the opinion of the court in Ward v. Farwell, supra; and the argument there made need not be repeated here.

Nor is the position well taken that the present suit is in the nature of a criminal prosecution, and therefore required by section 83, article 6, of the Constitution, to be carried on "in the name and by the authority of the People of the State of Illinois." It is true a quo warranto has been held to be a criminal proceeding within the meaning of the Constitution, but this is neither a quo warranto nor its equivalent. It is a civil proceeding of a special statutory character, and is brought for the purpose of protecting and enforcing property rights. Its primary object is not to punish the corporation or its officers for an abuse of the corporate franchise, but to enforce a due administration of the trust reposed by the corporation in its officers. Accordingly, when those officers have been guilty of fraud or some material irregularity or violation of law, to the injury of the corporation, or some noncompliance with the provisions of the statute under which the corporation was organized, a court of chancery is authorized to interpose for the preservation of the property rights of members and creditors and for the protection of the general public, by taking the administration of the affairs of the corporation from the hands of the delinquent officers and placing it in the hands of other suitable persons, or, if the interests of the members or the general public so require, by winding up its business and distributing its effects, and, as incidental to such relief, by decreeing a dissolution of the corporation. It will thus be seen that the proceeding partakes of none of the elements of a criminal prosecution, but is purely a civil remedy, and one which falls directly within the proper domain of chancery jurisdiction.

The information contains a large number of charges against the association and its officers, of acts and modes of proceeding which are alleged to be unlawful. The defendants' answer, as a general rule, denies the charges thus made, although it at the same time admits some of the acts alleged and insists that such acts were not unlawful. We have thus to determine from the pleadings and evidence whether any and which of the charges made are established, and whether the charges so established are legally sufficient to warrant the present proceedings and decree.

One of the charges upon which considerable stress is laid, and upon which the court below found in favor of the Attorney-General, is that of admitting minors to membership. The statute requires that the certificate of association shall state, among other things, "the limits as to age of applicants for membership," and, in pursuance of that requirement, the certificate of association in this case, which was submitted to and approved by the auditor and by him transmitted to the Secretary of State, and upon which the latter issued the certificate of organization, provided that "No person shall become a member who is under ten or over seventy years of age." It appears from the evidence and the defendants' admissions that, of about six hundred members belonging to the association, something over sixty were admitted under the age of twenty-one years, some of them being but little past the minimum age. Was their admission unlawful?

The statute under which the association was organized is silent on the subject, nor do we find any statute which either expressly, or, so far as we can discover, by implication, either permits or forbids their admission to membership. If, then, minors are ineligible, such ineligibility arises from some principle growing out of the nature and objects of these associations, or the policy of the law applicable thereto.

The contention is that the certificate of membership is a personal contract between the member and the association, and that as an infant is capable of making only a voidable contract, his admission to membership is a violation of those principles of mutuality which lie at the basis of mutual benefit societies. We may admit in the broadest sense that these societies are founded upon the principle of entire mutuality in relation to burdens as well as benefits; yet we are unable to see how that principle places the membership of infants upon any footing different from that of adults.

While the certificate of membership is a contract, such contract, in the absence of express stipulations to the contrary, is purely unilateral. It may be enforced against the association where the member has performed all the prescribed conditions, but none of its stipulations are enforceable against the member. If he fails to pay his assessments or dues, or does any act forbidden by the certificate of membership, the certificate becomes void and the membership ceases. But the making of an assessment or the maturing of dues does not make the member a debtor to the association so as to authorize it to bring a suit for its recovery in case of his neglect or refusal to pay. Payment is left wholly to his discretion. The contract then not being one which has the legal effect of binding him to the payment of any money or the performance of any condition, we cannot see how it can be at all important whether it is voidable or otherwise. Performance is no more left to the option of the member where the contract is made by an infant than when made by an adult. If an infant performs the conditions prescribed in the certificate, he, the same as an adult, becomes entitled to the benefits thereby secured. If he fails to perform, his membership ceases, and that is all.

We do not assent to the view that, as a further consequence of his disability, he may recover back the dues and assessments he may have already paid. "If an infant advances money on a voidable contract which he afterwards rescinds, he cannot recover this money back because it is lost to him by his own act, and the privilege of infancy does not extend so far as to restore this money unless it was obtained by fraud." 1 Parsons, Contracts, 332.

Nor are we able to see any force in the suggestion that minors should not be admitted to membership because of their incapacity to act as trustees, or to perform the duties of members at corporate meetings, such as consulting or giving advice for the mutual benefit of the members, voting for officers, and the like. We know of no reason why the capacity to act as trustee should be a necessary qualification for membership. If a sufficient number of members possess the requisite capacity, so as to afford the members a reasonable and proper range of choice in the selection of trustees, the admission of others who are not thus qualified can work no injury to anybody.

It will not be claimed that the want of the requisite intelligence or business experience on the part of an adult to qualify him to act as trustee would render him ineligible to membership, but these are quite as essential to the proper discharge of the duties of trustee as mere legal capacity. There would seem to be no legal obstacle in the way of minors taking part in corporate meetings, consulting, advising, or even voting. The only objection to their doing so grows out of their inexperience and the immaturity of their judgments, but these are disqualifications which are not necessarily confined to persons under the age of twenty-one years; and no one would allege them as a legal bar to the admission of an adult to membership.

It should be remembered that in this proceeding we have nothing to do with the good or bad policy, in an economic or business point of view, of admitting minors to membership. Whether it was wise or unwise is not the question. We have only to determine whether it was such a violation of the rules or policy of the law as should subject the association to dissolution. On this point we are unable to agree with the learned chancellor before whom the cause was heard, our opinion being that, so far as this charge is concerned, the decree is not sustained.

But there are other charges, either admitted or proved, of acts on the part of the association and its officers, which constitute such violations of law as warrant the dissolution of the association. Prominent among these is that which relates to the use by the association of the advance mortuary assessment for the payment of current expenses. The by-laws of the association provided that all persons becoming members should be required to pay a certain admission fee, the annual dues for one year, and one advance mortuary assessment. The money derived from this assessment was set apart and treated as a mortuary fund until February 16, 1886, at which date the trustees adopted a resolution authorizing the manager to use the advance mortuary assessment in defraying current expenses, the same to be replaced to the credit of the association from annual dues as soon as expedient. After the adoption of this resolution, the advance mortuary assessment or the larger portion of it was used by the manager for expenses; and as a consequence, at the time of filing the information, there was a large deficiency in the mortuary fund, if the advance mortuary assessment is to be treated as a part of that fund.

The defendants admit the adoption of said resolution and the subsequent use of the advance mortuary assessment as alleged, but content that the association had the legal right to so use it.

The sixth section of the statute under which the association was organized provides that "No part of the funds collected for the payment of death benefits shall be applied for any other purpose." There can be no doubt that the advance mortuary assessment was money collected for the payment of death benefits, within the meaning of the statute. That is the clear import of the name under which it was collected; and if it was in fact designed for any other purpose, the very name and pretense under which the money was demanded, were of themselves a palpable fraud upon the members paying it. Not only is this so, but the circulars and other publications distributed by the association for the purpose of advertising its scheme and inducing those who might read them to apply for membership, represented that all expenses were to be paid out of the membership fees and the annual dues; and such was doubtless the understanding of most, if not all, who became members. The use of the money thus obtained for current expenses was not only a fraud upon the members, but a clear, palpable and inexcusable violation of law.

The eighth section of said statute provides that associations organized thereunder may provide by their by-laws for the accumulation of a surplus, general or guaranty fund, to be invested in a manner particularly specified; and that such fund, when so set apart and invested shall, with the increase thereof, belong to such association and not to the directors, trustees, managers or officers thereof, "and shall be used only for mortuary benefits, without assessment, or applied in payment of future assessments, or otherwise used for the promotion of the object or objects for which such funds are specially provided and set apart; and such use shall not be deemed or construed to mean a profit received by members within the meaning of the statutes of this State."

The defendants' certificate of association provided, as a part of the plan upon which the association was formed, that 25 per cent of the assessments for death benefits should constitute a guaranty fund to be known as the "Tontine Reserve Fund," and that for the apportionment of such fund the association should be divided into classes by years, the portion of such fund contributed during ten years by members of each class, together with the accumulations, to be apportioned equitably among the surviving persistent members of that class. We think it clear that such disposition of the reserve fund was in direct violation of the letter, as well as the spirit, of the statute. The moneys from which it was to be accumulated, viz.: those collected for the payment of death benefits, were dedicated and set apart by the statute to that purpose alone, and any other application of them was expressly prohibited. It follows that a reserve fund accumulated from that source could be lawfully applied to no other purpose than that of paying death benefits. But in addition to this, the section of the statute permitting the accumulation of such fund expressly provided that the fund should belong to the association—a provision which necessarily excludes the idea of its belonging to or being distributable among the persistent surviving members of a particular class.

Doubtless it was the intention of the statute, in providing for the accumulation of a reserve fund, to place the association in such condition as to be able to pay its death benefits with greater promptness and certainty, and perhaps to provide against unexpected drafts upon its resources by extraordinary mortality caused by the visitation of epidemic diseases when the ordinary death assessments would be likely to prove insufficient. It thus appears that the plan upon which the association was formed, so far as it relates to the disposition to be made of its reserve fund, was in direct violation of law.

The information charges that the association, in order to obtain applications for membership, held out to the world that it had a legal right to, and would at the option of a member, refund to him in cash, at the expiration of the period of ten years, all the reserve fund to which he would be equitably entitled, in accordance with the plan upon which that fund was being accumulated. This charge is admitted, and the claim is made that the association had the right to offer and make such payment. That such payment would be unlawful follows from what has been said, as well as from the further reason that it would be an allowance to the member of money from the association as a profit.

The payment promised, it will be observed, was not of the unexpended balance of the assessment paid by the member, or such balance and interest, but the equitable share of the member as one of the surviving persistent members of the particular class to which the fund accumulated at the expiration of the tontine period was to belong. That share would manifestly be increased by the lapsing of the interest in the fund of all members who during the period should cease to be such by delinquency or otherwise, thus clearly introducing into the proposed payments the element of profit. The statute expressly forbids the receipt by members of associations organized thereunder of any money as profit; and it therefore follows that the payment promised to members at the expiration of the tontine period was in direct violation of its terms.

We are also of the opinion that there was a clear violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the statute in the mode adopted for the election of officers, by which the virtual control and management of the association was taken from the board of trustees and vested in the manager and secretary. The statute provides that the affairs of all associations organized thereunder shall be managed by not less than five directors, trustees or managers, who shall be elected from and by the members, at such time and place and for such period, not exceeding three years, as may be provided for in the by-laws. The certificate of association provided that the management of the association should be vested in a board of eight trustees, who were to be elected annually.

At first the manager and secretary were appointed by the board of trustees, but in consequence of some friction between the manager and the first board of trustees in relation to the proper mode of conducting the affairs of the association, a resolution was proposed and adopted at the meeting of the association held in January, 1886, providing that the manager and secretary should thereafter be elected annually by the members. It appears that the blank applications for membership then in use by the association had printed upon them a blank proxy authorizing the person whose name should be inserted therein to act and vote for the member at all meetings of the association; and underneath it was a request to the applicant for membership to sign it in blank, to be filled up by the secretary. In accordance with this request a large number of these proxies were signed in blank and transmitted to the secretary.

It does not distinctly appear whether the proxies thus obtained were ever in fact used at the corporate meetings of the association, nor does it seem to us to be very important whether they were or not. The resolution changing the mode of electing the manager and secretary and making them practically independent of the board of trustees, was adopted mainly by the use of proxies, either the ones indorsed on the applications for membership or others. After the adoption of that resolution, the mere possession, by the secretary and manager, of a sufficient number of proxies to control all elections and other corporate action, and to perpetuate themselves in power, was repugnant to the principles upon which the association was founded, and a clear abuse of the opportunities which their official positions afforded them. It took the control and management of the association from the body to which both the statute and the articles of association committed it, and placed it in the irresponsible hands of two of the subordinate officers.

We cannot for a moment suppose that so large a number of applicants for membership signed documents so utterly destructive of the very purposes and objects of the association understandingly, and properly appreciating the consequences of their action. The circumstances tend rather to the conclusion that they were led to suppose that the execution of the proxy was a condition precedent to their admission to membership, and that they therefore signed unadvisedly and without understanding or properly considering what they were doing. An improper and unlawful advantage of the members was thus taken on their admission into the association.

After the adoption of the resolution of January, 1886, the board of trustees gave but very little actual attention to the affairs of the association, and that only in a perfunctory manner, and, as we may well assume, at the dictation of the manager and secretary. The latter were the real governing authority, and conducted the business of the association as they saw fit. This was a palpable subversion of the rules of law as well as a fraud upon the members, and justly subjected the association to proceedings by the Attorney-General for its dissolution.

The information accuses the officers of the association of false representations as to various matters. Of these one is admitted by the answer, although the fraudulent intent is denied. That consists of issuing certificates of membership numbered, but not consecutively—a particular certificate being thus given a number very much larger than the total number of certificates issued up to that date. The answer alleges that this was done for the purpose of preventing rival associations from ascertaining the amount of business done by the defendant.

Whether this was the true purpose or not, there is no evidence that any means were taken to apprise applicants of the actual number of certificates issued; nor does it appear that they had any knowledge on that subject; and as by the terms of the certificates the amount of the benefits payable on the death of a member depended upon the number of members in good standing at the time of his death, the issuing of certificates with numbers much larger than the number of certificates previously issued had a direct tendency to deceive members receiving certificates as to their value. Whether intended or not, this mode of issuing certificates operated as an actual fraud upon those becoming members, and the result, so far as concerns those actually deceived, was the same as though the misnumbering of the certificates had been adopted with an actual intent to deceive and defraud.

It is also alleged that the annual statement to the auditor was false in its report of the financial condition of the association. Whether said statement is false or not in the particular pointed out depends upon the right of the association to use the advance mortuary assessments for current expenses. As we hold that it had no such right, it follows that the statement was incorrect by the amount the mortuary and tontine funds had been depleted by the misappropriation of the advance mortuary assessments.

It is urged that this was a mistake of law honestly made, which ought not to subject the association to proceedings by the Attorney-General for its dissolution. The provision of the statute prohibiting the use of the mortuary assessments for any other purpose than that of paying death benefits is so plain and unambiguous that an honest mistake of law on that point seems scarcely possible. Besides, we are unable to see how a mistake of law can be set up in such case as a defense. The evidence, however, tends strongly to the conclusion that there was no mistake, but that the officers of the association acted in the matter with knowledge that they were violating a statutory prohibition. They claim to have taken legal advice; but it is by no means apparent that they took advice except from one of their own number, and it is not clear that such advice was sought in good faith or honestly believed to be correct. Another circumstance tends to the same conclusion, and that is that the officers studiously concealed from the auditor the fact that they were misappropriating the advance mortuary assessments in the manner above stated.

Again; in the statement to the auditor, the officers gave a negative answer to the question in the auditor's blank, whether the association undertook or promised to pay members during life, without regard to their physical condition, any sum of money or thing of value. It appears from what has already been said that his answer was false. The promise to pay to each member at the end of the period of ten years, if he chose to receive it, his equitable proportion of the reserve or tontine fund, was a promise to pay money to members during life without regard to their physical condition. So of the answer to the question for what purpose and how the reserve or tontine fund was created.

The answer given was that it was created for the purpose of meeting the advance of rate at the end of ten years from the date of entry, by reserving 25 per cent of the net amount of assessments. This was correct so far as it went, but was false in suppressing the fact that the fund might be withdrawn at the end of ten years. The suppression of a material fact called for by a question makes the answer as essentially false as would the affirmative assertion of an untruth.

Another, and in our judgment a very material, official delinquency is charged in the information, based upon the unmethodical, if not incorrect, manner in which the books of account of the association were kept. The evidence shows that the books containing the accounts of money received and expended were so confused and unsystematic that it was difficult, if not impossible, to derive therefrom any certain information as to the financial affairs of the association. The experts employed by the auditor, finding themselves unable to strike any balance from the books, were compelled to construct the accounts for themselves anew out of such original data as they were able to find. The failure of the officers of a mutual benefit association to keep correct and intelligible books of account, whether such failure results from design, carelessness or want of skill, is a serious breach of official duty. Such officers are trustees, having funds intrusted to their care, to be safely and honestly kept and administered, not for their own benefit, but solely for the promotion of the laudable objects for which the association is organized.

It is a duty of primary importance, incumbent on all trustees, to keep proper accounts of trust funds; for unless that is done, the beneficial owners of such funds are subjected to constant uncertainty as to their rights, and to a constant liability to be defrauded. Next to the duty of honestly administering a trust fund is that of keeping a true, honest and intelligible account of such administration.

Evidence was introduced tending to sustain various of the other charges made by the information, several of which the court below held to be sustained, and in which conclusion we are disposed to concur. It is unnecessary, however, for us to protract the discussion, as what has already been said is sufficient to show that in our opinion the decree is fully warranted by the evidence. It will therefore be affirmed.

THE first case is error to the Court of Common Pleas of Richland County, reserved in the District Court. Judgment for amount claimed, but without interest.

The second case is error to the Superior Court of Cincinnati. Judgment modified and affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

The plaintiff in error, Lee, was, at the commencement of the action, treasurer of Richland County. By his petition filed August 18, 1878, he sought to recover, as taxes for the year 1876, upon shares of stock owned by defendant, of the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Lake Shore Michigan Southern Railway Company, the sum of $1,024.84, and as taxes for the year 1877, upon stock of the same railway company, $591.78, together with 10 per cent penalty, in all $1,777.67, and interest. The taxes were placed upon the duplicate by the auditor after the semi-annual settlement with the treasurer, and penalty added, and the penalty so added and demanded is that provided for by section 2855 of the Revised Statutes.

The facts, as found by the district court, show that the Western Union Telegraph Company is a corporation organized under the Laws of the State of New York, and carries on the business of transmitting telegraphic dispatches through the State of Ohio and other States. It owns real estate, not in Ohio, exclusive of its line, of the value of $2,685,558.86. Its entire line is 78,955 miles; in Ohio it is 4,950 miles. Its property in this State consists of its line, telegraph apparatus, chemicals and office furniture. The property has been returned, and the company has paid taxes on it since 1872, from $10,000 to $15,000 each year.

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company is the result of a consolidation of a number of corporations of the States of Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York, the Ohio corporation being called The Lake Shore Railway Company. It owns a railroad from Buffalo, New York, to Chicago, Illinois, extending through Ohio and into each of the other States named; also feeders and branch lines. Its capital stock is $50,000,000, made up from the aggregate capital stock of the several corporations which were consolidated to create it. Of its track, 877 miles are in Ohio. The stock of the Lake Shore Company amounted to $15,000,000, and by the terms of the consolidation agreement, the owners of the stock of that corporation surrendered their stock and received a like amount of the stock of the consolidated company. Since 1870 the consolidated company has returned for taxation, and paid taxes on, its property in this State, consisting of its line of railroad, roadbeds, depots, station-houses, and the necessary real estate for the same, rolling stock, and other property, of the value of $13,000,000, payable in the year 1877, the sum of $286,817.88, on a valuation of less than one fourth its capital stock.

Upon the facts so found the district court ordered reserved to this court, as question of law, "whether or not shares of the capital stock of the said The Western Union Telegraph Company, and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company are taxable in the hands of individual owners of the same, who are residents of the State of Ohio?" which is the only question in this case.

The plaintiff in error, The Western Insurance Company of Cincinnati, seeks to enjoin the Treasurer of Hamilton County, Ratterman, from collecting taxes assessed against the company for the year 1886, to the amount of $681.80, upon shares of stock owned by the company of the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago Railway Company, and of the stock of the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago Railway Company. The taxes were entered upon the tax duplicate by the auditor by way of correction of the return made by the company. In the superior court a motion to strike from the petition, as irrelevant and as surplusage, the following paragraph was sustained, viz.:

"Since the year 1852, the Statutes of Ohio relating to the taxation of investments in stocks or corporations have been substantially the same as those in force on the day following the second Monday of April, 1886, and in all this period said statutes have been construed, not only by the people of the State of Ohio, generally, but by the officers charged with the execution thereof, as not requiring the owners of shares of stock in railway corporations, the capital of which is divided into shares which are transferable by each owner without the consent of the other stockholders, and part of the line of the railway of which lies within the State of Ohio, to list the same for taxation, or authorizing the officers of said State to tax the same against the owner thereof, and that at the time property was required to be listed for taxation in 1886, there was no law of Ohio, as plaintiff believes and charges, which subjected said shares of stock to taxation in the hands of the owners thereof."

The sustaining of this motion is one of the grounds of error.

Defendant filed a cross petition, asking to recover $681.80 taxes and 15 per centum penalty.

The Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago Railway Company is an Indiana corporation. Of a total of 177.47 miles of road, 20.64 miles are in Ohio, the remainder in Indiana. Of a capital stock of $7,000,000, the property on which the corporation pays taxes in Ohio is $477,609. The value of the capital stock at the time of this assessment was $4,655,000, or $66.50 on each $100 of stock, the taxes paid being on a valuation of a little over one tenth the value of its capital stock.

The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway Company is a corporation organized under the Laws of Pennsylvania, Indiana and Illinois, owning a line of railway from Pittsburgh, Penna., across Ohio and Indiana to Chicago, Illinois. Its entire line is 488.82 miles, of which 251.65 are in Ohio. Its capital stock was valued in April, 1886, at $40,553,148.99, and it paid taxes on property in Ohio valued at $8,749,197, being something over one fifth the value of its stock.

The insurance company included these stocks in its return to the auditor, placing them under the head of securities not subject to taxation.

In the superior court judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant for the amount of taxes and penalty claimed in his cross petition, which judgment was affirmed at general term; and it is to reverse this judgment that this proceeding in error is brought.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The duty of putting in form the views of the majority of the court upon the issues raised in these cases having been placed upon the writer, he approaches its performance with a grave sense of the importance of the questions involved, and of the difficulties surrounding their satisfactory solution. The court has been favored, from the thirty-five eminent counsel appearing in the cases, with something over four hundred pages of printed argument, all of which has been read and duly considered. Obviously it is not practicable to review, or even in terms notice, all the points urged; and the writer will content himself with announcing the conclusions reached by the majority, and adding such considerations as occur in the progress of their statement.

The questions arising upon the record are: (1) whether shares of stock held by citizens of Ohio in a foreign corporation, which has in this State substantial property upon which it pays taxes, are taxable here; and (2) whether shares so held of stock of a consolidated railroad company are taxable here, where the company is formed by consolidation of an Ohio company with companies of other States, and has substantial property in the State on which it pays taxes—the larger portion of its property being without the State.

The claim against their taxability is substantially that (1) the Legislature has not authorized such a tax—or, in other words, there is no law for it; (2) it has authorized holders of such shares to omit them from their tax returns; (3) the tax laws have been thus construed from their inception, by the taxing officers and tax payers; and (4) the levying of taxes upon such shares would impose unequal burdens and would result in double taxation.

It is believed that as to the telegraph stock, at least, previous decisions of this court have practically determined the controversy, if, indeed, they have not disposed of all the questions in the cases. We will now refer to those decisions in connection with the constitutional and statutory provisions which affect the questions.

Section 2 of article 12 of the Constitution provides that "Laws shall be passed taxing by a uniform rule all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies or otherwise; and also all real and personal property, according to its true value in money," and that "Personal property to an amount not exceeding in value $200 for each individual may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation."

Section 1 of the Act of April 5, 1859 (S. & C. 1488), entitled "An Act for the Assessment and Taxation of all Property in this State, and for Levying Taxes Thereon According to its True Value in Money" (which Act is now codified in Revised Statutes as section 2730 and following), is as follows: "That all property, whether real or personal, in this State, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies or otherwise of persons residing therein; the property of corporations and the property of all banks or banking companies now existing or hereafter created, and of all bankers, except such as is hereinafter expressly exempted—shall be subject to taxation; and such property, moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies or otherwise, or the value thereof, shall be entered on the list of taxable property for that purpose, in the manner prescribed by this Act."

Section 2 defines the term "investments in stocks" in these words:

"The term 'investments in stocks,' wherever used in this Act, shall be held to mean and include all moneys invested in the public stocks of this or any other State, or of the United States, or any association, corporation, joint stock company or otherwise, the stock or capital of which is or may be divided into shares, which are transferable by each owner without the consent of the other partners or stockholders, for the taxation of which no special provision is made by this Act, held by persons residing in this State, either for themselves or as guardians, trustees or agents."

The 9th subdivision of section 8 provides that "No person shall be required to include in his statement as a part of the personal property moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies or otherwise, which he is required to list, any share or portion of the capital or property of any company or corporation which is required to list or return its capital and property for taxation in this State."

Section 59 of the Act provides that "No person shall be required to list for taxation any certificate of the capital stock of any company the capital stock of which is taxed in the name of said company."

It is clear that the purpose of section 1 is to tax all investments in stocks held within the State. This we are bound to assume, for every presumption is in favor of that construction of the law which gives effect to the requirement of the section of the Constitution referred to; and we are forced to the conclusion that the General Assembly, in enacting this law, intended, so far as the complex nature of human business affairs should make it practicable, to include within the taxing provisions all property within the State, and not to exceed in its exemptions the limit prescribed, as to persons, of "personal property not exceeding in value two hundred dollars for each individual." And, further, that where an exception or exemption is claimed, the intention of the General Assembly to except must be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. Oincinnati Colleges v. State, 19 Ohio, 110; Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665 [29 L. ed. 770]; Farrington v. Tenn. 95 U. S. 679 [24 L. ed. 558]; Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. v. Guffey, 120 U. S. 509 [30 L. ed. 783]; Portland, S. & P. R. Co. v. Saco, 60 Maine, 196; Lima v. Cemetery Assn. 43 Ohio St. 128.

It seems equally clear that the legislative purpose was to tax all the property of corporations as well as all investments in stocks.

The stock in question comes within the description contained in sections 1 and 2 above quoted. It follows that, if this Act be valid, the stocks sought to be taxed here are properly taxable unless it is made clearly to appear that they are, in whole or in part, within the spirit and letter of the exceptions. That the Act is valid, and that stocks held here in foreign corporations may be taxed, was distinctly held in Worthington v. Sebastian, 25 Ohio St. 1.

It may be assumed that "capital stock" and "capital and property" mean practically the same thing. Primarily the capital stock is the money paid in by the stockholders in compliance with the terms of their subscriptions. It soon, however, takes the form of real estate, or personal property, or both, including machinery, buildings, credits, rights in action, etc.; so that it may here be taken to mean personal property, and such real estate as may be necessary to the daily operations of the company, and of its moneys and credits. The capital is thus represented by the property in which it has been invested.

The claim is that this company does list in conformity with the statute, because it lists that part of its property which is in Ohio, and that to require the shares of stock to be listed by the stockholders would result in double taxation. The facts show that about one sixteenth of its line is in Ohio. A very small part is returned for taxation here, and taxes are paid upon that small portion. The great bulk is without the State and beyond its reach. It falls far short of meeting the letter and spirit of the words, "its capital and property." The language is not "to return its capital and property within the State for taxation," but is to "return its capital and property for taxation in this State." The "capital and property" is not a small part of it.

We cannot say that so much of the valuation as has been assessed in Ohio in the name of the company may be deducted from the value of the shares, and the balance taxed. We must take the statute as we find it. We cannot interpolate words and make the clause read as though written "which is required to list or return a part of its capital and property," or the other read as though written "any portion of the capital stock of which is taxed in the name of the company." Had the General Assembly intended this meaning, it would have used apt words to express it.

Nor is it apparent that double taxation would follow. The shares of stock are distinct from the capital or property of the company. That may be largely real estate; the shares are in the nature of personalty. They can have no locality, and must, therefore, of necessity, follow the person of the owner, unless other provision is made by statute. The corporation is the legal owner of all the property of the company, real and personal; and within the powers conferred upon it by its charter, and for the purposes for which it was created, can deal with the corporate property as absolutely as a private individual can deal with his own.

The interest of the shareholder entitles him to participate in the net profits in proportion to the number of his shares; to have a voice in the selection of officers to manage the business of the company in like proportion, and, upon its dissolution, the right to his proportion of the property that may remain of the corporation after payment of its debts. This is a distinct, independent interest or property, held by the shareholder like any other property that may belong to him; is under his sole control, so that he may sell or hypothecate it. He is entitled, from net earnings of the corporation, to dividends upon his stock, and the value of the stock depends largely upon its capacity for earning dividends. The shares of stock may be worth much more than the property of the corporation; that is, the franchise may be very valuable while the visible capital may be of but little value, and dividends may be greatly out of proportion to the tangible property, as frequently occurs in regard to street railroads, gas companies, electric light companies, etc. New York v. Tax Commrs. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 244 [18 L. ed. 844]; Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. 490; Cook v. Burlington, 59 Iowa, 251.

It follows from this that although the shareholder may be affected as regards the extent of his dividends by a taxation of the property of the corporation, yet a tax on the shares is not a tax on the capital of the company, and e converso, a tax on the capital is not a tax on the shares held by the stockholders. Taxation of the capital and property of the corporation may be accepted by the State as an equivalent for, but it is not the same as, a tax on the shares.

We have many subjects of taxation which approach more nearly to double taxation than that of taxing capital stock and individual shares of stock in addition. Take the familiar instance of the taxation of mortgages. The owner of real estate, a farm for instance, mortgages it for money to invest in cattle to stock it. He pays taxes on the land without deduction, and on the live stock; and the lender of the money pays taxes on the mortgage. By reason of this latter fact the lender demands more interest, which the farmer pays. He thus pays taxes on his farm, on his stock the result of the borrowed money, and indirectly, the whole, or a considerable portion, of the tax on the mortgage.

And yet, reduced to its last analysis, this is not regarded as double taxation, because value is taxed each time. At all events, it is unquestionably the legal rule in Ohio. It is not impossible that a large portion of the stock of this corporation may be held by residents of this State. In such case, if the claim of the defendant should prevail, large amounts within the State, represented by these shares, would escape taxation, while the shares of stock held by our citizens in foreign corporations which happen not to have property within the State, would bear their full burden. Such a rule would not tend to uniformity or equality of taxation. And, inasmuch as the tax on the property of the corporation within the State is not a tax on the shares, and is not by the statute in terms made an equivalent, and inasmuch as the manifest purpose of the Legislature was to reach all investments in stocks in some form, we think a rational construction of the statute can lead to no other conclusion than that the telegraph stock cannot come within the purview of the exemption clauses.

The case of Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28, is authority upon this question, and, we think, disposes of it in consonance with the views here expressed. The syllabus is: "By the provisions of the Act of May 11, 1878, an owner, residing in Ohio, of shares of stock in a foreign corporation, is required to list the same for taxation, notwithstanding the capital of the corporation is taxed in the State where the corporation is located."

The Act of 1878, here referred to, embodies substantially the provisions of the Act of 1859. A recurrence to the record shows that every question we have here as to telegraph stock was present there. Among the shares of stock, taxation of which was sought to be enjoined in that case, were shares of the Adams Express Company, averred in the petition to be, and well known to be, a foreign corporation having lines running through this State upon which it did business, and having property within the State upon which it paid taxes here. It was urged by counsel for plaintiff in error, in his printed brief, that it was a company created by and located in the State of New York, and reasoned that the fact that it paid taxes in that State, and in this State upon its property employed in its business here, ought to exempt the shares. The case was determined upon a general demurrer to the petition which was sustained, and judgment without dissent given for defendant. Necessarily, therefore, this question was passed upon. It is within the letter, and, as we think, the logic, of both the syllabus and the opinion. That it is not given importance in the printed report may be owing to a belief in the mind of the learned Judge who reported the case that it was not of consequence. And it was not, if the principle announced in the case is correct. We believe it to be, and, in reaching the conclusion hereinbefore indicated as to the telegraph stock, we but follow the logic of this case.

To like effect is the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Sturges v. Carter, 114 U. S. 511 [29 L. ed. 240]. The plaintiff in that case, Carter, treasurer, the successor of Lee, brought suit in the Common Pleas of Richland County, to collect taxes on stock in the same telegraph company. Sturges removed the case to the Circuit Court of the United States where it was tried before Judge Baxter. Judgment being rendered against the defendant, he sued out a writ of error to the supreme court, where, at the October Term, 1884, by the unanimous opinion of the court, the judgment was affirmed. The syllabus is as follows: "The provision, section 59, Act of April 5, 1859, of Ohio, that 'No person shall be required to list for taxation any certificate of the capital stock of any company, the capital stock of which is taxed in the name of the company,' does not apply to shares in a foreign corporation which pays taxes in Ohio only on the portion of its property which is situated there."

With due deference to the contrary opinions of the very learned counsel, so vigorously expressed in argument in this case, we may be allowed to give our assent to the judgment of the supreme court upon the facts, and to express respect for the decision as authority.

It is claimed for the shares of railroad stock that the language of section 2 of the Act (heretofore quoted) defining the phrase "investments in stocks," in terms excludes them from taxation here, and that they are of the class which sections 8 and 59 authorize the holder to omit. This, because the word which in the clause "for taxation of which no special provision is made by this Act" refers, not to "shares" but to the capital stock of the company, and therefore, "investments in stocks" includes only stocks in corporations as to the taxing of the capital stock of which no special provision is made by law; that there is a special provision made by law for the taxing of railroad companies; hence, the shares of stock of such companies in the hands of individuals are not taxable.

We are not impressed with the prime importance of abstruse and ingenious distinctions in regard to the wording of section 2. There may be apparent objections to any of the differing constructions sought to be given to this clause. But, however it be construed, we think the result is the same. If it be conceded that the word "which" should be referred back to the words "the stock or capital," then, taking that clause in connection with the portion of the ninth clause of section 3, and the first clause of section 59, and construing the whole legislation in the light of the constitutional requirement before referred to and of the previous decisions of this court, the "special provision" must be one which relates to an Ohio corporation proper, one as to which as in Jones v. Davis, 85 Ohio St. 474, the State had exercised, or might exercise, the right to tax the capital stock in the name of the company.

Now, the "special provision" for the taxation of railroads, is that provided by sections 2770 to 2778, Revised Statutes, and is in substance, that the auditors of the counties through which the road passes meet annually as a board of appraisers and assessors and proceed to ascertain all the personal property, which includes roadbed, water and wood stations, and such other realty as is necessary to the daily running operations of the road, moneys and credits, and undivided profits of the company, and the actual value thereof in money. The board may require the president, secretary, treasurer, receiver and principal accounting officer to produce a detailed statement, under oath, of all the items constituting such property, moneys, credits, and their value, and may examine under oath such officer, and the books and papers of the road. The value of all such property is then apportioned by the board among the several counties, so that each city, village, township and district shall be apportioned such part as shall equalize the relative value of the real estate, structures and stationary personal property in proportion to the whole value of the same in the State, and the rolling stock is apportioned in the same proportion and in the same manner. When any company has part of its road in this State and part without, the board is to take the value of the property, moneys, and credits thus ascertained and divide it in the proportion the length of such road in the State bears to the whole length, and determine the principal sum for the value of the road in the State accordingly, equalizing the relative value between counties, etc., as before indicated.

It will be seen at a glance that this scheme has for its object the ascertainment of the value and the taxation according to that value, and the property of the road within the State only; the marshaling of the entire property and its valuation being simply an ingenious mode of ascertaining the amount and value of the property, within the State, to be taxed. That which lies without is first included, because the proper equalization as to value cannot be made without it, and then it is deducted. The result is the ascertainment for taxation of the proportion of value properly taxable within the State.

It works out for the railroad companies herein named, taxation of a little over 10 per cent of the value of the capital stock of the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago Company, about 21½ per cent of the value of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Company, and of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern about 25 per cent.

A special provision attended with such results can hardly be regarded as one which embraces taxation of capital and property of a company, nor one which furnishes an instance where the capital stock is taxed in the name of the company.

As to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, it is further insisted that it is not a foreign, but a domestic, corporation; and as it has returned and listed and paid taxes on its immense property lying within the State, in conformity with the statute, the shares in the hands of stockholders cannot be taxed. The finding of facts does not in express terms declare that this company is organized in Ohio, but we understand the fact so to be. That is, it is an Ohio corporation in the same sense as are all consolidated railroad companies made up in part of an Ohio Company. It does not, however, necessarily follow that they are domestic corporations in all aspects and for all purposes. Such corporations derive their corporate existence and all their powers from domestic law.

A consolidated railway company, composed of companies of this and other States, derives its corporate existence and rights from the laws of the respective States in which its line of railway is located, and is, therefore, strictly speaking, an interstate corporation. It is not domesticated in one, but in several States. It is not the creature of one, but of all the States in which it, in part, exists, and has been enabled by their respective statutes to become a corporation for the ownership and management of an interstate line of railway. Such is the character of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company. It is a corporation of the States in which it is located, from Buffalo to Chicago. The consolidated company, when the agreement of consolidation is made and perfected, and the original or a copy filed with the Secretary of State, is to possess within this State all the rights, privileges and franchises, and be subject to all the restrictions, liabilities and duties, of a railroad company. A copy of this agreement shall be received as evidence that such consolidation was authorized by the laws of the several States within which the companies were chartered. Such company must establish a principal office within the State, and suits may be brought against it in the courts of the State as against other companies. That portion of the road in this State, and all its real and personal property, shall be listed for taxation and taxed in the same manner as the road and property of other railroad companies in the State; and the rolling machinery is to be listed at a valuation which will give such proportion of the value of the whole as the length of line in the State bears to the length of the whole line. But there is no requirement that it shall list its capital stock nor shall it list all its property here; it must return only such as is within the State. This, by the terms of the Act under review, was required of every foreign corporation; and therefore it imposes upon such consolidated company no burden as to taxation beyond that imposed upon every foreign corporation having property within the State. Although it is required to have a principal office here, its general business may be done elsewhere. It may hold millions and millions of credits without the State, and they are not touched here.

Not so, to the same extent at least, with a strictly domestic corporation. Its situs is here to all intents and purposes. If it owns credits, shares for instance in the stock of foreign corporations (which is often the case, whether there be legal warrant for it or not), it must list the same here as fully as the private citizen is required to do; and of course all visible property is taxed here; so that it cannot be said that the power of taxation over a consolidated company is the same, or as extensive, as that over a strictly domestic company.

Again; by the Act of consolidation, the shares of stock in the consolidating companies, held by the shareholders, are surrendered, and in their place are substituted shares in the consolidated company, a share of stock in which is a fractional part of all its capital invested in the railway and owned by the company from one terminus to the other. That which before was, in a sense, represented in the railroad and the other property in Ohio only, is now, in that same sense, represented in the entire railroad and property of the consolidated company. The old Ohio Company has out no certificates of stock whatever; indeed, it has ceased to exist, for, on perfecting the agreement, "The several corporations shall be deemed and taken to be one corporation." That one is the new one. The old is abolished and its charter extinguished.

The present company, if treated as an Ohio Company, has out no stock, and it is, therefore, not the stock of an Ohio Company which is sought to be taxed. The Ohio stockholder has no more interest in or control over the road and property in this State than in that lying in the other States, nor have the stockholders residing in the other States any less interest in the Ohio property of the corporation than in that lying without. Upon a dissolution of the corporation the stockholders in Ohio would not take the property here or its proceeds; nor would it fall to the original stockholders in the old Ohio Company—the Lake Shore Company. On the contrary, all stockholders of the consolidated company, wherever residing, and by whatever company of the consolidation their original stock was issued, would be interested alike in the whole residuum, in proportion to their respective shares.

It is thus made apparent, as it seems to us, that the question whether the railway stock held in Ohio is taxable here is not to be answered in the negative merely because it is ascertained that the corporation was incorporated under the Laws of Ohio. There still devolves upon the shareholder the burden of showing, clearly and without question, that the results following such organization bring the shares within the exemption, taxability being the rule, exemption the exception. Has this been done? We think not. It is true that the property of the corporation entered for taxation in Ohio is substantial in character, and that the amount paid by the company as taxes on that property is large. But the greater portion of the company's entire property, at least three fourths in value of it, lies without the State.

We are unable to perceive that the reasoning of the court in Sturges v. Carter, supra, and the logic of Bradley v. Bauder, supra, is not applicable to this stock as well as to that of the telegraph company. To hold it exempt would, we think, require, in effect, an overruling of those cases. The railway company is not, any more than is the telegraph company, required to return all, or substantially all, its property for taxation in this State. In a word, the consolidated company does not fall within the description of the exemption clauses of the statute.

Marked stress is laid in argument, as supporting the contention of the insurance company, upon the case of Frazer v. Seiborn, 16 Ohio St. 615.

A full analysis of this case would require much space, and it would not, it seems to us, prove profitable. The case construes the Act of Congress of 1861, authorizing the formation of national banks, and clauses of the taxing laws of Ohio under consideration in the cases at bar, and gives a rule for applying the qualifying clauses of the National Bank Act, and holds that the clause limiting taxation of shares in national banks to a rate not greater than that imposed upon shares in state banks, means that as the taxation of such shares is provided for under the state tax law by taxation upon the banks themselves, which have the right to deduct from their capital for taxation real estate and government bonds held by them exempted by United States law, so, in assessing shares in national banks the same deduction shall be made. And where, under the state law imposing taxes upon shares in national banks, the tax is in excess of the rate imposed upon the banks of the State, the payment of such excess might be enjoined upon payment of a sum which would be a fair equivalent for the tax on the state banks.

With due respect to the claim of counsel, whose ingenious argument upon the point we have read with much interest, we cannot see that the holding noticeably aids his contention, or gives a rule determining adversely the question of taxing shares in a foreign corporation. Because the Law of the United States fixed a rule for the taxation, by a State, of shares in national banks located within such State, and that rule authorized exemptions in order to conform taxation of federal bank shares to the rule applied to shares in state banks, it does not follow that our statute should be so construed as to exempt shares in a foreign corporation, as to which there is no requirement of federal law whatever. In the bank case our court but bowed to the controlling authority of the general government. It held the law in that case in obedience to that superior power, in the same breath expressing regret because of the necessity.

Nor does a reading of the opinion in the bank case impress us that the learned judge who wrote it anticipated that such a construction as is here claimed could be given to it.

We quote from Welch, J., on page 622. Speaking of our tax law, he says:

"It provides for a tax against certain corporations and companies upon their capital, and for a tax against the shareholders, upon their stock, in those corporations and companies that are not so taxed upon their capital. . . . The intention manifestly was to subject the capital employed by these corporations and associations to a single taxation—some of them in one form, and some in another—and not to tax any of them twice. It is the unmistakable intention manifested in our tax legislation for the last twenty years—the central idea of our system of general ad valorem taxation—to tax every person upon what he is worth. In a system like ours, where intangible as well as tangible property is taxed, some forms of double taxation are unavoidable; but the object should be—and such seems to have been the general aim of all our late legislation upon the subject—to avoid double taxation whenever it is practicable, and as nearly as may be, to tax all according to their actual wealth. That object is best attained in case of a corporation, or joint stock company, by taxing the stockholders—the persons who own its property, upon the full value of their shares therein, including, of course, their interest in the franchise or privilege, and in all tangible property owned by the company; and by taxing the corporation also upon the value of such tangible property. . . . This is the rule adopted by the Act of Congress in question, and it seems to us a just and fair rule. The Act of 1865, by subjecting shareholders in the national banks to such a tax, places upon the owners of those banks, the shareholders therein, no more than their just proportion of the public burden of taxation; and we regret that any technical reasons, growing out of the taxation of the few remaining state banks, should stand in the way of its enforcement."

This construction of the exemption feature of the Act of 1865 confines the exception to home corporations, and clearly recognizes the distinction between the taxation of shares and the taxation of capital stock which we have sought to point out.

It may not be possible to construe the Act so as to bring about perfect equality in all cases. Take, for instance, the case of a corporation having in this State, and subject to its taxing laws, nearly all its property, and only a small portion without; if the shares are taxed because it is a foreign corporation, the result has the appearance of double taxation, while, in case of a corporation having in the State a trifle of its property, the greater portion being beyond the limits, and the shares held in this State are not taxed because it is a home corporation, apparently there is property in the State which escapes taxation.

But these are extreme instances and extreme cases do not prove satisfactory tests. However, while recognizing the fact that there is room for differences of opinion on the subject, as conclusion, we are disposed to be content with a construction of these exemption clauses which will be in accord with the opinion in the case last cited and with that indicated in the opinion in Bradley v. Bauder, supra, and treat them as applying only to corporations which are strictly domestic, and thus to exempt from taxation only "the shares of stock in corporations where the State had exercised the right to tax the capital stock in the name of the company."

This construction applies them to that class of corporations over which the State may have, as to their capital and property, as well as management, entire control. In this view, when the General Assembly uses the words "capital stock or property of any company or corporation which is required to list or return its capital and property for taxation in this State," it refers to that class of corporations whose entire capital and property it is possible to require to be listed here. This is not possible of a railroad company made up by consolidation of an Ohio Company with companies of other States. As to this feature it is as essentially foreign as is a strictly foreign corporation holding property within the State. Any other construction would, we think, be at war with the language of the statute, and would, besides, result in many cases in releasing from taxation large amounts of property held in the State, for which there would be no equivalent. Of course we do not overlook the fact that, under the rule suggested, some property owned by domestic corporations may escape taxation because of being without the State, and so beyond reach. This will be found true as to exceptional cases; but treating them as a class, their capital and property are all here.

The fact that some property of domestic corporations would thus avoid taxation is urged as a reason for the release of the railway and telegraph shares here on the ground that, if held, the rule would result in unequal taxation; and it is further urged that to subject these shares to taxation would result in driving a large volume of capital from the State. The force of this argument is not perceptible. Whether the tendency of holding such shares taxable will be to drive capital from the State, or will, on the other hand, induce such holders to invest in stocks of home corporations, we need not inquire, for the court's duty is not to declare that to be law which it may think may prove most advantageous to the people, but to declare the law as it finds it.

Nor can the court be called upon to equalize taxation. The shares in question are held subject to taxation because, as we think, the law says they are so subject. Those of domestic corporations are held exempt because the law says they are to be excepted. If this works inequality, or if it tends to drive certain species of capital from the State, the remedy, if any, is with the law-making power and not with the courts. Nor does the fact, if it be so, that other property escapes, necessarily render this tax invalid. Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1; Wagoner v. Loomis, 37 Ohio St. 571.

"It cannot be too distinctly borne in mind that any possible system of tax legislation must inevitably produce unequal and unjust results in individual instances; and if inequality in result must defeat the general law, then taxation becomes impossible, and governments must fall back upon arbitrary exactions." Coolcy, Taxation, 221.

It is probable that the lightening of the burden of taxation attracts the owners of property to locate, and draws foreign capital to the State. Referring again to the taxation of mortgages, it is plausibly urged by many that if the tax on mortgages in the hands of residents were abolished, capitalists having money to loan would be attracted here from other localities and the rate of interest would fall, thus giving our enterprising people the use of more capital and at a less rate of interest. If this be conceded should the court therefore declare that mortgages given to residents of Ohio may not be taxed?

Fear is expressed by counsel that great wrong and injustice will be done the stockholders, in these and similar corporations, by taxing their shares, because they cannot know whether the corporation has listed all its property, and they should not be held accountable for its default. We think the fear unsubstantial. The stockholder need know only that the corporation is required to list. Where it is so required, presumably the capital stock of such company is taxed in the name of the company. Where such duty devolves upon the corporation, the taxing officers will, in case of default, follow the corporation, not the individual stockholder.

It is insisted that railroad capitalists have been encouraged by the State to consolidate railroad companies, and having invested their money in such stocks under the belief that they were nontaxable, it would now work an injustice to assess a tax upon them. This view seems to ignore the fact, well known to most citizens, that the legislation referred to has been at the instance of the companies themselves. The legislation was enacted because the companies, conceiving it to be for their interest, asked for it, and, having influence, procured it. It was not forced upon them, nor was it initiated by the people. If, by agreeing to consolidation, any surrendered nontaxable stock, taking in exchange stocks which turn out to be subject to taxation, presumably they anticipated other advantages which would more than compensate; and, without doubt, this anticipation has been realized in most instances. State v. Maine Cent. R. Co. 66 Maine, 488; Maine Cent. R. Co. v. Maine, 96 U. S. 499 [24 L. ed. 836].

The allegations in the petition of the insurance company as "to uniform construction" by the people and taxing officers, were, so far as competent for consideration by the court, matter of evidence, save where they might be taken judicial notice of by the court; hence, the sustaining of the motion to strike out was not error. The omission of the taxing officers of the State in previous years to assess this property cannot control the duty imposed by law upon their successors or the legal construction of a statute under which its exemption is claimed. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665 [29 L. ed. 770].

If it could, the consequence would be the lodging in their hands of the very power of exemption which the General Assembly alone can validly wield, and that under the limitations of the Constitution. Nor can laches be imputed to the State. "The general principle is, that laches is not imputable to the government; and this maxim is founded not in the notion of extraordinary prerogative, but upon a great public policy. The government can transact its business only through its agents; and its fiscal operations are so various, and its agencies so numerous and scattered, that the utmost vigilance would not save the public from the most serious losses, if the doctrine of laches can be applied to its transactions." U. S. v. Kirkpatrick, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 735 [8 L. ed. 199]; State v. Brewer, 64 Ala. 287; Easton Bank v. Com. 10 Pa. 443; Del. Division Canal Co. v. Com. 57 Pa. 399; Dennis v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 34 La. Ann. 954, 958; Finley v. Philadelphia, 32 Pa. 381.

Even if it were error, the plaintiff in error seems to have had full benefit of it as if pleaded and proven. It is probable, however, that the claimed "uniform construction" has not been quite so "uniform" as counsel suppose. At least in one of the counties through which the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago Railway passes, a different view obtained. In the year 1882 an action was brought to enjoin the county treasurer from collecting taxes on stock in that company owned by the plaintiff and which the assessor had returned as subject to taxation. A demurrer was filed to the petition. The stockholder's case was presented, by two as able and experienced lawyers as practice in that part of the State, to a common pleas judge of exceptional capacity. The demurrer was sustained, and the case was not further prosecuted. The extent of the claim for "uniform construction" seems to be that in case of doubt as to proper construction, the construction by state and county officers should prevail. This has been at large argued and considered. This construction, counsel urge, has been known to the General Assembly; and had it been the legislative will to tax such shares, further legislation would have been had to that effect. With equal pertinency this consideration could have been pressed in the case of Worthington v. Sebastian, supra, and in Bradley v. Bauder, supra.

The argument lacks force as applied to this subject at this time. It somewhat persuades, but does not convince.

Our conclusion is that there is not such doubt present as will make this claimed "uniform construction" available as against the claim for taxes here made. But the record in the case of the Western Insurance Company shows no ground for penalty. The cross petition was apparently predicated on section 259 of the Revised Statutes, which makes no provision for a penalty. It does not appear that the duplicate showed an entry by the auditor as contemplated by section 2855; hence, no penalty can be allowed.

In the case of Lee v. Sturges a judgment will be rendered for the amount claimed, but without interest. In the other case the judgment of the superior court will be modified by deduction of the amount of penalty included in the judgment, and otherwise affirmed.

1. Case in judgment. The C. B. & Q. R. Co. was a corporation organized under the Laws of the State of Illinois and of the State of Iowa, and operating a railroad from the City of Chicago, in Illinois, to a point on the Missouri River in Iowa, opposite the City of Plattsmouth, in this State, and the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska was a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of this State, operating a railroad from the City of Plattsmouth to Kearney. These two corporations consolidated their stock and franchises into one corporation or joint stock company, to be known as the "Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company," under the provisions of section 114, chap. 16, Comp. Stat. 1887. It was held that by virtue of such consolidation, and the compliance with the laws of this State, the corporation created thereby became a body corporate, pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of this State, and was therefore not a foreign corporation.

Reese, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information in the nature of a quo warranto, instituted by the Attorney-General against the defendant. The allegations of the information are, in substance, that the defendant is a railroad corporation organized and existing under the Laws of the State of Illinois, and is not incorporated under the Laws of this State, and is therefore a foreign corporation; that it has been, and is now, unlawfully exercising the right of eminent domain by purchasing real estate for depot and other uses, as well as by obtaining the same by condemnation proceedings, for the purposes of right of way for its railroad, and that it is now and has been for some time past, unlawfully usurping the rights, privileges and franchises of a domestic corporation, without having become one under the laws of this State.

To this information the defendant filed its answer, which consists of an extended history of the defendant, from the time of its incorporation in the State of Illinois to the present time, and which need not be noticed further than that the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, as originally organized, constructed its railroad from the City of Chicago to the City of Burlington, Iowa; that the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company was duly incorporated under the Laws of the State of Iowa, and that it constructed a line of road from said City of Burlington to a point on the Missouri River opposite the City of Plattsmouth, in this State; that the lines of road were so constructed as to form a continuous line, and were connected for that purpose at the City of Burlington; that these two corporations, acting under the Laws of the State of Illinois and of the State of Iowa, consolidated their franchises and interests so as to become one corporation or joint stock company by the name of the "Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company;" that in the year 1869 articles of incorporation were filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Nebraska, duly incorporating the Burlington & Missouri lien in favor of bonds of one of the old companies, issued after the passage of the statutes authorizing the consolidation, unsecured by mortgage or lien before the consolidation, and the holders of which had not exchanged or offered to exchange them for bonds of the consolidated company before the proceedings for foreclosure. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587 (29 L. ed. 235).

River Railroad Company in Nebraska, the object and purpose of which, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, was to construct and operate a line of road of uniform gauge with the other railroads, from Plattsmouth to Kearney, that said company constructed its railroad in accordance with the purpose of its incorporation, and by which a continuous line of traffic could be maintained from the City of Kearney to the City of Chicago.

The only other feature of the answer which it is deemed necessary to notice is that on and prior to the first day of January, 1880, the railroad of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company in Iowa, and the railroad of the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska, being connected at the boundary line between the States of Iowa and Nebraska, at the City of Plattsmouth, in accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa and Nebraska, and in pursuance of a vote of more than three fourths of all the stockholders of the respective companies, entered into certain articles of consolidation, whereby the parties thereto merged and consolidated the stock of the respective companies, making one joint stock company of said corporations by the name of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, that, by force of said articles of consolidation and the laws of Nebraska, the said Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, when organized, became a corporation of Nebraska, pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of the State, and, by virtue of such consolidation and compliance with the laws of this State, became a domestic corporation, with all the rights, franchises and privileges of any other domestic corporation, including the power to exercise the right of eminent domain. It therefore denies that it is unlawfully usurping any of the rights which it is now exercising, but insists that by the consolidation referred to, the method of which is set out at length in the answer, it became and is a domestic corporation, and is not a foreign corporation, as alleged in the information.

It is not deemed necessary to set out in detail the method of consolidation which is presented and set up in the answer, further than to say that it appears to have been in compliance with the requirements of the laws of this State, and especially of section 114, chap. 10, Comp. Stat. 1887. This section we here copy:

"Every railroad company organized under the laws of this State shall have power to intersect, join, and unite its railroad or railroads with any railroad or railroads constructed, or to be constructed, in this State, or in any adjoining State or Territory, by any railroad company organized under the laws of any State or Territory, at such point on the boundary line of this State and such adjoining State or Territory, or at such other point as may be mutually agreed upon between said companies, and all such railroad companies whose railroads are or may be connected at the boundary line of this State, or at such other agreed point, by bridge, transfer, ferry or otherwise, as to form practically a continuous line of railway over which cars may pass, are authorized to consolidate the stock of the respective companies, making one joint stock company thereof, and bring the railroads thus connected under one management, upon such terms as may be mutually agreed; Provided, no railroad company shall consolidate its stock, property, franchises, or earnings, in whole or in part, with any other railroad corporation owning or operating a parallel or competing line in this State. Articles stating the terms of such consolidation shall be approved by each company by a vote of the stockholders owning a majority of the stock, in person or by proxy, at either a regular annual meeting thereof, or at a special meeting called for that purpose, by a notice of at least sixty days, stating the object of such meeting, to be addressed to each of such stockholders when their place of residence is known, and deposited in the postoffice, and published for at least three successive weeks in one newspaper in at least one of the cities or towns in which each of said corporations has its principal business office, or by the consent, in writing, of such majority annexed to such articles and copies of said articles and of the records of such approval or of such consent, and accompanied by lists of the stockholders of such corporation, and the number of shares held by Upon filing for record in the office of the Secretary of State of the copies of said articles of such consolidation, and of such record of approval or consent, the companies so consolidating shall become one corporation; and the said consolidating corporations shall become merged in the new corporation provided for in said articles, and shall be known thereafter by the corporate name therein adopted, and shall within this State possess all the powers, franchises and immunities, including the right of further consolidation with other corporations under this section, and be subject to the same liabilities and restrictions imposed by the laws of this State upon other railroad companies, and shall, in addition, possess such powers, franchises and immunities, and be liable to such special restrictions and liabilities, as the said consolidated corporations were within this State possessed of or subject to under any laws of this State peculiarly applicable to them, or either of them, at the time of such consolidation."

Upon the filing of this answer the cause was argued and submitted upon the pleadings; counsel for defendant insisting that, by virtue of the consolidation set out in the answer, which was admitted by the Attorney-General, the defendant became a domestic corporation. The Attorney-General contended against this conclusion. The case is decided upon the pleadings alone.

The question presented is not whether defendant has complied with the laws of this State. If that is admitted, the question still is whether or not such compliance has rendered it a domestic corporation within section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides that "No railroad corporation organized under the laws of another State, or of the United States, and doing business in this State, shall be entitled to exercise the right of eminent domain, or have the power to acquire the right of way or real estate for depot or other uses, until it shall have become a body corporate, pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of this State."

It will be noticed that by section 114, above quoted, it is provided that, upon the filing for record, in the office of the Secretary of State, of copies of the articles of consolidation, with the consent or approval of the companies so consolidating, they shall become one corporation, which shall be known by the name adopted, and shall possess the powers, franchises and immunities, and be subject to the liabilities and restrictions, imposed by the laws of this State upon other railroad companies, and as the consolidating corporations within this State were possessed of, subject to and under the laws of this State at the time of such consolidation.

This section, in effect provides that where a domestic corporation—that is, one organized under the laws of this State, and having its existence solely within this State—becomes consolidated with a corporation originally created in another State, the new corporation is entitled to exercise the same rights, and is subject to the same restrictions and liabilities, as the original corporation in this State before the consolidation. These rights and privileges consist in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, of acquiring property by purchase for the use of the corporation, and of enjoying such other rights and privileges as properly belong to corporations. The restrictions and liabilities are that it shall be subject to the laws of this State, and its jurisdiction, in the execution of their authority; that it shall not have the peculiar privileges which are granted to foreign persons or corporations, in the way of removal of its suits from the state to the federal courts; and that, in the exercise of all its corporate functions, it must be governed by and be subject to the laws of this State.

It was evidently the purpose of the Legislature, in the enactment of the law under consideration, that by complying with its provisions the corporation so complying should be a domestic, and not a foreign, corporation. This being true, it seems to us quite clear that such a consolidation, when effected, would bring the consolidated company, not only within the spirit, but within the letter, of the law and of the Constitution. 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 939 et seq.

By the section of the law above quoted, such a consolidated corporation would not be a corporation "organized under the laws of another State, or of the United States;" and while not originally incorporated within this State, in the manner in which new corporations are formed, yet "it would become a body corporate pursuant to, and in accordance with, the laws of this State," as specified in the Constitution, although, in a legal sense, distinct from the corporation in the other States through which the road runs—in fact, a domestic corporation. The Legislature, therefore, by the Act provided a method, other than that of forming a new corporation, by which corporations in existence, one of which is a domestic corporation, might become such body corporate under the laws of the State. It is alleged in the answer that this consolidated corporation was created about the first day of January, 1880; that since that date it has been, in law and in fact, a domestic corporation, and not a corporation "organized under the laws of another State, or of the United States."

Upon an examination of the allegations and averments of the answer, in connection with the section of the statute above referred to, as well as that of the Constitution, we are convinced that by the action of the companies, as set out in the answer, the defendant became, and now is, a "body corporate, pursuant to and in accordance with the laws of this State," and is entitled to exercise the rights and privileges of such corporation, and is subject also to all the limitations and liabilities imposed upon domestic corporations, and that it is not a "corporation organized and existing under the Laws of the State of Illinois," as alleged in the information, nor of any other foreign State.

It was stated by counsel for the defendant, upon the argument of the cause, that the view entertained by them at that time had not been entertained by them during the whole of the time which has elapsed since the first day of January, 1880; and that, acting upon a different opinion, they had sought to and had removed causes from the courts of this State to the United States Circuit Court as a foreign corporation; but that in the early part of the year 1888 they had become convinced that they were not entitled to do so, and since that time had acted in all respects as a domestic corporation subject to the laws of this State.

The Attorney-General, being desirous only of having the status of the defendant company ascertained and declared, agreed with counsel representing it upon a judgment to be entered in case the court found, upon the facts presented, that the defendant was not unlawfully usurping the rights, privileges and franchises as alleged in the information. Judgment will therefore be entered in accordance with this opinion.

The other Judges concur.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

B. W. HUSTON et al., Appts.,

v.

(.... Oreg. ....)

1. An adverse, exclusive, and uninterrupted use and enjoyment by one person, and those under whom he claims, of all the water of a creek, taken therefrom by means of a ditch, and conveyed to certain mining grounds for mining purposes, for twelve years, or for any period beyond that of the Statute of Limitations prescribing the time in which entry shall be made upon real property, will bar the owner of the land through which the creek runs of his riparian rights; but where the ditch was constructed by means of which the water was originally appropriated under a license granted by the owner of the land in which he reserved the right to use the water a part of each year for his own purposes, such adverse use by grantees from the original appropriator cannot be established unless it is shown that the use of the water by them has been in hostility to the use of it by the owner of the land under such reservation.

2. The users of the water, in such case, must show that their use of it was in defiance of any right upon the part of the owner to use it for any purpose, that they totally ignored his right to use it at all, and that he acquiesced therein.

3. To authorize a person to claim a forfeiture of valuable property rights, on account of the violation of a condition upon which they are granted, he must proceed to enforce it at once. He cannot remain passive for a long time after acts have transpired, upon which others have relied in matters of importance to them, and then insist upon the forfeiture in consequence thereof.

4. Where a certain stream of water ran across the land of B. which he was accustomed to use for the purposes of irrigation, for watering his stock, and for domestic use, and which was valuable and necessary for such uses; and he was applied to by one S. for permission to dig a ditch across his land in order to conduct the water of the stream to certain mining grounds below, upon which S. was engaged in mining; and B. granted the permission, upon the promise of S. that the former should have the exclusive use of the water flowing through the ditch at any point on said lands where he might desire to turn it for irrigating purposes during the spring and summer months, and that S. would not sell or dispose of the ditch or water-right to anyone else, but that they would revert and become the property of B.—held, that by a fair construction of the arrangement between B. and S., in view of the circumstances of the transaction, the former was to have the use of the water whenever required for the use of his premises for the purposes mentioned, and the latter was to have the use of it at all other times for the purpose of working his mining ground.

5. Held, further, that S., having subsequently sold his mining ground and interest in the ditch, and H. having, by means conveyances from S., succeeded to the same, and he and his grantors having used the water conveyed through said ditch for the purpose of operating in the said mining ground, with the knowledge and acquiescence of B., that the latter was not entitled to claim a forfeiture of the said ditch and water-right on account of the said sale by S.; that B's acquiescence in the sales and transfers of the ditch and water-right must be deemed a waiver of the condition that S. would not sell them.

6. Held, also, that the use by H. and his grantors of the ditch and water to operate the mine, although it extended beyond the period of the Statute of Limitations, would not constitute such an adverse possession against B. as would bar his right to the use of the water, under the reservation in the license to S. to construct the ditch, unless H. and his grantors had wholly excluded B. from the exercise of such right during such period; and that evidence of B. having used the ditch and water a portion of each year during the whole time referred to, for irrigating his land and for the other purposes mentioned, disproved any such exclusive use thereof as suggested, or any use inconsistent with said license and reservation.

7. Held, too, that B. and H., and those holding under H., had co-existing rights in the ditch and water; that B. had the preference during the season when the condition of his premises were such as to require the use of the water for the purposes mentioned, but that he had no right to waste it at any time, or to use it extravagantly or imprudently; that H. had the full and free right to use it at all other times, and that each was required to respect the rights and interests of the other regarding the matter, in every particular.

APPEAL by plaintiffs, from a decree of the Circuit Court of Jackson County, dismissing the complaint in a suit to enjoin the diversion of the waters of a stream. Affirmed.

The facts and questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. R. Neil, H. K. Hanna, and E. De Peatt for appellants.

Messrs. P. P. Prim and H. Kelly for respondent.

Thayer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from a decree rendered in a suit brought by the appellants against the respondent, to enjoin him from diverting water from what is now known as "Walker Creek," formerly Phillip's Creek, in the County of Jackson.

The appellants allege that they were owners and in the possession of certain mining claims which they had been working during the mining seasons since 1876, and that in so doing they had necessarily required and used all the water of said creek. That they and their grantors, about the year 1865, dug and constructed a ditch in said county known as the "Willow Springs Mining Ditch," and thereby appropriated all the water of said creek at a point above the residence of the respondent, and running thence in a northerly direction along the foot hills above Willow Springs, to what is known as "Hite's Gulch," thence to their said mining ground; and each and every year had, by means of said ditch, conveyed all the water of the creek and said gulch, and the other gulches running into said ditch, to their said mining claims, and used the same for mining purposes thereon, and by so doing had acquired a prior right over respondent to the use and enjoyment of said water. That for more than twelve years appellants and their grantors had been in the adverse, exclusive and uninterrupted use and enjoyment of all of said water for mining their said claims, with the knowledge of said respondent. That on the first day of April, 1887, while appellants were in possession and use of the said water as mentioned, the respondent wrongfully and maliciously diverted it from said ditch, thereby depriving appellants of its use and enjoyment, and still continued to do so, and refused to desist therefrom, to the great and irreparable injury of the appellants.

The respondent denied all the material allegations of the complaint, except as admitted in further and separate answers thereto, and alleged in said further and separate answers:

(1) That at the time said ditch was constructed, and the water of said creek appropriated and used through the same, and for a long time prior thereto, the respondent was the owner in fee of a large tract of land, consisting of agricultural, meadow and pasture lands, on which there were valuable improvements, and upon which the respondent reared and kept a great many head of horses, cattle, sheep and hogs. That the water of said creek flowed through said lands of respondent, near his residence thereon, in a natural channel, at the time the ditch was constructed, and the water appropriated had done so for a long time prior thereto, and was at the time of its appropriation through said ditch, and had been for a long time prior thereto appropriated and used by the respondent for irrigating his crops grown upon said lands, watering his stock, and for domestic purposes about his house; and was valuable to him, and necessary for the several purposes mentioned. That at the time mentioned in the complaint as the time of the appropriation of the water of the creek by the appellants and their grantors, one Jack Sears, in consideration that the respondent would permit him to dig and construct the ditch through the respondent's lands, promised and agreed with the respondent that the latter should have the exclusive use of the water flowing through the ditch at any point on his premises where he might desire to turn it out for irrigating purposes during the spring and summer months; and that in accordance with said agreement the respondent had so turned the water out of the ditch, and appropriated and used the same for irrigating purposes upon said lands each and every spring and summer since the ditch was constructed, and the water thereby appropriated, as he had a right to do under said agreement with the original appropriator of said water; and the respondent has so appropriated and used said water as mentioned without hindrance or objection from anyone until the commencement of the suit by appellants; and that the act complained of by them in their complaint was the turning of the water out of the ditch by respondent in the month of April, 1887, for the purposes of such irrigation.

(2) That the respondent has had the adverse, exclusive and uninterrupted possession and use of said water through said ditch for irrigating purposes every spring and summer since the ditch was constructed, and such possession and use thereof in its natural channel long prior to the construction of the ditch, and for more than twenty years before the commencement of the suit.

(3) That in addition to the promises mentioned as having been made by said Sears in consideration of the respondent permitting him to dig and construct the ditch through the respondent's land, Sears promised and agreed with the latter that whenever he got done with using the water through the ditch that he would not sell or dispose of the ditch or water-right to anyone else, but that the ditch and water should revert and become the property of the respondent, and that Sears long since got done with using the ditch and water.

The appellants demurred to the new matter contained in the answer, as not being sufficient to constitute a defense. The court overruled the demurrer, and the appellants filed a reply specifically denying said new matter. The case having been heard by the circuit court upon depositions and proofs taken therein, a decree was given dismissing the complaint, which is the decree appealed from.

I think the evidence fully sustains the allegations of new matter in the answer as to the agreement and circumstances under which the ditch was constructed, and the water for the use of the mining claims thereby appropriated; also as to the reservation made by the respondent of the use of the water of the creek for the purpose of irrigating his land during the spring and summer months; and of his custom and habit of using it during such periods for the purpose mentioned, and for such other purposes as he might desire to use it about his premises. The situation of the creek, its importance as a means of irrigation, and its necessity in many other respects, are so apparent that no man of any prudence would permit its waters gratuitously to be appropriated without making such a reservation as claimed. It is easy to see how a person situated as the respondent was could be induced to allow another to construct a ditch across his land, and use it to conduct water to mining grounds, during a period of the year when he himself did not need it; but it would be difficult to understand why he would do so at a time when it was highly necessary that he should have the water for his own use, unless he granted the privilege for a consideration which he deemed sufficient to remunerate him for the injury and inconvenience he would thereby necessarily subject himself to.

The respondent seems to have been willing that Sears should have the right to use the water during the time he did not need its use, and I think we may reasonably conclude from the testimony, and the circumstances surrounding the affair, that the arrangement between the parties was to the effect that Sears was to have the right to use the water at all times during which the respondent did not require it for irrigating his land, watering his stock, and for domestic purposes about his house. The respondent claims that the agreement between him and Sears was that the latter should not sell or dispose of the ditch and water right to anyone else, but that both should revert to him when Sears got done with using the water through the ditch. Sears, however, in 1867, sold his mining ground, together with the ditch and water-right, to certain Chinamen, who in 1876 sold to Thomas Chavener, and the latter in 1886, sold to B. W. Huston, one of the appellants, and the said respective grantees have been using the water and ditch ever since, and the respondent has acquiesced in such use. Besides, the license, after it was executed, created a right of property.

Under these circumstances, therefore, the respondent at this late date would not, it seems to me, have any right to claim a reversion of the property in consequence of its alienation. I think we may infer, after the lapse of so long a time, that the respondent consented to the transfer. A person will not be allowed to avail himself of a forfeiture of valuable rights, unless he claims it immediately on the happening of the condition upon which it depends. He cannot remain passive in such a case for a long time after acts have transpired upon which others have relied in matters of importance to them, and then enforce a forfeiture in consequence thereof. If the respondent had desired to avail himself of the benefit of the condition in the agreement with Sears, upon the happening of which the ditch and water-right were to revert to him, he should have claimed it immediately after the sale to the Chinamen.

Instead of doing that, however, he allowed the affair to run along about twenty years without any apparent objection, and then insisted upon his right to the reversion, which he has himself forfeited by his own laches. But it does not follow that the appellants acquired any right in the ditch and water superior to that which Sears himself had. The interest of the latter therein was limited by the terms of the license or privilege; and he could convey no greater right than he possessed, whatever he may have undertaken to do. Nor could purchasers from his grantee acquire any right beyond that, unless they could show that the respondent in some manner had represented that the grantee was the absolute owner of the property, and that they had been induced to make the purchase upon the faith of such representation.

The case is not like that of a sale of real property to a bona fide purchaser, where an outstanding equity exists. Sears had no deed from the respondent of any interest in the ditch, and a purchaser from him was bound to inquire as to the extent of his interest. The appellants allege in their complaint that for more than twelve years they and their grantors have had the adverse, exclusive, uninterrupted use and enjoyment of all the water of the creek, and used it for their mining claims with the knowledge of the respondent. They claim, I suppose, that they have maintained such adverse possession ever since the execution of the deed by the Chinamen to Chavener. The latter, however, only had such right in the property as he acquired from the Chinamen, which was no greater right than Sears possessed, and was all that he was able to convey, or had any right to undertake to convey, although the deed executed by him purports to convey the absolute title to the ditch, and contains a general covenant of warranty. An assumption, however, upon the part of the grantor, to convey a greater interest in property than he possesses, will not effect a transfer of it, nor extinguish outstanding rights of the character of those in question.

The appellants must therefore rely wholly upon their claims of adverse possession in order to defeat the right of the respondent to use the water from the ditch in the manner mentioned; and I do not think they can establish it, under the circumstances of this case, unless the respondent had actual knowledge that the appellants claimed to be the absolute owners of the ditch and water-right, or had knowledge of facts from which such a claim would necessarily be inferred. They must certainly prove more than the fact that they have conducted the water through the ditch, and used it in their mining operations during the period alleged, as such use was entirely consistent with the license. The proof must establish an exclusive use of the water under a claim to so use it, regardless of the reservation in favor of the respondent in the agreement between him and Sears, under which the latter was permitted to construct the ditch; and I have strong doubts about the appellants being able to maintain that it is sufficient for that purpose. The evidence shows beyond question that the respondent has been accustomed to use the water from the ditch for irrigating his lands, and for the use of his premises generally, every year since the ditch has been constructed; that his use thereof has been openly and notoriously exercised, under a claim of right as original owner of the water.

The appellants' counsel appear to be under an impression that if the appellants have been in the use and enjoyment of the ditch, under a claim of right, for a period beyond that of the Statute of Limitations, they have acquired a title to it by prescription, and that such title is necessarily exclusive of any right on the part of the respondent to use the water thereof. They seem to ignore the fact that the appellants and the respondent may both have rights to use the water.

It seems to me that there is nothing inconsistent in the view that the appellants may have the right to use the water for mining purposes, and the respondent the right to use it for irrigation, for the use of his stock, and for household purposes, and that both rights may coexist. That seems to have been the understanding in the outset, and I do not see how time and usage have changed it. Nor can I discover how the affair can be better adjusted than to accord to the respective parties the right to use the water in the manner suggested. According to my view of the matter, the respondent should have the use of it when necessary for the purposes mentioned, and the appellants should have the right to use it at all other times.

There may be a short period during each year when both parties may desire to use the water at the same time. In such case the respondent should have the preference, but he should not be allowed to waste it, or to use it imprudently, or to any greater extent than is actually necessary. The exercise of a reasonable spirit of accommodation by the respective parties in regard to the use of the water will render it beneficial to both, and will to a great extent avoid a conflict of interest.

The appellants allege in their complaint, as has been shown, that the respondent on the first day of April, 1887, wrongfully and maliciously diverted the water from the ditch, and deprived the appellants of its use and enjoyment, and still continued to do so, and refused to desist therefrom. If I believed that the evidence in the case sustained this allegation, I should be in favor of perpetually enjoining the respondent from the commission of such acts; but the evidence of William Cook shows that all the water that was taken out of the ditch at that time was for the purpose of irrigating a crop of alfalfa, and that if it had not been so used the respondent would not have had a crop; that it was young alfalfa, sown the spring before; that there were about five acres of it, and that it required more water than old alfalfa does; and I cannot find from the appellants' brief that any testimony was given on their part in regard to the matter.

The appellants' counsel, it would appear, were too intent upon establishing an exclusive right in behalf of their clients to the use of the water to show what acts the respondent did on that occasion, beyond the fact that he diverted it from the ditch; but that, as I view the case, is not sufficient. The appellants have acquired no such right, and should not insist upon it until the right which the respondent reserved to himself, when he permitted the ditch to be constructed, is lawfully extinguished.

The decrees appealed from must be affirmed.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS.

Rafael LOPEZ
v.
UNITED STATES.

(....Ct. of Cl....)

1. While assignments, transfers and powers of attorney to collect money due from the United States, before the issuance of a warrant therefor are, by force of § 3477, U. S. Rev. Stat., void if the assignors or principals revoke and repudiate them before payment is made upon them, still the accounting officers of the Treasury may recognize them and may state accounts in favor of the assignees or attor- neys in fact, and payment may be made at any time before revocation; and such payments are binding and conclusive upon the parties and are a complete discharge of the indebtedness as against the assignors.

2. A United States Marshal may pay witness fees to persons other than those in whose favor such fees are taxed by the court, upon the unrevoked and undisputed orders, assignments or transfers thereof by the witnesses.

3. Unrevoked and undisputed orders, assignments, and transfers of claims against the United States for taxed witness' fees are so far valid under the law that if payment be made thereon the assignors will be estopped from set-

NOTE.—Rev. Stat. U. S. § 3477; assignment of claims against the United States void. The Act of 1853 is of universal application, and covers all claims against the United States in every tribunal in which they may be asserted; and such was the understanding of Congress when the Revised Statutes were enacted. U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 414 (24 L. ed. 555). A claim against the United States could not be assigned so as to enable the assignee to bring suit against the Government in his own name in court of claims. Id. in Spoford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484 (24 L. ed. 1032). The question was as to the validity of certain orders drawn by a claimant, before the allowance of his claim, upon the attorneys having in charge, directing the latter to pay certain sums out of the proceeds when collected; and which orders, being accepted by the attorneys, were purchased by Spofoord in good faith and for value. Bailey v. U. S., 109 U. S. 438 (27 L. ed. 959). The transfer or assignment to Spofoord was, under the Act of 1853, a nullity as between him and the claimant. Bailey v. U. S., 109 U. S. 438 (27 L. ed. 959). The Act of February 23, 1863, renders all claims against the Government inalienable, alike in law and in equity, for every purpose and between all parties. Spofoord v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484 (24 L. ed. 1032). Section 3477 embraces alike legal and equitable assignments. Id. It strikes at every derivative interest, in whatever form acquired, and incapacitates every claimant upon the Government for creating an interest in the claim in any other than himself. Id. An order drawn by one having a claim against the Government, upon its attorneys who are collecting it and accepted by them, requiring them to pay a sum certain to another from the fund when collected, is, independent of any statutory prohibition, in equity, a partial assignment of the fund. Id.

Exceptions to rule; statutes construed. The statutes in question are not to be interpreted according to the literal acceptance of the words used. Goodman v. Niblack, 122 U. S. 555 (32 L. ed. 229); Bailey v. U. S., 109 U. S. 438 (27 L. ed. 959). Section 3477 of the Revised Statutes, forbidding transfers of claims against the Government, does not include a voluntary assignment of a claim against the United States, which is included in an assignment made by an insolvent debtor, of all his effects for the benefit of his creditors. Goodman v. Niblack, supra. It only refers to claims against the United States which can be presented by the claimant to some department or officer of the United States for payment, or may be prosecuted in the court of claims. It simply forbids the assignment of such claims before their allowance, the ascertainment of the amount due thereon, and the issue of a warrant for their payment. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 574 (29 L. ed. 545). The Act of 1853 applies to cases of voluntary assignments of demands against the Government, and does not embrace cases where the title is transferred by operation of law. "The passing of claims to heirs, devisees or assignees in bankruptcy," said the court, "are not within the evil at which the statute aimed." Erwin v. U. S. 97 ting up any other claim on their behalf; and such payment will be a valid discharge of the indebtedness.

4. While the accounting officers of the Treasury may state and certify accounts in favor of purchasers, assignees or transferees of claims against the United States for taxed witness fees whose assignments are not controverted, they may exercise their own discretion in the matter, with due regard to the convenience of parties and the Government. Such assignees have no rights which make it obligatory upon the accounting officers to so state accounts in their favor.

(January 14, 1890.)

ON request of the Secretary of the Treasury for an opinion as to the allowance of a claim against the United States, by the assignee of a court certificate of United States witness fees, for payment of the amount thereof.

The facts and questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Richardson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter transmitting this case, requests the court to give the department its opinion on the following points, suggested by the First Comptroller of the Treasury:

1. Whether assignments or transfers of claims of witnesses are valid under the law.

2. Whether purchasers, assignees or transferees of such claims have such rights as make it obligatory on the accounting officers to state and certify accounts in favor of such purchasers, assignees or transferees.

3. Under the law is a marshal authorized to pay witness fees to any other person than those in whose favor they have been taxed and allowed by the court?

The facts of the particular case in which these questions arise, fully set out in the findings, may be more concisely stated, as follows:

At a term of the United States District Court for the First Judicial District of New Mexico a large number of witnesses were summoned and attended on behalf of the United States.

The court made orders directing that there be allowed and paid to them for travel and attendance certain sums fixed by the order varying from about $8 to $34.

The clerk gave to each one a certified copy, under seal of the court, of the order directing payment to him. Forty-six of these witnesses presented their certificates to the marshal of the district, who was unable to pay them for want of public funds in his hands. He, however, allowed the witnesses to sign his payroll, receiving for payment of the respective sums due them, and he indorsed on the certificates the fact that such receipts had been so signed. This was done with the understanding that the payees would sell, transfer and indorse the same, and that the marshal would pay them to the indorsees as soon as he received public funds for that purpose. Before receiving such funds he went out of office.

In the mean time Rafael Lopez, the present claimant, had purchased the forty-six certificates for valuable consideration, had taken assignments by indorsements thereon, and had presented them to the marshal for payment; but they had never been paid.

The marshal on settling his accounts with the Government returned his pay-rolls to the accounting officers of the Treasury making no claim for himself on account of the forty-six receipts. The claimant, Lopez, forwarded the certificates to said officers, and asked for payment through the Treasury Department. It does not appear that the original payees have made further claim for payment to them, or repudiated in any way their sales and transfers, nor that there are any claimants to the money adverse to said Lopez.

The difficulty which the comptroller finds in stating an account in favor of Lopez, the purchaser of the certificates, arises from the terms of section 3477, *of the Revised Statutes, as interpreted by the supreme court in the cases of United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407 [24 L. ed. 503], and Spooford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484 [24 L. ed. 1082].

U. S. 302 (24 L. ed. 1065); Goodman v. Niblack, and Bailey v. U. S. supra. When the Government, as lessee of real estate occupied by it, recognizes through its proper officers a transfer of the property and an assignment of the lease, and an assignment of rent under it, and pays the rent, there is nothing in section 3477, Revised Statutes, respecting transfers and assignments of claims against the United States which invalidates that transaction for the benefit of a third party. Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. v. Shepherd, 127 U. S. 494 (32 L. ed. 168); Goodman v. Niblack, 102 U. S. 556 (26 L. ed. 220). Payment to an attorney in fact, constituted such by power of attorney executed by the claimants before the allowance of their claim by Congress or by the proper department, is good as between the Government and such claimants, where the power of attorney has not been revoked at the time payment is made, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act of July 20, 1846, entitled "An Act in Relation to the Payment of Claims," and the Act of February 26, 1853, entitled "An Act to Prevent Frauds upon the Treasury of the United States." 9 Stat. at L. 41; and 10 Stat. at L. 170; Bailey v. U. S. 109 U. S. 432 (27 L. ed. 988). An assignment by operation of law to an assignee in bankruptcy was not within the prohibition of the statute. Erwin v. U. S. 97 U. S. 312 (24 L. ed. 1065); St. Paul & D. R. Co. v. U. S. 112 U. S. 738 (28 L. ed. 801). The statute does not apply to a claim against the United States reduced to a judgment under the Act of March 3, 1875 (U. S. v. Graswald, 30 Fed. Rep. 606); so of a decree compelling defendant to assign his claim, or to execute a power of attorney authorizing its collection. L. R. A.

Willard v. Mueller, 23 Fed. Rep. 200. A voluntary assignment by an insolvent debtor, for the benefit of creditors, was held valid to pass the title to a claim against the United States. Goodman v. Niblack, and St. Paul & D. R. Co. v. U. S. supra. Where a person, in anticipation of obtaining a government contract, forms a partnership with two other parties for the execution of the contract, such partnership contract was not, under the circumstances, a violation of sections 3477 and 3737, Revised Statutes. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567 (29 L. ed. 940).

Act creating court of claims. The Act creating the court of claims did not work a repeal of any provisions of the Act of 1833, nor make claims assignable that were incapable of assignment before its enactment. U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407 (24 L. ed. 503). All transfers and assignments of claims against the United States were made void by the statute, not only when the assignees set up the claims in the Treasury Department, but also when they attempted to sue in the court of claims, and very convincing reasons were given for the decision. Tr. Sines v. U. S. 1 Ct. Cl. 12; Cooper v. U. S. 1 Ct. Cl. 87; Cote v. U. S. 3 Ct. Cl. 64-71. The court of claims is without power to adjudicate upon merely equitable rights. Bonner v. U. S. 70 U. S. 9 Wull. 166 (19 L. ed. 660); U. S. v. Gillis, supra.

*Section 3477, U. S. Rev. Stat. (Act Feb. 26, 1853, chap. 81, § 1, 10 Stat. at L. 170), referred to in the opinion, is as follows: "All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein,

"A great deal has been said and written in regard to that section and the previous Acts embodied therein," says the first comptroller in one of his communications filed in this case; and it is well known that the accounting officers and the public, doing business with the Government, have been much embarrassed by it. A careful review of the subject and of the recent decisions of the supreme court will show that the true interpretation of the statute has now become authoritatively settled, and that the rights of parties affected by it, and the powers and duties of the accounting officers under it, have been made clear.

Soon after the passage of the Act of February 26, 1853, chap. 81 (10 Stat. at L. 170), now said section 3477 of the Revised Statutes, the then first comptroller, Elisha Whittlesey, issued an elaborate circular explaining his interpretation of the Act and the practice of the department to be adopted under its provisions. The opinions of the supreme court in the Gillis Case, and in the case of Spofford v. Kirk, seemed to be in contravention of the views expressed in that circular and of the prevailing practice of the department.

The first comptroller immediately upon the publication of those opinions, laid a copy of that circular before Mr. Justice Strong, who had delivered the opinion of the court in those cases. The latter, after a careful examination, indorsed his concurrence in the construction therein given to the Act, and the same was filed among the archives of the Treasury Department. The following is a copy of the circular, omitting parts not material, with Mr. Justice Strong's indorsement thereon:

"(14). It has been customary for salaried officers, contractors and other creditors of the United States, to draw orders or drafts on the Government, which they negotiate, and thus realize the amount due them before the accounts are passed. This is often a great convenience to persons living at a distance, on the Pacific Coast, or anywhere west of the Mississippi. Salaries are paid quarterly, but the account for a quarter cannot be passed until after the end of the quarter. Heretofore drafts have been frequently drawn for a quarter's salary, or for a portion of it, and sent here before the end of the quarter; and when so received the account has been passed, and the warrant issued to the owner of the draft as the assignee of the salary.

"If the statute of February last should be applied to salary accounts, no such drafts could be drawn until after the end of the quarter, after the account was passed, and a warrant on whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof. Such transfers, assignments and powers of attorney must recite the warrant for payment, and must be acknowledged by the person making them, before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and shall be certified by the officer; and it must appear by the certificate that the officer, at the time of the acknowledgment, read and fully explained the transfer, assignment or warrant of attorney to the person acknowledging the same."

the treasurer issued for the payment thereof. The result would be that many officers would be compelled to wait from thirty to sixty days after the end of each quarter in order to receive warrants on the treasurer, or the treasurer's drafts, before they could realize any portion of their salary; and the delay and inconvenience to many contractors, creditors and employes of the Government would be still greater.

"I do not believe that Congress intended that the statute should be applied to any such cases.

"(15). What was the evil for which the remedy was designed? A reference to the terms of those statutes and the practice of agents in prosecuting claims before Congress, indicate the evil and the object of the remedy.

"Agents were in the habit of getting general powers of attorney to prosecute before Congress or the departments uncertain and doubtful claims, and to obtain and receive the amount which might be allowed upon them; and in many instances assignments were obtained of large claims for very small sums from persons not knowing their rights.

"In such cases unsuspecting persons were put into the hands and power of sharp and cunning agents and shrewd unscrupulous speculators; the claimant often had no means of protecting himself against the false representations and deceptions of agents and purchasers, and the agent might misrepresent the amount collected.

"Hence the requirement that the power of attorney, draft, assignment or transfer should refer to the statute under which the claim is allowed, and that the amount due should be ascertained, and a warrant issued for the same, before any such power of attorney, draft transfer or assignment can be legally made.

"It is obvious that this is required by the statute in order that the claimant may fully understand the extent of his rights, and the amount allowed to him, before he can legally assign or transfer the same, or authorize any other person to receive the amount.

"But no such precaution is necessary in relation to salary accounts, accounts for services rendered, or supplies furnished, or for any other form of debt, about the amount of which there has never been any dispute. The officer or creditor in all such cases knows the precise amount, or very nearly the amount, due him; and no good can arise, but often very great inconvenience and evil, from imposing on him restrictions in relation to the time and mode of transferring and assigning the same or of making powers of attorney for the receipt thereof.

"(16). From various causes soldiers may not have been paid all that was due them. When the rolls are examined by the second auditor the amount found due is reported to the second comptroller, and, if he admits it, he signs the report; and any paymaster of the Army of the United States is authorized to pay the amount so found and certified. Certificates of this character are frequently assigned by the soldiers to avoid the loss of time and expense incident to traveling a distance to present them personally. The paymasters pay them, and include them in their accounts.

"(17). Similar balances are found due to sailors by the fourth auditor and reported to the second comptroller; and if he concurs he signs the report, which authorizes a navy agent to make payment to the sailors or to their assignees. It is not known that any imposition, fraud or extortion has been practiced in any of these cases.

"(18). Warrants are not issued to pay these and similar balances; advances are made to the paymasters and navy agents generally, without specifying who are to be paid.

"(19). In making payment to a contractor for transporting the mail, no warrant is issued in his name. The contractors collect of the postmasters, or they draw orders on the department, or the department sends them drafts according to the circumstances of the case. Collections from postmasters are generally by the carriers on authority given by the contractors—the department having designated the officers from which collections are to be made.

"(20). Orders are drawn by mail contractors to pay for expenses necessarily to be incurred in transporting the mail, and generally to obtain a credit in advance. They are lodged by the drawee or assignee with the auditor to be paid when due, if the department shall then be indebted to the contractor.

"(21). The stocks of the United States are owned and held throughout the civilized and commercial parts of the world. Interest is to be paid thereon by agreement, semi-annually. In almost every instance it is paid on powers of attorney. A warrant is not drawn to pay any particular person, but seasonable advances are made to the assistant treasurers, or other persons designated, to pay the interest, in different sections of the United States. Frequently powers of attorney are executed for collecting interest without any limitation as to time.

"(22). American consuls are required by law and by the directions of the Secretary of State, to relieve indigent and distressed American seamen in foreign countries. Having incurred expenses for their relief, they are instructed to draw on the Secretary of State, and to accompany the drafts by accounts and vouchers. The drafts are generally in favor of the business correspondents of the consuls in the principal cities, and may have been indorsed before they reached the state department. If sustained by the accounts and vouchers they are paid to the holder on the requisitions of the Secretary of State directed to the Secretary of the Treasury; and the accounts of the consuls are thereafter settled in the due course of business by the accounting officers.

"(23). Consuls are authorized and required by law to send destitute seamen to the United States, and they are empowered to contract with masters of American vessels to transport such seamen, at a price to be agreed upon, not to exceed $10 for each one. To enable the master of the vessel to obtain the payment specified, the consul gives him a certificate stating the names of the seamen placed on board, and the amount to be paid for their passage. On the arrival of the vessel in a port of the United States, the collector of the customs indorses on the certificate that such seamen have arrived. The master of the vessel, if not the owner of it, assigns the certificate to the person or persons entitled to the pay, and an account is reported by the fifth auditor in favor of the assignees.

"(24). If those statutes should be applied to the cases mentioned, and to those of like character, the business of the Government would be arrested to a great extent, to the injury of individuals, in violation of contracts, and of the public faith.

"(25). My conclusion is that ordinary debts and accounts against the Government, which have been legally contracted and never disputed, are not claims within the meaning of those statutes, and that the statutes do not apply to them, but apply to uncertain damages and losses, extra allowances, pensions, equitable demands, claims for the correction of alleged errors, claims for a return or repayment of duties, items of account which have been rejected or are disputed, and such classes of cases as are usually referred to the committee on claims, and to committees other than the committee of ways and means.

"Comptroller."

[Indorsement by Mr. Justice Strong.]

With no authority to speak for the court, I am of opinion that the construction of the Act of 1853, given in this circular, is correct. Perhaps the language of the court in United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407 [24 L. ed. 503], was not sufficiently limited. It had primary reference to the case then before the court; but certainly the word "claim," as used in the Act, ought not to be held to embrace liquidated debts.

W. Strong.

In McKnight's Case, 13 Ct. Cl. 293, the defendants filed a counterclaim against the claimants to recover back money paid to them as assignees of one Hart upon an assignment declared void by the Act of 1853. The original assignors had never revoked or repudiated this assignment. We held that the Treasury having recognized the assignment and paid the amount due on an accounting to the assignee, no action would lie to recover it back, saying in our opinion: "If parties allow money due them to be paid to others with their knowledge and consent, it is an adoption and ratification of the act which they cannot afterwards set aside; and such payment is a valid discharge of the debt as between the Government and the creditor."

On appeal the supreme court affirmed the judgment of this court, and sustained our views, saying in its opinion:

"It is true the assignment was contrary to law, and, therefore, a nullity; but there was nothing contrary to morals or conscience in the payment or receipt of the money. The facts were all known. There was no indirection, concealment or improper purpose on either side.

"Although the petitioners had no claim against the United States, they had a valid claim against Hart. The money was received in payment of his debt, and discharged it to that extent. He is estopped by his receipt from setting up any claim against the Government. It does not appear that he has ever complained." 98 U. S. 185 [25 L. ed. 115].

This case was followed by that of Batley v. United States, 15 Ct. Cl. 490, where the force of assignments was again considered, and the court in its opinion used the following language:

"The statute in this case (Act 26th February, 1853, 10 Stat. at L. 171) does not attach any turpitude of the assignment of a claim or the giving of a power of attorney such as was given by the claimants. It does not prohibit the giving of such assignment and powers, nor prohibit the officers of the Government from acting upon them; it merely declares them to be void.

"We are of the opinion that where a payment is made upon a power of attorney properly authenticated, actually given and sufficiently comprehensive in terms, its validity or invalidity under the statute is no longer in question, and no party to the transaction is at liberty to deny the effectiveness of the payment. Such powers of attorney belong to that class of obligations which may be void while they remain executory, but which are to be treated as valid when they have become executed. Courts cannot enforce them; but if the parties voluntarily give effect to them, sound morality forbids that they should be allowed to question the effectiveness of what they have themselves accomplished."

This case was also appealed, and the supreme court fully sustained the views of this court, as appears by the following extract from its opinion, 109 U. S. 438 [27 L. ed. 989]:

"The question is whether payment to one who has been authorized to receive it by the power of attorney executed before the allowance of the claim by the Act of Congress, was good as between the Government and the claimant, where, at the time of payment, such power of attorney was unrevoked.

"If, in respect of transfers or assignments of claims, the purpose of the statute, as ruled in Goodman v. Niblack, 102 U. S. 556 [20 L. ed. 229], was to protect the Government, not the claimant in his dealings with the Government, it is difficult to perceive upon what ground it could be held that the statutory inhibition upon powers of attorney in advance of the allowance of the claim and the issuing of the warrant, can be used to compel a second payment after the amount thereof has been paid to the person authorized by the claimant to receive it.

"A mere power of attorney given before the warrant is issued—so long at least as it is unexecuted—may undoubtedly be treated by the claimant as absolutely null and void in any contest between him and his attorney in fact. And it may be so regarded by the officers of the Government whose duty it is to adjust the claim and issue a warrant for its amount.

"But if those officers chose to make payment to the person whom the claimant, by formal power of attorney, has accredited to them as authorized to receive payment, the claimant cannot be permitted to make his own disregard of the statute the basis for impeaching the settlement had with his agent.

"To hold otherwise would be inconsistent with the ruling heretofore made, and with which, upon consideration, we are entirely satisfied that the purpose of Congress by the enactment in question was to protect the Government against frauds upon the part of claimants and those who might become interested with them in the prosecution of claims, whether before Congress or the several departments.

"The title of the Act of 1853 suggests this purpose. It is to prevent frauds upon the treasury.

"An effectual means to that end was to authorize the officers of the government to disregard any assignment or transfer of a claim, or any power of attorney to collect it, unless made or executed after the allowance of the claim, the ascertainment of the amount due thereon, and the issuing of the warrant for the payment thereof."

The next and latest case involving the interpretation of the statute is that of Freedman's Sav. & T. Co. v. Shepherd, with Shepherd v. Thompson, 127 U. S. 494 [32 L. ed. 163]. In that case the United States was lessee of certain real estate, and the lessor had made assignments of rents under the lease, somewhat complicated by the facts. The validity and effect of those assignments and the application of the money paid upon them by the United States was directly in issue. The court in its opinion said:

"Here the officers of the government chose to recognize the assignment; and of their action neither Bradley nor Shepherd, nor Shepherd's trustees can rightfully complain.

"The government is acquitted of any liability in respect to the claim for rent, for its officers have acted in conformity with the directions, not only of the original claimant but of his assignee, Shepherd, and of Shepherd's trustees.

"The simple question is whether the money received from the government shall be diverted from the purpose to which Bradley, Shepherd and Shepherd's trustees agreed in writing that it should be devoted, namely: to the payment of the debts Thompson holds against Shepherd. This question must be answered in the negative; and in so adjudging we do not contravene the letter or the spirit of the statute relating to the assignment of claims upon the United States."

The result of all these decisions is, in our opinion, that while such assignments, transfers and powers of attorney to collect money due from the United States are void if the assignors or principals revoke and repudiate them before payment is made upon them, still the accounting officers of the Treasury may recognize them and may state accounts in favor of the assignees or attorneys in fact, and payment may be made at any time before revocation, and that such payments are binding and conclusive upon the parties and are a complete discharge of the indebtedness as against the assignors.

The practical effect of the law, thus interpreted, is that such assignments and transfers, whatever be the consideration, are mere naked powers of attorney, revocable at pleasure. Creditors may avail themselves of such instruments in order to have money due them from the United States paid to such persons and in such manner as they may direct, in like manner as they may transact business with individuals, provided there be no controversy and the accounting officers see no grounds for suspicion of fraud or other satisfactory reason for refusing to recognize the transfers. But the Government cannot be involved in controversies between private parties.

As to marshals the Revised Statutes provide: "Sec. 855. In cases where the United States are parties the marshal shall, on the order of the court, to be entered on its minutes, pay to the jurors and witnesses all fees to which they appear by such order to be entitled, which sum shall be allowed him at the Treasury in his accounts."

In making payment of witness fees marshals must be governed by the general laws as to powers of attorney and assignments applicable alike in all cases.

In the present case the marshal whose duty it was to pay these fees has gone out of office; has returned his pay-rolls to the Treasury Department, and the department is in possession of the certificates given to the witness and by them indorsed to the claimant.

It will no doubt be convenient for all parties concerned that payment be made directly from the treasury instead of through a marshal. We find nothing in the facts to prevent the accounting officer from stating an account in favor of the claimant, Lopez, for the amount of his demand, making payment to him upon a warrant in the usual manner.

Upon the points specifically presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, we make the following conclusions of law:

1. A marshal may pay witness fees to persons other than those in whose favor such fees are taxed by the court, upon the unrevoked and undisputed orders, assignments or transfers thereof by the witnesses.

2. Such unrevoked and undisputed orders, assignments and transfers are so far valid under the law that if payment be made thereon the assignors will be estopped from setting up any other claim on their behalf, and such payment will be a valid discharge of the indebtedness.

3. While the accounting officers of the Treasury may state and certify accounts in favor of such purchasers, assignees or transferees whose assignments are not controverted, they may exercise their own discretion in the matter, with due regard to the convenience of parties and the government. Such assignees have no rights which make it obligatory upon the accounting officers to so state accounts in their favor.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Respnt.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. No dedication for the purposes of a highway can be inferred by the public use for more than twenty years of the covered surface formed by timbers, planks and earth over a canal feeder belonging to the State. The land being appropriated for use as a canal feeder, a grant for highway purposes could not be made; and a dedication for such purposes cannot, therefore, be presumed.

2. A grant cannot be presumed where it would have been unlawful.

3. The State, having for more than twenty years suffered, merely by acquiescence, without permission or agreement, the use of a strip of covered surface over a canal feeder, for purposes of passage, owes a duty to abstain from injuring, either carelessly or intentionally, a person so using it, but not a duty of active vigilance to prevent such injury, especially where the traveler is perfectly familiar with the condition of the surface.

(January 15, 1880.)

APPEAL by plaintiff, from a decision of the State Board of Claims awarding nothing on a claim for damages for personal injuries received through falling into a canal feeder. Affirmed.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. D. Niver for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Tabor, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed a claim against the State for personal injuries received from a fall into a feeder of the Champlain Canal running through Cohoes. This feeder had been constructed by the State many years ago, and runs from the S. L. R. A.

Mohawk River, until it empties into the canal alongside of which it runs for some 180 feet. It is covered with timbers and planks, upon which earth is laid to the depth of several feet. Its surface has been made use of for more than twenty years by the public as a highway, and it is known as "Champlain Street," in Cohoes; but it was never laid out as a street or highway by virtue of any municipal or other authority.

The appellant bases her claim to recover against the State on various grounds. She says that there was a user of the land for more than twenty years, which constituted it a public highway, and that, from acquiescence by the State in such a public use, there was imposed upon it a duty of vigilance as to its condition, and as to the exercise of reasonable care for the protection of persons passing over it.

In awarding nothing to the claimant we think the board of claims committed no error. Upon the trial it was conceded that no highway had ever been laid out at that point, and we think a legal dedication of the land as a public highway cannot be inferred. It could not be inferred on the theory of prescription, because that would depend upon a supposed grant, and a grant cannot be presumed where it would have been unlawful. Burbank v. Fay, 65 N. Y. 57.

The land in question was the property of the State, and as such was appropriated for the use described as a feeder to the canal, and never could have become the subject of any grant for the purpose of a public highway. The most that can be said in favor of appellant's contention is that the State suffered the use of this strip of its canal for purposes of passage over or upon it; but it was merely by sufferance that it was so used, and not by any agreement or permission. Nor did the State owe any active legal duty to protect those who so made use of its land. It owed a duty to abstain from injuring the plaintiff, either carelessly or intentionally; but it owed her no duty of active vigilance to see that she was not injured while upon the land for her own convenience. Splitdorf v. State, 108 N. Y. 214, 10 Cent. Rep. 699.

The commissioners found as facts that the claimant had lived for many years nearly opposite the place where she was injured, and was familiar with the condition and manner of construction of the feeder, and with its uses and manner of operation. This finding was warranted by the evidence, and we are concluded by it. These circumstances in this case operated further to relieve the State from any claim for the consequences of plaintiff's use of its land, and charged the claimant with knowledge of its nature, uses and condition.

The award of the Board of Claims should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Andrews, Earl and Peckham, JJ., dissenting.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

1. Under a constitutional provision against local and special legislation, the classification of cities, with the view of legislating for either class separately, is essentially unconstitutional, unless a necessity therefor exists—a necessity springing from manifest peculiarities clearly distinguishing those of one class from each of the other classes, and imperatively demanding legislation for each class separately that would be useless and detrimental to others.

2. The Pennsylvania Act of May 24, 1887, dividing the cities of the State into seven classes—the charter powers of those between the fourth and seventh classes being precisely similar, with very few and quite unimportant exceptions—is unconstitutional, as the only possible purpose of the classification is to evade the constitutional limitation in respect to local and special laws.

3. The fact that local and special laws are in force in some cities at the time of the adoption of the Constitution prohibiting such laws, and are not affected thereby, will not justify the substitution of other local or special laws in their stead.

4. Whether, in any given case, the Legislature has transcended its power and passed a law in conflict with the constitutional limitation in respect to local or special laws, is essentially a question of law, and must necessarily be decided by the courts.

5. The Pennsylvania Act of May 24, 1887, dividing cities into classes, cannot go into effect (even if valid) and become operative, till the terms of all the members of a council in office at the time of the approval of the Act have fully expired.

(January 7, 1889.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs, from a decree of the Common Pleas of Luzerne County dismissing a bill in equity for an injunction. Affirmed.

The bill was filed by D. P. Ayars et al., members of the select council, Charles J. Bauer et al., members of the Common Council, and F. V. Rockafellow, Treasurer of the City of Wilkesbarre, plaintiffs, against C. A. The plaintiffs were all elected to office under the provisions of the Act of May 24, 1887 (P.

L. 204), entitled "An Act Dividing Cities of This State into Seven Classes," etc.

The status of the defendants, together with other facts of the case, are set forth in the following opinion of the court below, per Rice, P. J., on the hearing on bill and answer:

According to the classification made by the Act of May 24, 1887 (P. L. 204), entitled an "Act Dividing Cities of this State into Seven Classes," etc., Wilkesbarre is a city of the fifth class, and, at the date of the approval of the Act, was, by virtue of the provisions of its special charter, "operating with but one branch of council."

The defendants may be classified as follows: (1) members of said body elected prior to the approval of the Act of 1887 for terms which will not expire until the first Monday of April, 1889, and 1890; (2) persons elected at the last municipal election to fill vacancies; (3) persons elected at the same election as the successors of members of council whose terms will expire on the first Monday of April, 1888.

It is alleged in the bill, and admitted in the answer, that these individuals purpose, on the first Monday of April, 1888, to organize, and hereafter to exercise the functions, and perform the duties, of councilmen, and, amongst other things, to levy taxes, elect city officers, and to take and retain possession and control of city property to the exclusion of the persons claiming to have been elected at the last municipal election as select and common councilmen.

The plaintiffs' contention is that, on and after the last mentioned date, the body known as the city council, and the office of councilman created by the special charter of the city, will cease to exist, and thereafter the legislative department of the city will consist of two branches: the select and the common council, the members of which have been elected under the Act of 1887. They therefore pray for an injunction to restrain the defendants from organizing as aforesaid, upon the grounds that the proposed action of the defendants will be an illegal usurpation of the functions of the select and common councils of the city, and that, if they are permitted to proceed, great confusion will result in the government of the city in levying and collecting its taxes, in maintaining law and order within its limits, and irreparable damage will result to the citizens in their persons; and, in short, the bill denies the right of the defendants, or any of them, to organize and act as councilmen of the city after the date mentioned.

On the other hand, the rights of the defendants is defended upon several grounds: (1) that the Act of 1887 is wholly unconstitutional and void; (2) that the Legislature did not intend said Act to apply to the city of Wilkesbarre, and to repeal the provisions of its special charter vesting the legislative power of the city in a single body known as the city council; (3) that the provisions of said Act relating to the election and installation of common and select councilmen cannot go into effect and become operative until the terms of all the members of the present council, in office at the date of the approval of the Act, shall have fully expired, which will not be until the first Monday of April, 1890.

I. The suggestions made in support of the second proposition are well worthy of consideration; but after a most patient study of the Act, we cannot escape the conclusion that it was intended to apply, not only to cities hereafter to be incorporated and to cities heretofore incorporated operating under the Act of 1874 and its supplements, but also to cities operating under special charters, and to repeal inconsistent laws whether general or special. There is strong reason for questioning whether the title of the the county clerk, which in effect applies only to a single county, is void. Gibbs v. Morgan, 30 N. J. Eq. 128.

Pike regulations. An Act to punish gaming within two miles of Chippewa Lake is void (State v. Winch, 45 Ohio St. 688); but an Act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within two miles of any agricultural fair is valid. Heok v. State, 6 West. Rep. 814, 44 Ohio St. 636. So, an Act prohibiting the sale of liquor within eight miles of the court house in S. is valid. Harrison v. Gordy, 57 Ala. 49. So, an Act prohibiting the sale of liquors within three and a half miles of the "White Church," in Macon County, and also "Fish Pond Church," in Coon County, is valid. Blook v. State, 66 Ala. 494.

Establishment of municipalities. The present Constitution does not abolish the municipalities of the State; but, on the contrary, makes existing municipalities more independent of state control by inhibiting state legislation by special statutes. Re Guerrero, 60 Cal. 88. When a statute is general in its terms, and its sole effect is to remove existing deficiencies and to subject the affairs of towns to the operation of a general law, the statute is not special or local, although the pre-existing conditions were such that it would effect a change in only one town or county. State v. Govern, 1 Cent. Rep. 689, 47 N. J. L. 368. See also 48 N. J. L. 612. The propriety of establishing a municipality and of including within its boundaries a particular territory is in general a political question. If the course pursued in establishing it be substantially such as is pointed out by the law-making department, courts do not interfere. People v. Riverside, 70 Cal. 461. It is for the Legislature, not the courts, to say when a special Act is necessary and when the general law will do. Owners of Lands v. People, 118 Ill. 298; Carpenter v. People, 8 Colo. 122. It is for the Legislature to judge whether a law on any given subject not enumerated in the Constitution can be made applicable "and of uniform operation throughout the State," as required by Ind. Const. 1851, art. 4, § 23. Wiley v. Bluffton, 9 West. Rep. 683, 111 Ind. 162. Iowa Laws 1886, chap. 134, providing for redistricting the State for judicial purposes, etc., is not unconstitutional as not being general and of uniform operation throughout the State. State v. Emmons, 72 Iowa, 265. The Act providing for municipal improvements is not a special law within the constitutional inhibition. Thomason v. Ashworth, 78 Cal. 73. A statute authorizing one half the bonded creditors of a city, acting in conjunction with twenty residents of such city, to reincorporate, etc., is in violation of that provision of the Constitution which provides that the Legislature shall establish a uniform municipal system. State v. Stark, 18 Fla. 235. A statute which by its terms excludes from its operation all corporations for municipal purposes except those which may be composed of cities and counties merged or consolidated into one government is in direct contravention of the Constitution. Desmond v. Dunn, 55 Cal. 250. A supplement to an Act which relates to the creation of a borough government out of certain existing municipalities is invalid if it gives greater powers than those possessed by townships and less than those possessed by cities or other existing municipalities. State v. Bloune, 5 Cent. Rep. 346, 49 N. J. L. 356. In passing general laws for the organization of cities and towns the General Assembly exercises all its legislative authority; but in providing measures for carrying the law into effect it must confer upon some individuals or bodies the power to act; and fixing the boundaries is among the acts which must be performed through such conferred powers. People v. Fleming, 10 Colo. 553.

Classification of cities. An Act providing for the classification of municipal corporations is a General Law. Pritchett v. Stanislaus County, 73 Cal. 310. And such a law classifying the cities of the Act clearly expresses, and gives notice of, all the subjects of legislation embraced in it; but we do not think this is true as to the particular provisions required to be considered in this case. An entire Act is not necessarily unconstitutional because its title fails to give notice of some particular matter contained therein. Devhurst v. Allegheny, 95 Pa. 437. An Act repealing a special or local law may be constitutional notwithstanding the bill does not expressly state that such was its purpose. Com. v. McCandles, 10 Cent. Rep. 758.

II. It is now too late to question the power of the Legislature to classify cities according to population, and to legislate, upon some subjects at least, for each class separately. Wheeler v. Phila. 77 Pa. 338; Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401.

It is argued, however, that such classification must be reasonable, and justified by necessity, otherwise it will be in violation of section 7, article 3, of the Constitution. But who is to decide as to the reasonableness of, and necessity for, the classification; and by what rule or standard are these questions to be determined? Conceding it to be a matter resting primarily in the discretion of the Legislature, is their discretion unlimited, and their judgment conclusive? We think not. Where classification is carried to such an extreme as to leave no room for doubt, that, in purpose and effect, it is a mere cover for special legislation, we believe the courts have the power, and should declare that the constitutional limits have been passed. The question whether this is such an Act is of the gravest importance, and no good purpose is to be served by postponing its decision; but, as we now view the case, it is not absolutely required to be made at the present time. Furthermore, while the inferior courts have the power, and in a plain case should exercise it, to declare an Act unconstitutional, yet there is impropriety in doing so, except where the case is very clear and the emergency great.

III. Therefore, without stopping to suggest technical difficulties in the way of a conclusive adjudication of the rights of these contending officers in this form of proceeding, or to discuss further the first two propositions above stated, we shall proceed at once to a consideration of the question whether, in any legal view of the case, the time has arrived for the transition from a city government with a single branch council to a government with two branches of council.

The city of Wilkesbarre was incorporated by Act of May 4, 1871 (P. L. 589). Its council consisted of twenty-one members, one from each of the fifteen wards, one at large from the first, second, third and fifth wards, two at large from the fourth and seventh wards, one at large from the sixth, eighth and ninth wards, one at large from the tenth, twelfth and fifteenth wards, and one at large from the eleventh, thirteenth and fourteenth wards.

It was decided by Judge Harding, in Phania v. Reynolds, 6 Luz. Legal Reg. 21, 18 Phila. 522, that the city of Wilkesbarre was not compelled to come under the provisions of the Act of May 25, 1874, and elect two branches of councils. This decision was always regarded as conclusive of the status of the city with reference to the Act of 1874, and it is manifest that no total and instantaneous change in that status was wrought by the Act of 1887. In other words, the city council was not at once legislated out of existence, for the Act declared that "The corporate powers and the number, character, powers and duties of the officers of the cities . . . now in existence by virtue of the laws of this Commonwealth, shall be and State into six classes, according to population, is constitutional. Id. The classification need not be restricted to the population of the municipality, but may be based on the conduct or condition of the people resident therein. State v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578. For the purposes of legislation, cities constitute a class, and a law applicable to this class only is not in contravention of the Constitution. Re Comrs. of Adjustment of Elizabeth, 8 Cent. Rep. 827, 49 N. J. L. 488. It is not necessary that a law relating to municipalities should operate upon all cities of the State, in order to be constitutional. State v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578. Fitzgerald*, 8 Cent. Rep. 810, 48 N. J. L. 457. But a proviso in an Act that it shall not apply to "summer resorts," is within the constitutional prohibition against local and special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties. State, Clark, v. Wood, 5 Cent. Rep. 845, 49 N. J. L. 55. A clause in a statute, which introduces a regulation and an exception by which the regulation is limited, giving different cities a differentiation kind of tenure of office, and which fixes no regulation common to all, is unconstitutional. New Brunswick v. Fitzgerald, 8 Cent. Rep. 810, 48 N. J. L. 457.

Taxation. An Act providing for licenses, general in its terms and operation, is not invalid merely from the fact that when it went into operation there was but one city of the class and grade to which it could apply. Marmet v. State, 9 West. Rep. 452, 45 Ohio St. 63. An Act to establish an ex-remain as now provided by law except where otherwise provided by this Act (§ 1, art. 2), and that in cities of the several classes operating with but one branch of council, the members thereof in office at the date of the approval hereof shall be empowered to exercise all the functions of councils in the manner theretofore authorized, until their successors are installed in accordance with the provisions of this Act." Sec. 4, art. 23.

By "successors" is meant, not persons elected to the "city council," for the Act of 1887 makes no express provision for such election, but persons elected to the select and the common branches of councils, for which it does provide. When, therefore, can members of the latter bodies be legally elected and installed? The plaintiffs' counsel contend that they were to be elected at the first municipal election following the passage of the Act, and to be installed on the first Monday of the succeeding April.

In section 16, article IV, it is provided as follows: "The terms of members of councils . . . elected upon the third Tuesday of February in any year shall begin on the first Monday of April next ensuing thereto . . . and all elections for officers whose terms will expire on the first Monday of April shall be held on the third Tuesday of February next preceding thereto." It may be said that this section throws no light upon the question before us, because neither event, by which the other is to be determined, is fixed. This might be true if the fact were to be ignored that the Legislature has, itself, treated the persons to be elected to the select and common branches of councils as the "successors" of the members of the present city council Sec. 4, art. 23. But with that in view is it not perfectly fair to conclude that the Legislature intended this section to be a comprehensive designation of the time when all city officers should be elected, and to apply to cities theretofore operating with a single council as well as to cities having two branches? It is to be noticed that the article in which it is contained is entitled "General Provisions Applicable to Cities of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh Classes." But without laying any great stress upon this feature of the Act, it is surely no distortion of the language of the section relating to the election of select and common councilmen to construe it in the sense clearly recognized by the Legislature in the last section of the Act. Thus construed, the section under consideration (§ 16, art. 4), would of itself preclude the idea that there could be any election of members of the select and the common councils until the municipal election immediately preceding the expiration of the terms of the members of the city council now in office.

We now come to section 2, article 8, which provides that "At the first election under this Act, the members of select council from odd numbered wards shall be chosen for two years, and those from even numbered wards shall be chosen for four years." This expression, "at the first election under this Act," is thought to be conclusive of the whole question, but we cannot so regard it. As we have heretofore pointed out, the Legislature has already, by a general provision, designated the time for the election and installation of councilmen and other city and ward officers except aldermen; and the immediate subject now before them was, not the time, but the mode, of electing councilmen, so that their terms should expire at different times. It is true, at the last municipal election, a comptroller, a treasurer and assessors were elected. In one sense it was the first election under the Act. But does it follow that councilmen were to be elected from else department in cities of a certain class rated by inhabitants is local and special. Board of License & Excise v. Cloason, 8 Cent. Rep. 840, 49 N. J. L. 482. While population may form a basis for classification it can only do so for legislative purposes. State, Randolph, v. Wood, 5 Cent. Rep. 845, 49 N. J. L. 58. Sections of a statute providing a scheme of taxation for cities, but excluding from their operation a certain class of cities unless they accept the scheme by ordinance, are invalid. Com. v. L. 297.

Constitutionality of special and local legislation. A special law detaching a city from a township is valid where it does not appear that the effect was to deprive the people of the opportunity of holding the general town election for that year. State v. Gurley, 27 Minn. 475. The General Assembly has power, by a special law, to amend an Act of incorporation, even to effect enlargement of jurisdiction, territorially or otherwise. Wiley v. Bluffton, 9 West. Rep. 681, 111 Ind. 122. The Legislature may, by a private Act, appoint a trustee to execute the trust created by a deed. Tindal v. Drake, 60 Ala. 170. A special Act removing administration proceedings then pending in the county where intestate lived at the time of his death, into another county, is valid. Van Hoose v. Bush, 54 Ala. 343. An Act relieving certain married women from the disabilities of coverture, being attributable rather to the prerogative than the legislative power over person and property, is valid. Ashford v. Watkins, 70 Ala. 156.

Local laws. An Act is local which specially concerns the property and rights of a portion of the people of the State, although its subject may be of a public nature, and although in its general operation the people of the entire State may, in some sense, have an interest. Ill. v. Ill. Cent. R. Co. 38 the several wards of all cities of the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh classes, irrespective of the fact that there were no vacancies in that office to be filled? Is this clause to be construed as impliedly legislating out of office members of select and common councils whose terms had not expired in cities heretofore having two branches of councils; and why should the terms be given a broader effect when applied to cities operating with a single branch council?

We are convinced that the Legislature had no such intention. This is shown not only by other sections of the Act to which we have already referred and shall hereafter refer, but also by the immediate context which specially provides that "The terms of all members of councils now in office, in each of said cities of the fourth class, shall cease and determine on the first Monday of April next succeeding the date of the approval of this Act, and their successors shall be chosen as herein provided on the third Tuesday of February preceding thereto." If the first clause of the section under consideration is to be read and applied liberally, in disregard of the rights of councilmen whose terms have not expired, it was superfluous, much more it was misleading, to insert in the same section a provision to the same effect, but in express terms, applying exclusively to cities of a single class. The fair inference is that the Legislature did not suppose or intend that the single expression at the beginning of the section, manifestly chosen with reference to an entirely different subject, should be given the sweeping effect claimed for it here. But the intention of the Legislature is not left to mere inference. "All officers of each of said cities of the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh classes in office at the date of the approval thereof shall, except where otherwise herein provided, continue to hold their office for the terms for which they were respectively elected." Sec. 1, art. 18. We do not dispute the power of the Legislature to destroy the office of city councilman created by the charter and thereby end the official life of the incumbent before the expiration of the term for which he was elected. See Court v. McCombs, 6 M. 436; Cooley, Cov. Lien, p. 276 and note.

But in view of the express provision just quoted the court would not be justified in straining doubtful provisions contained in other sections of the Act in order to bring about that result, even though we might deem it advisable that the change in the form of the city government, if to be made at all, should be made at once. There is certainly no declaration in the Act abolishing the office, or abridging the term, of any councilman, whether in cities having but one council or two branches of councils, except in cities of the fourth class. If any expression in the Act has that effect it is by implication only. But we have been led to the conclusion, and have endeavored to show, that the clauses relied on by the plaintiffs may fairly be construed, where standing alone, as authorizing the election of councilmen, not at the first election at which some other officer designated by the Act is to be elected, but at the first election when the occasion therefor shall arise. The exception in the section under consideration has sufficient to operate on in the provision heretofore quoted concerning cities of the fourth class, without applying it to other provisions, which, fairly construed, are entirely consistent with the purview of the section. We thus reach a conclusion in which all of these clauses and sections are harmonized and given effect without treating any portion of any of them as superfluous, and without straining the terms used by the Legislature beyond the limits obviously contemplated by them.

IV. Having concluded that the members of council in office at the date of the approval of the Act are entitled to serve out their respective terms and to exercise the functions of the office, the question arises as to the right of persons, elected at the last municipal election under the city charter, to take part in the reorganization of the city council on the first Monday of April, and thereafter to act as members of said body.

We are referred to the last section of the Act (§ 4, art. 23) as precluding the idea that there can be any further elections under the charter. Inasmuch as a preceding section of the same article had already declared the rights of all city officers in office, it may be questioned whether the Legislature, in adding the section under consideration, did not have in view the powers and functions of the body of which the defendants are members, rather than the proper constitution of that body, and the rights of individuals to sit as members thereof. Without declaring that such is the true construction of the section, it is clear that if the language be taken liberally (assuming, of course, the correctness of our conclusion that the existing council will not be superseded until the terms of the present members shall have expired), it would have the effect of extending the terms of members which will expire on the first Monday of April 1888 and 1889, in violation of section 13, article 3, of the Constitution. It is to be presumed that the Legislature did not intend to violate this constitutional provision, and their language is to be construed, if possible, consistently with that presumption. Hence the section is to be read with the implied qualification that no member shall continue in office after his term has expired, or he has become disqualified otherwise to act. This proposition seems to us too plain to need argument to support it.

But if there can be no legal election of common and select councilmen until the municipal election immediately preceding the expiration of the terms of the members of the existing council, namely: in February, 1890, how are vacancies in that body occurring in the mean time by death, resignation, removal or otherwise to be filled? It is thought that the absence of any provision on the subject shows the absurdity of the conclusion heretofore arrived at. We agree that this would be a very potent argument against the soundness of that conclusion, if it were true that there is no legal authority for the election of members to fill such vacancies. But is it true? It must be conceded that such authority is not expressly given in the Act of 1887, but this is not conclusive against the right claimed by the defendants, for it was not necessary to its existence that it should be declared in so many words. The provisions of the charter are repealed by the Act of 1887, only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith or supplied by the provisions thereof. Therefore, until the time arrives for the election, under the Act of 1887, of members of the two branches of councils which will be the successors of the present council, the provisions of the charter will not conflict with the provisions of the general Act upon this subject and will remain in force. The two Acts being to that extent in pari materia are to be construed together. While the charter furnishes, and will continue to give, ample authority for the election of members of the city council, such persons will take and hold their offices subject to the provisions of the Act of 1887 superseding the office when the terms of the present members shall expire. If the Legislature had intended that event to occur on the first Monday of April next, it seems to us that they would not have left so important a matter to uncertain inference, but would have expressed their will in as clear and unambiguous terms as they employed when legislating for cities of the fourth class.

Our conclusions may be summed up as follows: the defendants of the first class are entitled to hold their offices until the expiration of the terms for which they were elected; the defendants of the second and third classes were legally elected under the city charter; the said defendants, if otherwise duly qualified, will be authorized on the first Monday of April next to organize, and thereafter to exercise the functions and perform the duties of members of the council of the city of Wilkesbarre; and the transition from a city government with a single council to a government with two branches of councils cannot legally occur until the expiration of the terms of the members of said single council in office at the date of the approval of the Act of 1887. It follows that this bill must be dismissed.

Thereupon a decree was entered refusing an injunction and dismissing the bill; and plaintiffs appealed, assigning as error the action of the court (1) in holding that the City Council of Wilkesbarre is entitled to exercise the functions of councils until April, 1890; (2) in not holding that the select and common councils under the Act of 1887 are entitled to exercise their functions since April 2, 1888.

Sterrett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the questions involved in this contention is whether, under the provisions of the Act of May 24, 1887, entitled "An Act Dividing Cities of This State into Seven Classes," etc., the time has arrived for the contemplated change, in the city of Wilkesbarre, from a single council to one consisting of two separate branches.

For reasons given at length in the opinion of its learned President, the court below rightly held it had not; "that the provisions of said Act relating to the election and installation of select and common councilmen cannot go into effect and become operative until the terms of all the members of the present council, in office at the date of the approval of the Act, shall have fully expired, which will not be until the first Monday of April, 1890."

Another and vastly more important question is whether the Act under consideration is constitutional. That subject was also briefly considered, but while the court appears to have inclined to the opinion that the Act is unconstitutional and void, it was not deemed necessary to decide the question, because, for the reason above stated, the bill was prematurely brought and could not therefore, in any event, be sustained.

We might for the same reason affirm the decree, but the question is so important in all its bearings that it should be decided without unnecessary delay.

The broad ground on which the court was asked to declare the Act unconstitutional is that, under the specious guise of classification, it is local and special legislation pure and simple, and, without pretense of necessity, opens wide the door for further legislation of the same vicious and inhibited character. It is difficult, if not impossible, to escape from that position.

Classification is not expressly forbidden by the Constitution. On the contrary it is distinctly recognized for certain purposes. For example, article 9, section 1, declares: "All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws." Thus, by necessary implication, authority is given to classify property for the purpose of taxation, but by express mandate of the last clause above quoted, all taxes must be levied and collected under general, and not special or local, laws.

During the session of the Legislature immediately preceding the adoption of the present Constitution nearly 150 local or special laws were enacted for the city of Philadelphia, more than one third that number for the city of Pittsburgh, and for other municipal divisions of the State about the same proportion. This was by no means exceptional. The pernicious system of special legislation, practiced for many years before, had become so general and deep rooted, and the evils resulting therefrom so alarming, that the people of the Commonwealth determined to apply the only remedy that promised any hope of relief. Doubtless it was a proper appreciation of the magnitude of the evil, as much as anything else, that called into existence the convention that framed the present Constitution and induced its adoption by an overwhelming vote. One of the manifest objects of that instrument was to eradicate that species of legislation and substitute, in lieu of it, general laws whenever it was possible to do so.

This is so clearly apparent that no unbiased mind can contemplate the seventh section of article 8, and kindred provisions, without reaching that conclusion. That section contains a schedule of nearly fifty prolific subjects of previous special and local legislation, and ordains that "The General Assembly shall not pass any local or special law" relating to either of them. As an additional safeguard in cases where special legislation is not expressly prohibited, the next section declares: "No local or special bill shall be passed unless notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published," etc.

Among the prohibited subjects specified in the seventh section, supra, are "local or special laws authorizing the creation, extension, or impairing of liens," "regulating the affairs of counties, cities, townships, wards, boroughs or school districts;" authorizing the "laying out, opening, altering or maintaining roads, highways, streets or alleys;" "vacating roads, town plats, streets or alleys;" "incorporating cities, towns or villages, or changing their charters;" "creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, boroughs, townships, election or school districts;" "regulating the management of public schools, the building or repairing of school houses, and the raising of money for such purposes," etc.

In Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 388, the question of classification first arose under the Act of May 23, 1874, entitled "An Act Dividing the Cities of this State into Three Classes, Regulating the Passage of Ordinances," etc. It was there held that the Act, so far as its provisions were then involved, does not contravene the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of any local or special law "regulating the affairs of counties, cities," etc.; that the classification therein provided for is founded on certain manifest peculiarities, distinguishing the cities of each class from the others, and to some extent, at least, demanding legislation for each respectively, that would not only be unnecessary but detrimental to the other classes; and hence the Act, so far as its provisions were involved in that contention, was constitutional.

It is not necessary to refer specially to the reasons given in support of these conclusions; nor is any attempt to further fortify the latter by suggesting other reasons required. All that can be profitably said on the questions involved will be found in the elaborate and exhaustive opinion of the court delivered by our Brother Paxson. We are not asked to overrule that case, but simply to say that classification, as a mere pretext for special and local legislation, has since been carried to an extreme for which no warrant can be found either in the fundamental law or the decisions of this court.

The question was again presented in Kugore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401. In that case, Chief Justice Agnew, referring to Wheeler v. Philadelphia, supra, said: "We adhere to that decision, and indeed cannot see how the question of power could have been decided differently. To say that no general law can be passed to regulate a certain subject, because some of the classes contained in the regulation do not exist or exist only in a limited form, is to hold that no law can be passed to provide for future wants and necessities. The welfare of the State, and one of the chief purposes of legislation would be struck down by such a decision."

Subsequent legislation clearly indicates that the scope of the decision in Wheeler v. Philadelphia was either misunderstood or ignored. It was never intended to license indiscriminate classification as a mere pretext for the enactment of laws essentially local or special.

Repeated and pointed admonitions of that fact were given in subsequent cases involving the general subject. In 1878 an Act was passed the sole object of which was to provide specially for holding courts in the city of Titusville in the county of Crawford. For the purpose of individuating that city and county and limiting the operation of the Act to them, without mentioning either by name, the following ingenious but deceptive periphrasis was employed: "In all counties of this Commonwealth where there is a population of more than 60,000 inhabitants, and in which there shall be any city incorporated, at the time of the passage of this Act, with a population exceeding 8,000 inhabitants, situate at a distance from the county-seat of more than twenty-seven miles by the usually traveled public road, it shall be the duty of the president judge or additional law judges, or either of them, to make an order providing for the holding of one week of court, at each regular term of court for said county, for the trial of civil or criminal cases in said city." In Com. v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258, this covert attempt at special legislation was fitly characterized as "classification run mad."

At the next session of the Legislature another abortive attempt was made to accomplish the same object by a somewhat different but at the same time equally elaborate circumlocution, differing from the former, not in kind, but only in degree. In pronouncing that Act also unconstitutional this court said:

"It is no part of our business to discuss the wisdom of this legislation. However vicious in principle we might regard it, our plain duty is to enforce it, provided it is not in conflict with the fundamental law. It requires but a glance at the Act to see that it is an attempt to evade the Constitution. It is special legislation under the attempted disguise of a general law. Of all forms of special legislation, this is the most vicious. . . . The Act was doubtless regarded by its framers as classification of counties, but it is not so. Nor does any good reason occur to my mind why there should be such classification. If there be such reasons, amounting to a necessity thereof, we shall probably hear of them in due season. In the mean time, classification which is grounded in no necessity, and has for its sole object an evasion of the Constitution, will not be encouraged." Seowden's App. 96 Pa. 422.

Again, in Morrison v. Bachert, 112 Pa. 322, 3 Cent. Rep. 117, an attempt to classify counties for the purpose of regulating fees of officers was declared unconstitutional. Referring to the section now under consideration, our Brother Paxson, by whom the opinions in the two last cited cases were delivered, said: "It was a wise provision, and will be sternly enforced. It is our purpose to adhere rigidly to that instrument, that the people may not be deprived of its benefits. It ought not to be necessary for this court to make this judicial declaration, but it is proper to do so in view of the amount of legislation which is periodically placed upon the statute book in entire disregard of the fundamental law. Much of this legislation may remain unchallenged for years only to be overturned when it reaches this court. In the mean time parties may have acted upon it, rights may have grown up, and the inconvenience and loss entailed thereby may not be inconsiderable. As we view it, this note of warning at this time is needed."

Other cases might be cited in which similar notes of warning were sounded. Among these are Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 877; McCarthy v. Com. 16 W. N. C. 497; Seranton School District's App. 4 Cent. Rep. 811, 118 Pa. 176; Seranton v. Silkman, 4 Cent. Rep. 317, 118 Pa. 9 L. R. A.

191; Strine v. Folts, 4 Cent. Rep. 288, 118 Pa. 849; Phila. v. Haddington M. E. Church, 6 Cent. Rep. 419, 115 Pa. 291; Evans v. Phillips, 9 Cent. Rep. 691, 117 Pa. 226; Weinman v. Wilkinsburg R. Co. 11 Cent. Rep. 54, 118 Pa. 192.

In Seranton School District's Appeal, supra, it was said by our Brother Green: "All our recent decisions are to the effect that if local results either are or may be produced by a piece of legislation, it offends against" the article prohibiting local or special legislation.

In Philadelphia v. Haddington M. E. Church, supra, an Act giving to a scire facies the effect of extending municipal liens in cities of the first class was pronounced unconstitutional for similar reasons.

In Weinman v. Wilkinsburg Railway Company, supra, it was held that an Act providing for the incorporation and regulation of street railway companies, in cities of the second and third classes, was both special and local legislation, and therefore unconstitutional—special, because it relates to only a few of the general class known as street railway companies, and local, in that its operations are confined to specified localities. In that case our Brother Williams, referring to the subject of classification, said:

"For purposes of local government the State is subdivided into counties, townships, and other municipal and quasi municipal corporations. Each class of these subdivisions has purposes to subserve that are peculiar to it, and needs to be invested with the powers necessary to that end. Generally speaking, all the members of each class have the same local functions to perform. Classification, therefore, on that basis, has been recognized, and a statute relating to all the townships, all the school districts, or all the members of any particular class of the municipal divisions of the State has been held to be constitutional. It has been found desirable to divide cities into classes upon the basis of their population. The needs of a great city with half a million or more of people are somewhat different, in many respects, from the needs of a city with 10,000. The organization of their local governments and the management of their municipal affairs will be quite unlike. Each of these classes requires legislation peculiar to itself; but such legislation must be applicable to all the members of the class to which it relates, and must be directed to the existence and regulation of municipal powers and local government."

Some of the cases above cited have been quoted at considerable length for the purpose of showing that this court never intended to sanction classification as a pretext for special or local legislation. On the contrary, the underlying principle of all the cases is that classification, with the view of legislating for either class separately, is essentially unconstitutional, unless a necessity therefor exists—a necessity springing from manifest peculiarities, clearly distinguishing those of one class from each of the other classes, and imperatively demanding legislation for each class, separately, that would be useless and detrimental to the others.

Laws enacted in pursuance of such a classification and for such purposes, are, properly speaking, neither local nor special. They are general laws, because they apply alike to all that are similarly situated as to their peculiar necessities. All legislation is necessarily based on a classification of its subjects; and, when such classification is fairly made, laws enacted in conformity thereto cannot be properly characterized as either local or special. A law prescribing the mode of incorporating all railroad companies is special in the narrow sense that it is confined in its operations to one kind of corporation only; and by the same test, a law providing a single system for organization and government of boroughs, in the State, would be a local law; but everyone conversant with the meaning of those words, when used in that connection, would unhesitatingly pronounce such statutes general laws. But, as was said in Scowden's Appeal, supra: "Classification which is grounded on no necessity and has for its sole object an evasion of the Constitution," is quite a different thing.

The purpose of the provision under consideration was not to limit legislation, but merely to prohibit the doing, by local or special laws, that which can be accomplished by general laws. It relates not to the substance, but to the method of legislation, and imperatively demands the enactment of general, instead of local or special laws, whenever the former are at all practicable.

The Act of 1874, dividing the cities of the State into three classes, viz.: those containing over 800,000 population, those containing less than 800,000 and exceeding 100,000, and those containing less than 100,000 and exceeding 10,000, was sustained, to such of its provisions as have been involved in adjudicated cases, because it was considered within the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. As to the number of classes created, that Act appears to have covered the entire ground of classification. It provided for all existing as well as every conceivable prospective necessity. It is impossible to suggest any legislation that has or may hereafter become necessary for any member of either class that cannot, without detriment to other members of the same class, be made applicable to all of them.

If classification had stopped where the Act of 1874 left it, it would have been well; but it did not. Without the slightest foundation in necessity, the number of classes was soon increased to five, and afterwards to seven; and if the vicious principle on which that was done be recognized by the courts, the number may at any time be further increased until it equals the number of cities in the Commonwealth. The only possible purpose of such classification is evasion of the constitutional limitation; and, as such, it ought to be unhesitatingly condemned.

The fact that the extended classification of 1876, and more especially that of 1887, is unnecessary and therefore unwarranted, is manifest from an inspection of the Acts themselves. With very few and quite unimportant exceptions, the charter powers of the fourth to seventh classes, inclusive, under the latter Act, are precisely similar. There is nothing in either of the points of difference that can possibly be regarded as essential. Aside from the improper consideration that five classes furnish greater facilities for special legislation than one class would do, there is nothing to prevent the last four classes from being included in the third class established by the Act of 1874, which comprises all cities of more than 10,000 and less than 100,000 population. Their needs are all so similar that no charter power required for either of them would be unnecessary or detrimental to any of the others. The larger cities of such a class—that is, a class embracing all cities over 10,000 and less than 100,000 population—would doubtless require a larger representation in each branch of councils; but that of course would be easily regulated by the adoption of a suitable ward and population basis of representation.

Reference might also be made to several special provisions of the Act of 1887, such as those relating to public schools, taxation and municipal claims, creation and continuance of tax liens, and sales of real estate therefor, etc., but it is unnecessary. In greater or less degree, they all offend against provisions prohibiting special legislation. In addition to that the subject of public schools is not even hinted at in the title of the Act. Moreover, school districts, as quasi corporations belonging to the public school system, have no necessary connection with municipal government. It is expressly required, as we have seen, that "All taxes shall be levied and collected under general laws;" and it is impossible to suggest any valid reason why they should not be thus levied and collected. When the present Constitution was adopted, local and special laws, relating to public schools, assessment and collection of taxes, etc., were in force in some of the cities, and remained unaffected by that instrument; but that fact will not justify the substitution of other local or special laws in their stead. When new legislation is resorted to, it must conform to the requirements of the Constitution.

It has been suggested that such provisions of the classification Acts as are not in harmony with the Constitution may be eliminated without destroying other provisions thereof; but that is no answer to the crowning vice of unnecessary and excessive classification which stands out in bold relief on the face of both Acts, and of which nearly all their provisions are predicated. Those Acts doubtless contain many wise and wholesome provisions; but they are so interwoven with, and dependent on, others that are unconstitutional and void, that neither of the Acts of 1876 or 1887 can be sustained, even in part.

It has also been suggested that the question of necessity for classification and the extent thereof, as well as of what are local or special laws, is a legislative, and not a judicial, question. The answer to that is obvious. The people, in their wisdom, have seen fit, not only to prescribe the form of enacting laws, but also, as to certain subjects, the method of legislation, by ordaining that no local or special law relating to those subjects shall be passed. Whether, in any given case, the Legislature has transcended its power and passed a law in conflict with that limitation is essentially a question of law, and must necessarily be decided by the courts.

To warrant a conclusion that the people, in ordaining such limitations, intended to invest their law makers with judicial power, and thus make them final arbiters of the validity of their own acts, would require the clearest and most emphatic language to that effect. No such intention is expressed in the Constitution, and none can be inferred from any of its provisions. That those limitations were designed to establish a fixed and permanent rule cannot be doubted; but, if the ultimate application of that rule were to rest solely on the judgment of the body on which it was intended to operate, nothing could be more flexible.

As was well said in Pell v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 71, 80: "No standard could be established by which the law maker could be guided, and what might be rejected at one session as improper might become a law at the next, and thus the rule would fluctuate with the ever changing membership of that body. The validity of an Act would depend not so much upon the fixed rule of the Constitution as upon the liberality or strictness with which successive Legislatures, under the pressure of local influences, might determine to interpret the restraint upon their own action. . . . That the Legislature would act in good faith must be presumed. Purity of motive and a desire to keep within the prescribed limitations must be conceded to its members at all times; but that the people should have deliberately framed and imbedded in their organic law a provision to prohibit special legislation where general laws might be passed, and, at the same time, should have intended to put legislative action beyond review, where there was a clear infraction of the prohibition, is a proposition to which it seems impossible to assent."

No such proposition can be entertained by the courts without abandoning one of the most important branches of jurisdiction committed to them by the fundamental law, viz.: the power to ultimately determine whether or not a given law is local or special, and has been passed in disregard of the constitutional limitation that has been placed upon the power of the Legislature.

It follows that the decree of the court below is correct not only on the ground that, as to the city of Wilkesbarre, the Act of 1887 is not yet operative, but also on the broader ground that the Act is unconstitutional and void.

INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, Piff. in Err.,
v.

FIDELITY TITLE & TRUST CO., Trustee.

(....Pa....)

Where a person whose property was injured by an explosion of gas brought an action against the gas company for such portion of his loss as was not covered by insurance, and gave a release which was expressly declared not to affect his claim against the insurance companies, such release is no defense to an action on policies of insurance.

(January 14, 1899.)

3 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Allegheny County, to review a judgment for plaintiff in an action upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Isaac S. VanVoorhis for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Geo. P. Hamilton for defendant in error.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a policy of insurance against loss by fire in the usual form. Judgment was entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense, and this is the action complained of. The affidavit admits the genuineness of the policy, the fire, the loss as adjusted and the liability of the insurance company under the terms of its policy, but denies the right of the plaintiff to recover, for the following reasons:

(1) The fire resulted from the criminal negligence of the People's Natural Gas Company, which is therefore liable for the loss.

(2) Its own liability to the insured is in the nature of that of a surety, and upon payment of the loss to the plaintiff it has a right to be substituted to its right of action against the gas company.

(3) That it has demanded an assignment of such right of action, which has been refused.

(4) That the insured has settled with the gas company, and released it from liability for the fire, as appears by a copy of the settlement and release attached to the affidavit.

Two questions are thus raised: Is the refusal of the insured to make an assignment of its cause of action against the gas company, on request of the insurer, a defense in this action on the policy? Does the settlement and release attached to the affidavit cover the loss by fire now sued for? Upon the first of these questions it must be remembered that the right to subrogation or substitution does not rest on an express covenant to assign, as in the case of the Niagara Insurance Company v. Fidelity Title & Trust Company, decided at the present term.

In the absence of such covenant it rests on equitable principles applicable to the relations which these parties sustain to each other. If it be conceded that the insurer stands in the position of a surety for loss sustained by reason of the wrongful acts of others, and has a right to the remedies which the insured might employ against them, after it has discharged its liability under its policy, still it has no reason for demanding substitution in advance. It is not a liability to pay, but an actual payment to the creditor, which raises the equitable right to be subrogated to his remedies. Kyner v. Kyner, 6 Watts, 227; Hoover v. Epler, 53 Pa. 523; Appeal of the Forest Oil Co. 118 Pa. 188, 10 Cent. Rep. 899.

A demand made by the surety for subrogation, before he has discharged the liability out of which it grows, is without anything to support it; and the creditor may properly refuse it without affecting thereby his right of action against the surety. The refusal of the assignment demanded by the insurer in this case in advance of payment of the loss is therefore no defense to this action. Nor does the settlement and release of December 30, 1887, appear to cover, and so extinguish, the plaintiff's cause of action. It is plain and explicit in its provisions, and purports to settle and release "all claims and demands of every kind of the said first party arising out of or occasioned by the explosion in the Patterson Block on October 9, 1887, including claims for loss or suspension of rent by the tenants of said first party."

These general expressions are limited and explained in a later paragraph which declares that "It is understood that the foregoing settlement and release do not affect the claim of said first party against insurance companies for loss occasioned by fire, and which claim said first party shall be entitled to receive in addition to, and independently of, the sum paid by said second party."

From the terms of this settlement and release it is evident that the loss by fire was not paid by the gas company, but was expressly excepted from its operations. The injury done by the destructive power of the explosion in shattering walls and windows, in the destruction of articles of furniture, and making rooms temporarily unfit for occupancy, is included, but the loss from fire is excluded from its operations; and the right to recover therefor as an unsatisfied claim, valid and subsisting, against the insurers, is distinctly asserted. If the fire resulted from the explosion, and the explosion was chargeable to the negligence of the gas company, the insured had an election whether to proceed against the gas company because of its negligence, or against the insurance company, on its covenant to indemnify. If the insured had proceeded against the gas company, a recovery against it for the loss by fire would, when paid, have reimbursed the insured; and its claim being thus satisfied no recovery could have been had against the insurance company. But the insured has chosen to divide its loss into two parts, and to demand one of these not covered by its policies of insurance from the gas company, and the other which is covered, from the insurance company.

The liability of the insurer is clear. The claim is within the letter of its policy. Whether the gas company is liable to reimburse the insurer in an action brought, in the name of the insured, for its use, will depend on whether the fire was the result of criminal negligence of the gas company. This part of the demand of the insured has not been paid by the gas company, nor has it been extinguished by the terms of the release. On the other hand, it has been expressly saved from the operations of the release and asserted to be a valid claim "which said first party shall be entitled to receive in addition to, and independently of, the sum paid by said second party." After having thus asserted the existence of this claim as unpaid or subsisting, the gas company could not be heard, after a recovery against the insurance company, to deny its validity, or to assert its release or extinguishment.

The right of action and demand released were those paid by the gas company. That not paid does not purport to be released, but is asserted to subsist. It has neither been disposed of by the parties nor by the law, but remains for adjudication in the same manner and with the same effect as though the release of December 30, 1887, had not been executed. The court below was right in holding the affidavit to be insufficient, and in directing judgment to be entered for that reason.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Harford County in favor of defendants in an action to recover damages for death alleged to have resulted from the unskillful performance of a surgical operation. Affirmed.

Argued before Alvey, Ch. J., Stone, Robinson, McSherry, Irving, Miller and Yellott, JJ.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Geo. L. Van Bibber, William Young, W. T. Warburton and Albert Constable for appellants.

Messrs. Geo. Y. Maynardier, John W. Falls, William S. Evans and C. C. Crothers for appellees.

Yellott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action for damages was brought against the appellees, who are physicians residing in Cecil County. It is alleged in the declaration that they caused the death of one Matilda Janney by unskillfully or wrongfully performing a surgical operation. The action was brought in the name of the State for the benefit of the appellants, one of whom was her husband, and the others were the children of the deceased.

Under the provisions of article 87 of the Maryland Code, if the death is caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of the defendant a suit may be instituted for the benefit of the husband, wife, parent or child of the deceased.

The evidence shows that the deceased had been afflicted by the formation of a lump in her right breast. It was supposed at first to be a tumor, but afterwards was ascertained to be a cancer. The defendant, Housekeeper, a regular physician, was consulted and advised a surgical operation. A day for the performance of the operation was appointed, and the two defendants and another physician were present and performed the operation by cutting off the entire right breast. The operation was performed about the first of June, and the death occurred on the fifth of December following; and is not attributed, with any degree of certainty to the effects of the surgical operation. Some portions of the evidence tend to prove that the wound caused by the surgical instruments was entirely healed, and that death was produced by tubercular meningitis. In the conflict of testimony this was a fact to be determined by the jury.

The husband of the deceased, who is one of the equitable plaintiffs, relies upon the fact that although he expressed a willingness that there should be an operation for a tumor, he did not consent to the excision of a cancer. He says that he told Dr. Housekeeper that if the formation in the breast was a cancer, he objected to its removal. His own testimony shows that he assisted the physicians in preparing to perform the operation, and though not in the room where it was performed, was near at hand. He says he supposed that the medical men were operating for a tumor, and that he would not have consented to an operation for a cancer. There is evidence from which a jury might infer that the patient knew that the formation in her breast was a cancer. When the doctors came to the house she had already prepared herself to undergo the operation. If she consented to the operation the doctors were justified in performing it, if, after consultation, they deemed it necessary for the preservation and prolongation of the patient's life.

Surely the law does not authorize the husband to say to his wife: "You shall die of the cancer; you cannot be cured; and a surgical operation, affording only temporary relief, will result in useless expense." The husband had no power to withhold from his wife the medical assistance which her case might require. Harris v. Lee, 1 P. Wms. 482; Mayhew v. Thayer, 8 Gray, 172.

As was said by the Supreme Court of Michigan in the recent case of Carstens v. Hanselman, 1 Am. St. Rep. 607 (S. C. 61 Mich. 426): "It would be a cruel rule for her, if she cannot, in his absence, at least, or in his presence if he does not himself provide for her, make a binding agreement for any necessities, whether articles to be purchased or professional help, without becoming a public charge. It is not to be expected that physicians and surgeons will always feel bound to render gratuitous treatment to injured persons; and when the occasion is pressing it would be unreasonable to delay until an absent husband is communicated with to learn whether he consents or refuses to assume her contracts. Time will not allow minute inquiries, and humanity will not prompt them. It seems to us that no sensible line can be drawn between contracts for food and clothing and contracts for medical aid."

The consent of the wife, not that of the husband, was necessary. The professional men whom she had called in and consulted, being possessed of skill and scientific knowledge, were the proper persons to determine what ought to be done. They could not, of course, compel her to submit to an operation; but if she voluntarily submitted to its performance her consent will be presumed, unless she was the victim of a false and fraudulent misrepresentation, which is a material fact to be established by proof. The court below was therefore right in rejecting the first and third prayers of the plaintiffs, which place the burden of proof in regard to consent on the defendants. If the plaintiff alleges that there was no consent, he must establish his affirmation by proof. The party who allows a surgical operation to be performed is presumed to have employed the surgeon for that particular purpose. Gladwell v. Steggall, 5 Bing. N. C. 738.

It was the duty of the professional men to exercise ordinary care and skill; and this being a duty imposed by law, it will be presumed that the operation was carefully and skillfully performed, in the absence of proof to the contrary. As all persons are presumed to have duly performed any duty imposed on them, negligence cannot be presumed, but must be affirmatively proved. Best, Presump. 68; Jacksonville Street R. Co. v. Chappell, 21 Fla. 175.

This principle is especially applicable in suits against physicians and surgeons for injuries sustained by reason of alleged unskillful and careless treatment. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show a want of proper knowledge and skill. Leighton v. Sargent, 81 N. H. 119; Baird v. Morford, 29 Iowa, 531.

The court below committed no error in determining that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that the operation was performed without the consent of the patient, and also that her death was caused by unskillful and careless treatment of the physicians. Nor did the court commit any error in granting the defendants' second prayer, which enunciates the proposition that if death was caused by tubercular meningitis or other disease not produced by the operation, the defendants are not liable.

The defendants' fourth prayer is also correct and was properly granted. In it the jury are told that even if the disease resulting in death was caused by the operation, the defendants are not liable if they performed said operation with the patient's consent, in a careful and skillful manner, and under the belief that said operation was proper to be performed.

In the defendants' third prayer the jury are told the degree of care and skill required is that reasonable degree of care and skill which physicians and surgeons ordinarily exercise in the treatment of their patients, and that the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to establish the want of such skill and care in the performance of the operation and attendance on the deceased while under treatment. There was no error in granting this instruction.

It is proper to add that there was no evidence in the cause to sustain the plaintiff's case as stated in the first count of his declaration.

Finding no error in any of the rulings of the court below, its judgment must be affirmed.

John F. HARMON

v.

LEHMAN, Durr & Co.

LEHMAN, Durr & Co.

v.

John F. HARMON.

(....Ala.....)

1. Where a man gives his note jointly with his sons, who sign as a firm and as individuals to 2 L. R. A.

raise money for the use of the firm, and he executes a mortgage to secure a compliance with the terms of the note, all the parties are bound as principals to the lender, although, as between the borrowers, he may be merely a surety for his sons.

2. A note given for the repayment of money borrowed, with interest, stipulating in addition that, for every $10 so advanced the borrower bound himself to deliver to the lender for storage and sale on commission one bale of cotton, in default of which he should pay as liquidated damages storage for one month, and commissions for selling, is not usurious if the advance is made by a warehouseman or commission merchant, with a reasonable expectation that the borrower can perform the stipulation as to delivering the cotton; but if there is no reasonable expectation of his being able to deliver it, the contract is usurious.

3. A lender of money on an agreement stipulating, not only for repayment, but for the delivery to him of cotton to be sold on commission, cannot charge a larger price for the service in selling and storing the cotton than he charges for the same service where no money is loaned. If he does, the contract is usurious.

4. If a contract is usurious no custom can legalize it.

(December 18, 1888.)

CROSS appeals from a judgment of the Chancery Court of Montgomery County, refusing to enjoin the sale of lands under a mortgage, and decreeing its foreclosure. Reversed.

The bill was filed by Harmon against Lehman, Durr & Co., to enjoin the sale of lands under a mortgage, which the complainant and his wife had executed to the defendants, and for the redemption of the lands, and for an account. The bill contained a charge of usury. The answer denied the charge of usury, and defendants filed a cross-bill asking for a foreclosure of the mortgage.

The facts are fully stated in the following opinion, delivered in the court below by Chancellor COLEMAN:

The case made by the bill is that Harmon Bros. borrowed money from Lehman, Durr & Co., to be used in the purchase of cotton, and gave their father John F. Harmon, as security, who signed the note, and executed a mortgage upon certain lands belonging to him, which are described in the bill, with the understanding that the money was to be used in the purchase of cotton, which, when sold, was to be applied to the payment of the mortgage debt. The bill further alleges that the loan was usurious.

The bill alleges the purchase of cotton with the money, and asserts that, if the proceeds had been applied according to the agreement, the mortgage debt would be paid; and it concludes with an offer to pay any balance that might remain unpaid.

Respondents admit that Harmon Bros. desired to borrow money, and their refusal to loan without security; also the execution of the note and mortgage, and the loan of $5,000; but they deny that the loan was to Harmon Bros., and deny that it was a part of their original agreement that the money was to be used in the purchase of cotton alone, or that the proceeds of the cotton purchased with the money was to be applied to the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage. They also deny any usurious intention in connection with the loan, and ask a foreclosure of the mortgage. This short statement presents the main points for consideration.

Taking detached portions of the complainant's testimony, it may be that his proof sustains the case made by the bill; but, considering his evidence as a whole, it is far from satisfying the court that he is entitled to all the relief asked for in the bill. In complainant's deposition T. B. Harmon uses the following language:

"We stated to him [meaning John F. Harmon] that we wanted to make arrangements for him to borrow some money, and for him to be responsible, or bind his lands for that amount, and let us have some money to buy some cotton; and that when we sold the cotton we would take up the mortgage. Our father said that was all right."

Is there any reason why other portions of complainant's testimony should have more weight than this simple statement, which is so consistent with the entire transaction and proceedings from that time on, and with John F. Harmon's own conduct? He evidently understood that the money was borrowed in his name, or else why give the check to Harmon Brothers? If he understood that he was simply a surety, and Harmon Brothers the principals, by what process of reasoning could he come to the conclusion that the money was placed to his credit—a mere surety—by Lehman, Durr & Co., instead of to the credit of the principals?

It may be said that equity looks at the real transaction of the parties as it was, and not as it appears to be. That may be true; but equity cannot prescribe the terms and securities upon which a man may lend his money, provided those terms do not contravene some statute or public policy; nor will a court of equity change those terms. As between John F. Harmon and his sons, he doubtless borrowed the money for them. He was willing to trust them. But as between the complainant, Harmon Brothers, and Lehman, Durr & Co., the latter evidently has the right to prescribe the terms of the loan. The note and mortgage bear date January 26, 1886. T. B. Harmon testifies that it was not signed until several days after this date, but was signed before the money was drawn by them. Why do we find them on the third of February using this money for other purposes than to buy cotton, if it was to be used only in the purchase of cotton?

Considering the whole evidence of the complainant together, it fails to impress the court favorably. It must not be understood that the conversations between John F. Harmon and Harmon Brothers, in the absence of Lehman, Durr & Co., or some member or agent of the firm, are considered by the court as legal evidence, or as binding upon them, unless communicated, and so as to have entered into the making the contract for the loan. Without pressing upon the question whether Harmon Brothers were the agents of Lehman, Durr & Co. in making the trade with the complainant, as insisted by him, we simply state that one who deals with an agent does so at his peril; and the proof does not sustain the claim that Harmon Brothers were authorized by respondents to make said contract.

When the complainant's evidence is considered in connection with respondents' testimony, we cannot perceive any reason why complainant should have the proceeds of the cotton bought and paid for with the borrowed money applied to the mortgage debt. The statement by Harmon Brothers that the respondents were directed to sell the seventy-seven bales of cotton, and so apply the proceeds, is not sustained by the evidence; and the application made by them, as shown by the stated account rendered, to which there was no dissent, must be conclusive against Harmon Brothers. We think the complainant utterly fails to sustain this branch of his case. If there was any money in the hands of respondents, belonging to Harmon Brothers, or if the evidence established the fact that Lehman, Durr & Co. were properly chargeable with cotton, or the proceeds of cotton, for which they have not accounted, after the payment of any balance that might be due them from Harmon Brothers, such money should be credited on the debt secured by the mortgage of January 26, 1886.

Let us now consider the question of usury: if, upon consideration of all the circumstances, it should appear that the language used or the stipulations made "were a mere device to evade the statute against usury, to conceal the real intent, the mere form will not relieve the contract from the consequences of usury." Swilley v. Lyon, 18 Ala. 552, per Dargan, Ch. J.: "The intent is the test. Was it intended to compensate for risk, trouble or expense incurred at the request of the debtor?—or was it intended to give the creditor additional profit for the loan of money?" Was it reasonably expected that the 500 bales of cotton could be delivered by the Harmons? If not, Lehman, Durr & Co. could as easily have contracted for the payment of so much money as interest, as for the storage and commissions. Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 582.

Did the respondents make the heavy outlay of $25,000 or $30,000, annually, in running their business as warehousemen, and in order to meet this expense, and to promote their interest as commission merchants, loan money and require a shipment of so much as ten bales on the $100 loaned?

The witness Roman states and repeats that this expense is estimated and provided for after the money is loaned. He says: "We regulate the fall business by the advances made in the spring. We engage such force as we think necessary from the amount of money advanced in the spring. The arrangements are made by May the first, for we can tell by that time how much cotton we can handle."

We do not think that a contract made in the spring, which is at the time usurious, can be purged of the taint of usury, because respondents incur large expense to enable them to carry out their part of the usurious contract. They contract to loan a man $100, for which he is to pay them 8 per cent interest, and, in addition thereto, make him agree to ship them bales of cotton worth $400, or, in default thereof, pay as liquidated damages an amount equal to fifty cents per bale storage, and 14 per cent commissions; amounting to 11 per cent additional to the legal rate; total interest, 19 per cent.

A shipment of three bales would pay the interest on the $100, yet the borrower is required to ship seven more bales; storage on the extra seven bales, $3.50; commissions, $4.20; total extra payments, $7.70—or nearly double legal interest. This is usury, unless it be held that the expense incurred to serve the business of warehousemen and commission merchants frees the contract from usury. Can this be done, when the facts are as stated by Mr. Roman? "We regulate the expense after the money is loaned."

But, under the facts of this case, could Lehman, Durr & Co. have reasonably expected the shipment of 500 bales of cotton from the Harmons, including the cotton to be made by John F. Harmon? They did business with John F. Harmon & Son in 1884, and with all of them in 1885. They had very accurate information as to the means of these persons. In January, 1886, Harmon Brothers were not able to meet their past liabilities, and Lehman, Durr & Co. refused to lend them money, or to do business longer without security.

Respondents were reasonably advised that from thirty to fifty bales was the extent of John F. Harmon's ability to ship. From what source was the 500 bales to come, which, at $40 per bale, required an outlay of $20,000?

Respondents say that Harmon Brothers were to buy out some merchant or business at Union Springs. But how were they to buy out this large business? They were not then able to pay their indebtedness to Lehman, Durr & Co. Their father was to mortgage his property to obtain a loan of $5,000. As prudent men, Lehman, Durr & Co. reasonably knew that the cotton (500 bales) would not be shipped unless they furnished the money to buy it with. No one else would loan them the money, for they were under mortgage, and in debt to Lehman, Durr & Co. The commissions to be paid are in excess of the usual rate of commissions charged in Montgomery.

Whatever view we take of the transaction, we are of opinion that the contract was usurious, which required commissions and storage of cotton not shipped.

The greatest difficulty is in determining the status of the seventeen bales sent to respondents by John F. Harmon on his wagons. This cotton was included in the mortgage, and the law would apply its proceeds to the credit of the mortgage debt, unless John F. Harmon has by some act waived his right to have it so applied. Mr. Durr was questioned as to this cotton.

Q. The negro told you, didn't he, that he came from John F. Harmon's plantation?

A. Oh yes; he carried the cotton to the warehouse.

Q. Didn't he say he came from J. F. Harmon's plantation?

A. Well, he brought cotton from Mr. Harmon's, is about the way he stated it.

Mr. Gunter says that all the cotton was shipped in the name of Harmon Brothers, and for these seventeen bales refers to Exhibit D; but this exhibit evidently refers to other cotton. The letter of October 8 states that the seventeen bales of October 6 were shipped by railroad, for which Harmon Brothers held bill of lading. The other cottons mentioned in Exhibit D do not satisfy us that they were the cottons hauled in John F. Harmon's wagons. The respondents' testimony is not satisfactory as to these seventeen bales hauled from John F. Harmon's plantation, and we presume that they had reasonable knowledge that they came from his plantation. Has J. F. Harmon lost the right to have this cotton applied to the mortgage debt? Respondents say that it was received in the name of Harmon Brothers. Complainant says, in his deposition, that he sent Lehman, Durr & Co. twenty-four bales of cotton. "Sent a part by wagons, and my son sent a part by railway from Union Springs. I sent seventeen bales by wagon, for which they sent me back bills, or receipts, marked as 'Exhibits O, P, Q, R.' These exhibits are dated September 30, October 13, November 5, and November 10, extending over a term of five or six weeks. All of them are for cotton on account of Harmon Brothers, and none of them on account of J. F. Harmon.

Mr. J. F. Harmon testifies that some of his cotton had been shipped from Union Springs by his son. Why does he hold these receipts so long, and make no objection? and why permit his son to ship a part of the cotton? He may have been mistaken as to the financial condition of his sons. He may have had the utmost confidence in their financial ability and integrity, and supposed that they would see the mortgage debt paid. We cannot tell. But, having consented that Harmon Brothers might use the cotton for their own benefit, we are of opinion that Lehman, Durr & Co. should not suffer by reason of the fact that the cotton was included in the mortgage. If, however, Lehman, Durr & Co. have extended no further credit, or have not advanced any money upon this cotton shipped and received in the name of Harmon Brothers, then we see no reason why the cotton raised on the plantation of J. F. Harmon should not be applied to the mortgage debt.

J. F. Harmon identified the time of sending the seventeen bales by the Exhibits O, P, Q, R. Exhibit R is a receipt for five bales, and is dated September 30, 1886; Exhibit P is for two bales, and dated October 13; Exhibit Q is for five bales, and dated November 5; and Exhibit O is for five bales, and dated November 10.

By reference to the stated account of Lehman, Durr & Co., it will be seen that the least debit of Harmon Brothers was for the payment of their check for $700 in favor of the Bullock County Bank, and dated October 9, 1886. Harmon Brothers drew no money, and received no credit from Lehman, Durr & Co., because of the two bales sent to them October 13; five bales November 1; five bales November 5; and five bales November 10—identified by Patterson, Garland and Covington. As to these twelve bales sent by wagons, Lehman, Durr & Co. have been no more damaged or injured by the receipt of this cotton, though sent in the name of Harmon Brothers, than if the same had been sent in expressly in the name of J. F. Harmon, with the directions to be applied to the mortgage debt. This being true, is there any equitable reason why the proceeds of the twelve bales should not be so applied? As for the seven bales shipped by his son from Union Springs, we have no dates given us, and cannot say, but judge from the account, that this shipment preceded the cotton sent by the wagons.

The mortgage provides for the payment of reasonable attorneys' fees incurred in the collection by foreclosure of the mortgage or otherwise, and we regard this as a proper charge. There is a written agreement attached to the answer, and signed by complainant's solicitors, providing that respondents may be granted such relief as the facts of the case show they are entitled to, to the same extent as if set up in a cross bill, and relief especially prayed. This would be allowable without such agreement. McGuire v. Van Pelt, 55 Ala. 345.

The decree declared that the defendants were entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgage for the amount of the note and interest, and to reasonable attorneys' fees for services rendered in the cause; disallowed their claim for storage and commissions on cotton not delivered, and charged them with the value of the twelve bales of cotton particularly mentioned in that opinion; and ordered a statement of the accounts by the register, and sale of the land by him, if the amount found due on the accounting was not paid within forty days.

From this decree the complainant appealed and assigned as error: (1) "that the chancellor did not allow him all he claimed in his bill; (2) that the chancellor did not allow him credit for all the cotton raised on his plantation, and delivered to Lehman, Durr & Co.; (3) that the court allowed the respondents attorneys' fees for foreclosing the mortgage." Cross assignments of error were also made by Lehman, Durr & Co., because the chancellor held the contract usurious, and refused to allow them storage and commissions on the cotton not delivered, as liquidated damages.

Somerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have studied the record and the able opinion of the chancellor in this case with great care and interest, and the result is that we approve and adopt the chancellor's views in every respect save those hereafter noticed. We direct that his opinion in extenso be published in the report of our decision.

Both the testimony and the arguments of counsel tend to show that the inquiry whether John F. Harmon, or Harmon Brothers, were principal in the debt to Lehman, Durr & Co. was deemed important in the preparation of this cause. We confess we are not able to perceive its importance. But if we concede its materiality, we are not able to discover its bearing on the case before us. It is manifest that the money raised was intended for and used by Harmon Brothers, sons of John F. Harmon. It is equally manifest that Lehman, Durr & Co. refused to advance to Harmon Brothers on terms less binding than those demanded and acceded to.

The terms were that John F. Harmon should give his note conjointly with Harmon Brothers, they signing as a firm and as individuals, and that the former, J. F. Harmon, should execute the mortgage to secure a compliance with the terms of the note. The terms were acceded to, and the money obtained in the name of John F. Harmon, and immediately checked out by him in favor of Harmon Brothers.

The plain import of all this is that, the requirements of Lehman, Durr & Co. being acceded to, the money was advanced to John F. Harmon as principal debtor, on the condition, and only on the condition, that all the other sureties and securities should be bound for its repayment. Lending one's name by acceptance or otherwise, with a consequent pledge of primary liability, without consideration or inducement other than a spirit of accommodation, is not infrequent in commercial transactions.

In this case all the parties were bound as principals for the payment of the money to Lehman, Durr & Co. As between themselves, Harmon Brothers may have been bound to indemnify John F. Harmon for any loss he suffered. And while, as a crop lien, under the statute once of force, it is possible the facts we have been considering might exert some influence (on this question we intimate no opinion), considered as a mortgage, no question can arise growing out of the relations the parties sustain to each other under the facts disclosed in this record.

Lehman, Durr & Co. were warehousemen and commission merchants for the storage and sale of cotton on commission. As such they controlled a considerable amount of money, which it was their custom to advance to merchants and planters, as a means of increasing their business. Such, it was shown, was the general habit and custom of warehousemen and commission merchants throughout the country. Their plan was as follows: at the opening of the agricultural season they advanced to their customers a given sum of money, taking their notes for repayment, with interest from date, the payment to be made on some specified day during the next coming cotton season.

The contracts contained the following additional stipulations: that for every $10 so advanced, the merchant or planter, as the case might be, bound himself to deliver to them for storage and sale on commission one bale of cotton. And to the extent he might fail to deliver the number of bales stipulated, he bound himself to pay to them, as liquidated damages, storage for one month, and commissions for selling, the same as if the cotton had been received, stored one month, and sold by them. These additional stipulations, it is contended, are in their nature usurious; and it is further specially contended that it was and is usurious under the facts of this case. The chancellor disallowed these charges, holding that they were usurious. In this State, following the rulings of other courts, we have held that such contracts are not necessarily and per se usurious. If the person by whom the money is advanced is not engaged in the warehouse or commission business, and thus has no occupation which can be promoted by a compliance with its terms, such stipulation is but a cover for unlawful interest. Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 537.

So, if the advance be made by a warehouseman or commission merchant, and there is no reasonable expectation or ground for believing that the customer can perform the stipulation, this furnishes the requisite evidence that compliance was not expected, and renders the contract usurious. On the other hand, if in entering into or obtaining such promise there is a reasonable expectation or ground for believing that such contract can be complied with, this relieves it of all stain and imputation of usury, and the stipulation, if made to a warehouseman or commission merchant, is binding. Dorset v.

Mitchell, 65 Ala. 511; Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88; Pollard v. Baylors, 6 Munf. 433; Cockle v. Flack, 93 U. S. 844 [28 L. ed. 949]; Matthews v. Coe, 70 N. Y. 239.

The testimony in this case is very clear that there was no ground for believing that John F. Harmon, the mortgagor, would be able to deliver the 500 bales of cotton the contract bound him to deliver. He could have had no reasonable expectation of being able to deliver more than one tenth of that quantity. But Harmon Brothers, his sons, and for whose accommodation and use the money was obtained, were shown to be merchants engaged in business; and the testimony shows that they, in negotiating the advance, represented that they, in their business, would handle 800 bales of cotton; and whatever quantity their father failed to deliver they would deliver, so as to complete the 500 bales. This was sufficient ground for the reasonable expectation that the cotton would be delivered, and relieves the transaction of all imputation of usury on this account.

The stipulation in the mortgage to provide suitable storage, etc., is not an independent consideration, to uphold a promise otherwise illegal, or without consideration. Such service is incident to all lines of business or employment, and on its face indicates nothing which the relation itself does not impose as a duty. Pfeiffer v. Adler, 37 N. Y. 164; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 95.

There is one phase of this contract, however, which, in our judgment, stamps the transaction as usurious. The evidence shows that the usual charge in the city of Montgomery for selling consigned cotton was fifty cents per bale where no money was advanced by the consignee. The price stipulated for in the present contract is a commission of 14 per cent on the proceeds of sale, which will aggregate from sixty-seven to seventy-five cents per bale, or from seventeen to twenty-five cents more than their usual charge, estimating the price of cotton at from nine to ten cents per pound, as it was shown to be by the testimony. It is sought to legalize this charge, which is from 84 to 50 per cent more than the price of fifty cents, by showing that it was the customary price charged by commission merchants for selling cotton where they advanced money. The service to be performed in each contingency is precisely the same—the sale of the cotton. It is no more trouble to sell when money has been loaned, than when no money has been loaned. The thing to be charged for is the service rendered in making sale of the article consigned. The additional charge, therefore, from 80 odd to 50 per cent for the service rendered cannot rest on consideration of the service. There is nothing to support it but the loan of the money, for which lawful interest is also charged.

Usury is the "taking more for the use of money than the law allows." Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88, 91. If the contract is usurious, no custom can legalize it, because no custom is good which is contrary to law.

The lender, as we have often held, is not prohibited from charging an extra and reasonable amount for some incidental service, expense or risk, additional to the lawful interest, other than for the loan of money. He may charge the usual storage and reasonable commission for selling consigned goods. Donier v. Mitchell, 65 Ala. 511; Cockis v. Flack, 98 U. S. 844 [28 L. ed. 949].

He may charge reasonable commission, if engaged in the business of a commission merchant, for accepting bills of a customer, and providing funds for meeting such bills. This is a compensation for the service rendered in lending his credit and raising money to meet the debt of another, as in Brown v. Harrison, 17 Ala. 774, and cases of that class; Trotter v. Curtis, 19 Johns. 160, 10 Am. Dec. 911.

It is not the case of charging an additional bonus, over and above lawful interest, for the mere use of the money.

We conceive the law to be that, where the borrower of money agrees absolutely to pay commission for advancing money on goods consigned, in addition to lawful interest for the money, and based on no incidental service to be rendered by the consignee, the so called "commission" is none the less for the use of the money because called by another name than interest. To be sustained as lawful and rescue the contract from the taint of usury, we repeat, this additional charge must be shown to be based on some service rendered, some trouble encountered, or inconvenience sustained, or risk assumed by the lender, other than the advance of money. Stark v. Sperry, 6 Lea, 411, 40 Am. Rep. 47; Davis v. Garr, 6 N. Y. 124, 55 Am. Dec. 895, note and cases cited; Fanning v. Dunham, 5 Johns. Ch. 122, 9 Am. Dec. 288.

The charge, moreover, must be fair and reasonable, and the courts will scrutinize it with care, if suspicious, with the view of probing its true character. If it purports to be a charge for some incidental service to be rendered by the lender to the borrower, it must be a reasonable charge, adequate to the service, not extravagant or excessive, at the risk of being pronounced a mere cover for usury.

The appellees, Lehman, Durr & Co., were entitled to charge lawful interest for their money loaned. They could stipulate for the bona fide consignment of cotton by the borrower, and he could lawfully agree to pay reasonable storage on such cotton, in view of the fact that the consignees were warehousemen engaged in the cotton business. They could also charge the usual and reasonable price for selling cotton, such as was customary among commission merchants in Montgomery. But they could not charge one price for this service where no money was loaned, and a larger price for the same service where money was loaned. The necessary inference is that the excess of charge was not for the service, but as a bonus for the use of the money additional to lawful interest.

From the principles declared above it necessarily follows that the Harmons, or J. F. Harmon, can take nothing by their assignments of error, and the same are disallowed. In the case of Lehman, Durr & Co. v. Harmon, the chancellor erred in disallowing storage and customary commissions of fifty cents per bale for the cotton promised to be delivered under the contract. To this extent the decree of reference is altered and amended; and the register will take and state an account between the parties, and report the same to the Chancellor with all convenient speed. All other questions are reserved for decision by the Chancellor.

Reversed.

4. Whether or not the Legislature can authorize the consolidation of a corporation under the general power reserved to alter or annul the charter, it cannot do so when the rights of stockholders will thereby be affected by increasing their liability as such, or diminishing the value of their stock, unless the consolidation is made by the unanimous consent of the stockholders.

(December 18, 1888.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Shelby County (De Haven, J.), dissolving a temporary injunction, in a suit by certain stockholders of the Simpsonville & Buck Creek Turnpike Company, against that company and its directors and the Simpsonville & Fisherville Turnpike Company and its directors to enjoin a consolidation of the defendant companies. Reversed.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. G. Gilbert for appellants.

Mr. J. C. Beckner for appellees.

Pryor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants are members as stockholders of the Simpsonville & Buck Creek Turnpike Company. On the 20th of February, 1884, the Legislature of the State passed an Act authorizing the consolidation of the corporation of which they are members with another company styled the "Simpsonville & Fisherville Turnpike Company." The appellants, in order to prevent a consolidation of the two companies, filed their petition in equity against the directors of both corporations, and against each corporation, asking for an injunction preventing the merging of the two companies into the consolidated company. An injunction was granted, and afterwards dissolved, on the answer filed by the defendants, to the effect that the consolidation had been made, as provided by the Act, by the two boards of directors, and ratified by the stockholders, and nothing remained to be done but the election of directors for the consolidated company. The appellee maintains that, this answer or its averments not being denied, a dissolution of the injunction on the pleadings necessarily followed.

The Act under which the consolidation was made provided that, when the agreement between the board of directors of each company was entered into and ratified by a majority of the stockholders of the two companies, the consolidated company is to have all the powers heretofore enjoyed by both companies. The answer nowhere alleges that these appellants ever consented to the consolidation; and the statement that it was ratified by the stockholders must be taken as the act of the majority and not the whole. The stock of the appellants in one company has been transferred to another, or both merged into one, and the court will not imply, from an averment that it was ratified by the stockholders, that it was by the unanimous consent of all; for, if so, it should have been so pleaded, and the statement made must be construed as meaning that a majority voted for the consolidation; in other words, that the provisions of the Act were complied with.

It is further argued that these stockholders have no right to maintain the action, because the suit is for the corporation itself, and must therefore be brought in the name of the corporation, or some legal or equitable reason given for making the corporation a defendant instead of plaintiff. We do not understand, in a case like this, that the stockholders, or any of them, are denied the right to sue. The action of the board of directors in this case is alleged to be ultra vires, beyond the authority conferred on them by the charter; and in all such cases the stockholder may bring his action without consulting those who manage the legitimate affairs of the corporation. This is the rule recognized in Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, and in Shawhan v. Zinn, 79 Ky. 300.

Here the directors are attempting to transfer the stock of these appellants by a majority vote of the stockholders to a corporation of which they are not members, or to blend the stock and make one corporation out of both. This cannot be done without the consent of the stockholder, and is in plain disregard of his contract rights when he becomes a member of the corporation. There is no authority in the charter of the company to which he belongs authorizing a consolidation with any other company; and in such a state of case there is no authority holding that his property or rights in one company can be transferred, against his will, to another company.

The clause in the charter that the company, "in matters not expressed in the charter, shall have the rights and privileges granted to the most favored turnpike companies," will not be construed as affecting rights that are fundamental, and under it a power conferred or im-not contemplated by the charter, or are proceeding to apply the corporate funds to any other than corporate purposes, or, in general, if they are transcending their charter, equity will interfere. In such cases the court may grant relief at the suit of a single stockholder. Rogers v. Lafayette Agricultural Works, 52 Ind. 290; 2 Waterman, Corp. 619. If irreparable mischief to his interests may ensue meantime, equity will administer preventive justice until such time as the will of the body of stockholders can be ascertained. Samuel v. Holladay, Woolw. 400; Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450 (28 L. ed. 827). When he resorts to such proceedings to protect, not simply such interests, but the property and rights of the corporation, against the action or threatened action of third parties, thus assuming duties properly devolving upon directors, he must show a clear breach of duty on their part in neglecting or refusing to act in the matter. 2 Waterman, Corp. 620. And such neglect and refusal must not be simulated, but must be real and persisted in, after earnest efforts to overcome it.

Detroit v. Dean, 106 U. S. 537 (27 L. ed. 300). Yet if it be shown that a corporation cannot safely be left to obtain relief in the usual manner, equity will interfere at the suit of a stockholder without proof of a demand upon the managing agents and their wrongful neglect or refusal to proceed. Finney v. Bennett, 27 Gratt. 385; Crumlish v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. 28 W. Va. 623. On a bill by a stockholder praying a preliminary injunction to prevent the carrying out of a plan for the incorporation and consolidation of several joint stock associations, which plan has received the consent of nearly all of the stockholders, under a charter from the Legislature and asking the appointment of a receiver, where the charges of fraud made in the bill appear to be baseless, and it appears that no harm is apt to ensue to anyone from allowing such proceeding to go on according to the plan—the motion for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver pendente lite will be denied. Mills v. Hurd, 29 Fed. Rep. 410.

plied that will compel a stockholder to abandon his contract already entered into, and make a contract with others against his will. The stock in the one company may be worth greatly more than the stock in another company, or, if worth the same, the joint enterprise might be such as would deter the stockholder from taking his investment from one company and placing it in a joint stock company. Mr. Morawetz, in his work on Private Corporations, when treating of the consolidation of companies, says: "This can never be effected without the unanimous consent of the members of each company, and such consent cannot be inferred as an implied condition of their charter or articles of association." Section 197. See note to the left, with numerous adjudged cases.

Whether a consolidation could be authorized, under a general power reserved by the Legislature to alter or annul the charter, is not necessary to be decided. It is certain that it cannot be done when it affects the rights of the stockholders by increasing their liability as such, or diminishing the value of their stock; and with such a radical change the burden would be placed on the consolidated company to show that no harm could be done the stockholder entering his protest. Whether the appellants would be injured by this change does not appear in this record; and if it did, this court would be reluctant to hold, in the absence of authority in the charter, where one has become a stockholder in a turnpike road of a certain description, and for a certain purpose, that the Legislature could unite him as a stockholder in another corporation, and for other or additional objects in view than are to be found in his original contract. In so doing his contract is destroyed, and another made for him, against his consent.

In our opinion, the Act of consolidation in this case is void, unless made by the unanimous consent of the stockholders.

Judgment reversed, and remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

the trial court, viz.: that "Such ballots are the best evidence, and entitled to be recounted," is in conformity with law, and such as it pronounces on that state of facts.

(December 19, 1888.)

A PPEAL from a judgment of the Umatilla County Circuit Court, in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to contest defendant's right to the office of county clerk. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John C. Leasure, Fred Page-Tustin and Richard Williams, for appellant:

Some fact must be shown tending to establish the fact of misconduct, irregularity or mistake, before the court is warranted in ordering a recount of ballots, or in setting aside or going behind the returns of the canvassing board.

McCrory, Elections, § 280; People v. Livingston, 79 N. Y. 288; O'Gorman v. Richter, 81 Minn. 25.

The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, in a case like this, when he seeks to introduce the ballots in evidence to overturn the official count, to show affirmatively that the ballots have not been tampered with, and that no opportunity has been afforded for tampering with them, before they can be admitted in evidence.

See McCrory, Elections, § 277, p. 247; § 278, p. 249; People v. Burden, 45 Cal. 241; Coglan v. Beard, 65 Cal. 58; Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan. 177; Kingery v. Berry, 34 Ill. 520; Cooley, Const. Lim. § 625; People v. Livingston, 79 N. Y. 290; Newton v. Newell, 26 Minn. 529.

Messrs. D. W. Bailey and Ramsey & Wager, for respondent:

The fact that ballots were in the custody of the contestant as legal custodian does not affect their admissibility as evidence.

Coglan v. Beard, 67 Cal. 303.

In a case of contest the ballots are the primary and best evidence of the number of votes

tion of the court, and that affirmatively on part of the contestant, George A. Hartman, that the said ballots of South Pendleton precinct for Umatilla County have been kept safely by himself, the custodian of the same as by law provided; that said ballots have not been exposed to the public, or handled by unauthorized persons, and have been identified as the ballots cast by the voters of said South Pendleton precinct on June 5, 1888; and have been preserved intact; that they are genuine, and have not been tampered with; that they have been kept in the vault of the clerk's office of said county and State, locked in the ballot box of said precinct, since their delivery into the custody of said Hartman, county clerk of said county and State, on June 5, 1888, continuously, until the canvass of the votes on June 12, 1888, when said box was removed into the clerk's office of said county, and for the purpose of finding the poll book of said precinct, and then and there unlocked in the presence of the board of canvassers, and the ballots therein, tied together in one package, as such said package were lifted up and out of said box by said Hartman, and by him at once returned into said box, and the said box was relocked in the presence of said board, and upon the conclusion of said canvass the said box and ballots so locked therein were returned to the said vault by said Hartman, where it and said ballots have remained continuously since said date until removed therefrom on the trial of this action on July 16, 1888." And as a conclusion from such facts finds "that as such ballots of said precinct they are entitled to be admitted as the best evidence, and recounted," etc.

From this statement it becomes apparent why counsel for defendant is anxious to reach the evidence by his exception, and have the court pass on its admissibility as a matter of law; or, failing in that, that the court shall regard and treat the proceeding under the statute to contest the election in the nature of a suit in equity, so that the court may examine the evidence and try the case de novo. Upon this last proposition it is sufficient to say that the proceeding under the statute is to be tried as an action at law without the intervention of a jury; and it may be said that in all cases where the object of the action is to determine the right to an elective office, whether under the statute or by an action in the nature of quo warranto, the ballots actually cast by the voters are the original evidence of the result of the election.

The remaining question suggested is that the ballot box and its contents were not admissible in evidence, for the reason that they have not been properly kept, or so kept as to preclude opportunity for tampering with the ballots. The contention is that the facts in evidence so impeach and discredit the genuineness of the ballots admitted by the court, and recounted, as to destroy their character as the best evidence, and therefore it was inadmissible to recount them, because the official count as declared, under the circumstances, was the better evidence, and should control in determining the result.

It is admitted that, in determining a contested election, the evidence of the ballots actually cast will control that furnished by the official canvass, provided the ballots have been duly preserved, and protected from the reach of any unauthorized intermeddling or tampering. But it is insisted, unless it is made to affirmatively appear that the ballots have been so carefully kept and protected as to place their identity beyond all reasonable doubt, they ought not to be allowed to overturn the official count; hence, it is earnestly urged that where the evidence in the record discloses that the ballots have not been kept and protected with that vigilant care which the law contemplates, or where they have been so exposed as to afford such opportunity for handling or tampering with them as to cast suspicion on their purity, they lose their character as the best evidence, and are not to be relied on in determining the result of an election, and therefore ought not to be admitted to overturn the official count.

At the outset it may be said that the official return or canvass, when duly certified, is prima facie evidence that the result is as declared. As against ballots not properly kept, and the identity of which is not shown, such official canvass, although secondary, is the better evidence. But the official canvass, unless made so by statute, is never conclusive. As a quasi record it is entitled to the presumption of regularity and prima facie evidence of the integrity of the result of the election as declared. But as between ballots shown or admitted to be the identical ballots cast by the voters and such official count, the ballots are the best evidence. "It is a primary rule of elections that the ballots constitute the best—the primary—evidence of the intention and choice of the voters." Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan. 177; Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 423; McCrary, Elections, 291, 439; Cooley, Const. Lim. 625.

When, therefore, it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that it has before it the identical ballots cast by the voters, as between the ballots themselves and canvass of ballots by the election officers, the ballots are controlling. To show that they are the genuine ballots cast by the voters, any evidence tending to show that they have been so kept and protected from tampering as to place their identity beyond reasonable doubt is admissible.

The burden rests on the plaintiff. He must establish to the satisfaction of the court or jury, as the case may be, that the ballots are the genuine ballots cast at the election; otherwise, they will receive no credence. When the ballot box and the ballots therein of South Pendleton precinct were produced and offered in evidence, if it was shown that they had been properly kept and protected, as the law required, they were the best evidence. On the other hand, if it was shown that they had not been kept or protected with that zealous care which the statute contemplates, or so as to preclude opportunity for intermeddling with them, they are the weakest and most unreliable evidence. But this only goes to the credibility of such evidence, and not to its competency. Evidence may be extremely weak, and, in fact, as against other evidence, entitled to no credit, yet that does not affect its admissibility. The weight to be given to the evidence, and its admissibility, are diverse matters.

In People v. Livingston, 79 N. Y. 288, Church Ch. J., said: "Although it must be conceded that the security of the boxes was not made so perfect as to preclude the possibility—and even some probability—that access might have been had to them for improper purposes, yet I do not think the judge would have been justified in deciding as a matter of law that they had not been preserved inviolate, and withdrawing the question from the jury." And again: "The statute requires the ballot boxes to be preserved undisturbed and inviolate, and it is incumbent on the party offering the evidence to show that they had been so kept, not beyond a mere possibility of interference, but that they were intact to the satisfaction of the jury. The burden was on the relator to satisfy the jury that the boxes had remained inviolate. The returns are the primary evidence of the result of an election. They are made immediately upon canvassing the votes, and the votes are canvassed at the close of the polls in public, and presumably in the presence of the friends of both parties . . . After the election it is known just how many votes are required to change the result. The ballots themselves cannot be identified; they have no earmarks. Everything depends upon keeping the ballot boxes secure, and the difficulty of doing this for several months in the face of temptation and opportunity, requires that the utmost scrutiny and care should be observed in receiving the evidence, etc. Every consideration of public policy, as well as the ordinary rules of evidence, require that the party offering this evidence should establish the fact that the ballots are genuine. It is not sufficient that a mere probability of security is proved, but the fact must be shown with a reasonable degree of certainty. If the boxes have been rigorously preserved, the ballots are the best and highest evidence, but if not, they are not only the weakest, but most dangerous, evidence. The jury might not be satisfied with the proof of identity, and yet be unable to find from the evidence that actual tampering or fraud had been committed."

In the same case in 18 Hun, 62, the court says: "If the ballots voted at any election are produced on the trial of a cause like this, they are the very best evidence of the result of the election. Of course the jury must be satisfied of their inviolate preservation; otherwise, they will receive no credence, but that does not affect their competency."

Judge Cooley says: "If, however, the ballots have not been kept as required by law, and surrounded by such securities as the law has prescribed with a view to their safe preservation as the best evidence of the election, it would seem that they should not be received in evidence at all; or, if received, that it should be left to the jury to determine upon all the circumstances whether they constitute more reliable evidence than the inspector's certificate, which is usually prepared at the close of the election, and upon an actual count of the ballots as then made by the officers whose duty it is to do so. Cooley, Const. Lim. 625. People v. Sackett, 14 Mich. 320; People v. Scott, 16 Mich. 288.

According to the decisions it is manifest that in a proceeding of this nature the ballots are 2 L. R. A.

receivable in evidence for the purpose of controverting the official count and ascertaining the actual result from the vote cast, and that it is for the jury or trial court, as the case may be, to determine, from all the facts and circumstances going to show that the ballots have been preserved inviolate, whether they are more reliable than the official count. Of course the jury must be instructed, or the court guided by the principle of law that, unless it is proved that the ballots are genuine—the identical ballots cast—they should be rejected, and not allowed to overturn the result as declared by the official count.

As a consequence, the ballots and the proof of their identity was competent evidence, and, if competent, it was admissible. The credibility and weight to be attached to evidence is usually for the jury, or the trial court, when it is exercising the jury function; and if it is satisfied from the evidence produced that the ballots have been preserved intact and inviolate, the court, governed by the law which makes them in such case the best evidence, would recount the ballots; otherwise, they would receive no credence, and be rejected in determining the result.

It may be admitted that the question is not free from doubt, and apparently there is some conflict in the practice; yet we have reached the conclusion—not without much hesitation, it is true—that there was such a showing as to the safe keeping of the ballots; that they were competent evidence to go to the trial court to determine as a matter of fact upon all the circumstances whether they had been so kept as to preserve their identity, and to render them more reliable evidence than the official count.

It seems to us, however, the better and more proper way, especially in proceedings to contest an election under the statute, to reach the question sought to have decided, is to inquire whether upon the facts found by the trial court the conclusion to which it has come, viz.: "The ballots are the best evidence, and entitled to be recounted," is such as the law pronounces. To do this the findings should have been fuller, and ought to have included the facts that the ballot box was delivered to its legal custodian, sealed; that the poll book was delivered to him also, and deposited in the vault; that the box was opened for the purpose stated, and relocked, and so returned to the vault; and that his deputy and other persons had access to the vault. Adding these facts to those already found, and which, upon suggestion, the court would have no doubt included in its findings, would there be error in the conclusion already drawn upon the facts as thus presented by the finding?

The assumption on the argument is that the box, when returned to the vault duly relocked, but not resealed, created such an opportunity for tampering as to invite outrage with almost perfect immunity against discovery; that opening the box when the poll book was in the vault was without excuse, and an unlawful act, committed by the contestant, whereby he made for himself and his friends an opportunity to intermeddle with the ballots without detection, which the law had not given to him, but was designed to prevent; and that such a condition of facts as shown by the findings is inconsistent with that safe keeping which the law contemplates as sufficient to identify the ballots and authorize them to be recounted.

Counsel says: "When he broke the bond of secrecy which the law had placed around that ballot box, why did he not then and there, in the presence of other members of the board, re-seal it, and in such a way as that its purity could not be questioned?" The trouble with this argument is that it is based on the supposition that the law directs and requires the ballot box to be sealed, when it only requires the ballots to be enveloped and sealed and deposited with the clerk.

It may be admitted that it was the duty of the plaintiff as its legal custodian to safely keep and preserve the box and its contents; and that any act, whether done by himself or others, which disturbed or violated the safeguard which the law had thrown about it, ought at least to find its justification in the particular circumstances which rendered such act necessary, and be supplemented by the doing of such things as to place it in statu quo, or find its equivalent in the sense of the law for that purpose. But sealing the box is but one of the safeguards which law has thrown about the ballot, besides the cases shown, when by acts of omission or commission, through inadvertence or mistake, it sometimes happens that the poll book is deposited in the ballot box, or the returns inclosed in the envelope among the ballots, and it becomes necessary to procure them to make the canvass of votes, and the box is opened, or the envelope, as the case may be, such acts or omissions are treated as irregularities; and the provisions of the law in respect thereto are directory only, and will not defeat the ballots as original evidence, provided they are properly accredited, and have been safely kept, and preserved inviolate.

In Hudson v. Solomon, 19 Kan. 180, the ballot box was unlocked for the purpose of taking out the poll book, and under the facts the court regarded the opportunity for tampering with the ballots, and discrediting them as too slight for serious consideration.

In O'Gorman v. Richter, 31 Minn. 29, 16 N. W. Rep. 416, the ballots were not enveloped and sealed, as required by section 88, and for this reason it was claimed that they were inadmissible. But the court says "that the provisions of this section are merely directory; and that where it is clearly and satisfactorily proved that the ballots have been kept intact and inviolate, in the same condition as when counted by the judges of election, they are admissible in evidence, although not sealed up in envelopes, as required by statute." And further, that the trial court, "being satisfied of the genuineness of these ballots beyond a reasonable doubt, have admitted them," and that "certainly we, acting as an appellate court, cannot say they erred."

In Dorey v. Lynn, 31 Kan. 760, 8 Pac. Rep. 557, the ballots were wrongfully opened and counted by the city council as a canvassing board, and they remained with the city clerk when they should have been placed in the custody of the county clerk; and yet, as "The evidence and findings of the court below show that the ballots in this case were never tampered with in any manner except as already stated," the court says "The ballots were identified beyond all reasonable doubt," and as a consequence entitled to be recounted as the best evidence.

In Patten v. Florence, 38 Kan. 501, 17 Pac. Rep. 177, the poll book was placed under cover, and sealed, except that it was inclosed in an envelope or package with the ballots, etc., and the court treated the matter under the facts as an irregularity, and not fatal to the proceeding.

The object of all such provisions is to secure the safe keeping of the ballots, so that they may be easily identified in case they need to be resorted to in some judicial inquiry; and if they have been safely kept, and protected from any tampering, the chief object of the law is subserved, although omissions or irregularities may have occurred, such as we have adverted to. The ballots are the best evidence of the will and choice of the voters; and if it is shown, or the facts find, that they have been securely kept, and preserved inviolate, they are entitled to be recounted, that the will of the electors may be carried into effect, and allowed to prevail.

Nor is there anything in Kingery v. Berry, relied upon by counsel, inconsistent therewith. The court says: "The ballots may have been tampered with. There is not full proof that they were not. There was a motive for such tampering, at least upon the part of the appellee, if not others engaged with him. The wrong doer should not be allowed to profit by his violation of the sanctity of the ballot box. He might do so were these ballots to be received as the identical ones cast by the voters." 94 Ill. 520. But it is to be noted in this case that "The court was not sure that it had before it the identical ballots which were deposited by the voters," and hence applied the rule which the law declares in such case—where, by intermeddling, suspicion is brought on their purity, they are not to be regarded as the best evidence, and entitled to be recounted as against the official canvass.

In Powell v. Holman (Ark.) 6 S. W. Rep. 508, the court found that after the vote had been canvassed and abstracted by the clerk as required by law, the ballots were placed for about one week in the library room adjoining the clerk's office, and that this was an unsafe and exposed place, which afforded opportunity for them to be tampered with, and as a conclusion from these facts finds the ballots are unworthy of credit as evidence. In commenting upon this conclusion being such as the law pronounces upon the facts found, the court says: "The authorities are abundant that where ballots have been so exposed as to have afforded opportunity to be tampered with, and have not been guarded with that zealous care which will contravene all suspicion of substitution or change, they lose their presumptive purity, and are no longer to be relied on as evidence in a contest of judicial inquiry as to the result of an election." McCrory, Elections, 293; Cooley, Const. Lim. 625. Hence the court says, with reference to the ballots, upon the facts found, that the trial court pronounced the judgment of the law when it declared such ballots as unworthy of credit as evidence, and refused to recount them. But there are no facts found in that case, as here, in respect to the safe keeping of the ballots; they were not zealously cared for, but were so exposed as to afford opportunity for parties or their friends to tamper with the ballots, or add to or take from their number; and as a result suspicion was brought on their purity and integrity, and the court rejected them as unworthy of credit.

Here the court finds that the box and its contents were securely and safely kept and preserved; that no one had tampered with them; and that, notwithstanding the box had been opened in the manner and for the purpose stated, the ballots therein were the genuine and identical ballots cast by the voters of South Pendleton precinct; and necessarily the conclusion which the trial court reaches and finds upon this state of facts, viz.: that such ballots "are the best evidence, and entitled to be recounted," is in conformity with such as the law declares. In view of the fact that the contestant is the legal custodian of the box and its contents, it no doubt would have been better and more circumspect, after the box was opened, to reseal it in the same presence, although there is no such requirement in the statute, and the failure to do so violated no law.

Upon the finding as to the safe preservation of the ballots we are bound to assume there was satisfactory evidence to support it; or, if we looked at the evidence in the record to ascertain whether there was any evidence tending to support such finding, we are confronted with the direct and positive, uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony of all the sworn officers who have exercised any control over the box and its ballots that it had been safely kept relocked, as the law required, and that its contents had not been handled or disturbed.

So that, in whatever way the objection raised may be regarded, we discover no error, and must affirm the judgment.

v.

Mary E. MUNFORD, Executrix, etc.

(....Lea ....)

1. A telegraph company which has, by mistake, changed the first name of the person to whom the message is sent from "Sam." to "Wm." is not liable for damages consequent on the failure of a connecting line to deliver the message promptly when, by the exercise of due diligence on the part of the latter company's agents it would have been delivered to the proper person, who would have known that it was intended for him, and thus prevented all damages.

2. A printed condition on a telegraph blank, "This company is hereby made the agent of the sender, without liability to forward any message over the lines of any other company when necessary to reach its destination", is reasonable.

ERROR to the Warren County Circuit Court (Smallman, J.), to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages alleged to have resulted from delay in the delivery of a telegraph message. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Bonner for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Frank Spurlock for defendant in error.

Lurton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by E. W. Munford, the testator of defendant in error, in his life time, to recover damages alleged to have been message directed to a place upon the route of a connecting company, contracts to obtain that transmission, the telegraph company must contract as the agent of the connecting company with the employer, or as the agent of the employer with the connecting company. Squire v. Western U. Tele. Co., 68 Mass. 232; Stevenson v. Montreal Tele. Co., 18 U. C. Q. B. 520; Baldwin v. U. S. Tele. Co., 54 Barb. 505; Lana, 125 Gray, Tele. Co., 107. In simply accepting a message directed to a place upon the route of another company, it contracts merely to deliver the message to a connecting company for transmission to or toward that place and to assume liability only for a loss occurring on its own lines. Stevenson v. Montreal Tele. Co., 18 U. C. Q. B. 520; Leonard v. N. Y. A. & B. Electro-Magnetic Tele. Co., 41 N. Y. 544; Squire v. W. U. Tele. Co., 68 Mass. 232; Baldwin v. U. S. Tele. Co., 45 N. of the message, or to receive and account for the payment for such transmission. This provision in the regulation is unquestionably reasonable, and, with the assent of the employer of the company, constitutes a valid and mutually beneficial contract. *Western U. Tele. Co. v. sustained by the delay in the transmission of a telegram.

E. W. Munford, on the 11th of April, 1887, delivered to the agent of the plaintiff in error, at its office in McMinnville, Tenn., a telegram for transmission to Tampa, Florida, of which the following is a copy:

McMinnville, Tenn., Apl. 11, 1887.

Col. Sam Tate, Tampa, Florida: Proposition accepted. Your draft for one thousand will be honored.

[Signed]

E. W. Munford.

The lines owned and operated by the Western Union Telegraph Company did not extend to Tampa, Fla., but terminated at Jacksonville, in that State. From Jacksonville to Tampa there was a telegraph line, owned and operated by the South Florida Telegraph Company, and the message in question could only be transmitted to its destination by being sent over the line of the Western Union Telegraph Company to Jacksonville, and then transferred to the South Florida Company, by whom it would be sent to Tampa. Of this fact Mr. Munford was advised by the agent, who received his message for transmission.

The telegram was promptly forwarded, reaching Tampa early in the afternoon of the same day. In transmission the address of the message was changed from "Col. Sam Tate" to "Col. Wm. Tate." This, it is agreed, occurred on the line of the plaintiff in error before it was transferred to the connecting company. The message was not delivered by the South Florida Company to Col. Tate until the 18th, it having been received at Tampa on the 11th. Plaintiff below alleged that by this delay he sustained damage amounting to $500.

In the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider one of the defenses presented by the pleas of the plaintiff in error; and that, in substance, is that the delay in the delivery of the message was not occasioned by the error in transmitting the address, but resulted alone from the negligence of the agent of the South Florida Company. The facts concerning this delay, as we find them to be from the transcript, are these: the agent of the South Florida Company at Tampa personally knew Col. Sam Tate. He states that he knew of no such person as Col. Wm. Tate, and that when he received this message he believed it to be intended for Col. Sam Tate; that he instructed the messenger, whose duty it was to make personal delivery of messages, to inquire and learn if there was a Col. Wm. Tate in Tampa, and, if he could hear of no such person, to take the message to Col. Sam Tate.

The messenger thus instructed says he made inquiry, and, hearing of no Wm. Tate, undertook to deliver the message to Col. Sam Tate; that he took it to the office of S. A. Jones, where both he and the agent say they had been requested by Mr. Jones to leave messages for Col. Tate. The messenger states, upon inquiry for Col. Tate, a clerk in the office informed him that Col. Tate was then at Clear Water Harbor. This information being communicated to the agent of the telegraph company, he on the same day, instead of making further inquiry for Col. Tate, mailed the message addressed to Col. Sam Tate at Clear Water Harbor, Florida.

The fact, as shown by the proof, is that Col. Tate was in Tampa on the 11th, and had been there for some days, and that he had never authorized delivery of messages for him at the office of Mr. Jones, but that, on the contrary, he was accustomed to receive his messages at his usual boarding place, which was known at least to some of the telegraph company's messengers.

Two days thereafter Col. Tate called at the telegraph company's office to inquire about another message, when he was handed a copy of the telegram which had been mailed to him at Clear Water Harbor. If the message had been delivered to him on the day it was received and mailed to Clear Water Harbor, it is conceded that the damage alleged to have been sustained would not have occurred. The facts, as above recited, are not disputed, and establish beyond controversy that the delay in the delivery of the message was not in consequence of the error in transmission of the address, but was the result of the subsequent and independent negligence of the South Florida Telegraph Company.

The damage alleged to have been sustained was the direct consequence of delay in delivery; for Col. Tate says that he should have had no doubt, upon seeing the message, that it was for him alone, and that he should have acted upon it. The damages to be recovered, whether the gravamen of the action be regarded as breach of contract or a technical tort, must be limited to such as are the natural and proximate result of the injury or wrong done.

This brings us to the consideration of the question as to whether the plaintiff in error is responsible for damages which resulted alone from the negligent delay in the delivery of the message by the agents of the South Florida Telegraph Company. The message was written upon one of the usual blanks furnished by the Western Union Company. One of the printed conditions contained in this blank reads as follows: "This company is hereby made the agent of the sender, without liability to forward any message over the lines of any other company, when necessary to reach its destination." Is this a valid limitation upon the liability of the company? Telegraph companies are not common carriers, nor are they insurers, either of the accurate transmission, or the sure and prompt delivery, of messages. They are liable, however, for losses consequent upon their negligence. Marr v. Western U. Tel. Co. 55 Tenn. 586.

Even common carriers are not responsible for losses occurring upon a connecting line, unless there was a contract upon their part to be so responsible. That they may by contract limit their liability to defaults occurring upon their own lines is well settled. So the fact that two lines are connected, and for their mutual convenience collect freight for each other upon goods delivered for transmission over both lines, will not make the one responsible for losses occurring beyond its own line, unless it has contracted so to be. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Brumley, 5 Lea, 401.

These principles applicable to common carriers seem to us to be alike applicable to telegraph companies. Mr. Gray, in his very valuable monograph upon Communication by Telegraph, in discussing the limitations found in the contract of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and quoted above, says: "Two entirely distinct provisions are embodied in this regulation. One provision is that the telegraph company, in consideration of receiving full prepayment for the delivery of a message at a place upon the line of another company, agrees to deliver the message to a connecting company, and, as the agent of the sender, to contract with that company for the further transmission of the message. This is an offer of special terms of contract. A telegraph company is, it seems, under an obligation, by its ordinary contract, only upon receipt of its own charges, to deliver the message to a connecting company. It is under no obligation by that contract to contract, as the agent of its employer, with the connecting company for the further transmission of the message or to receive and account for the payment for such transmission. This provision in the regulation is unquestionably reasonable, and, with the assent of the employer of the company, constitutes a valid and mutually beneficial contract. * * * The other provision embodied in this regulation is that the telegraph company limits its liability to losses occurring on its own lines. This has usually been treated as an offer of special terms.

As such, it constitutes, with the assent of the employer of the company, a valid contract. This provision is clearly just and reasonable. In the absence of partnership relation between them, one telegraph company has no more authority over another company than an individual has. A telegraph company should be entitled, therefore, to contract specially, with one who wishes to employ it, that it shall not be liable for loss occasioned by the act of a connecting company; that that person shall seek relief, in case of a loss, directly of the company which causes, and is, under any circumstances, finally liable for the loss." Gray, Tel. § 83.

That the Western Union and South Florida Telegraph Companies were entirely distinct and independent corporations, and that no partnership relation existed between them, are admitted in the agreed statement of facts contained in the record.

The case was tried by the circuit judge without the intervention of a jury, who, being of opinion that the error in transmission of address was the proximate cause of the damage sustained, gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff below.

This judgment is not supported by any material facts, and must be reversed, and judgment rendered here in favor of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Arthur K. O'HARA, Resp't.

v.

STATE OF NEW YORK, App't.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. An Act authorizing the board of claims to rehear, audit and determine and allow reasonable compensation for meritorious services, etc., rendered to the State on a claim which had been previously rejected by the board of audit because of the lack of legal authority for employing such services, does not violate New York Constitution, art. 2, § 19, which declares that "The Legislature shall neither audit nor allow any private claim or account against the State, etc."
  2. The Legislature can ratify and approve, by subsequent legislation, any act performed for the benefit of the State which it had original authority to legislate and provide for.
  3. When individuals voluntarily furnish property or render valuable services to the State at the request of state officers, with the expectation of payment, the Legislature may ratify the acts of such officers although previously unauthorized, and create a legal liability on the part of the State to make payment therefor.
  4. The proviso exempting existing claims from the prohibition against allowing claims after they are barred, in the amendment to the New York Constitution, art. 7, § 14, cannot apply to any claim accruing after the adoption of that amendment.
  5. Legislative ratification of an unauthorized contract by officers on the part of the State, gives a claim therefor a legal existence for the first time, and the fact that a claim against the

State on the imperfect obligation previously existing would have been barred by lapse of time, does not make such legislative ratification and authority to allow such claim invalid, under the New York Constitution, art. 7, § 14, providing that no claim shall be audited or allowed or paid which, as between citizens of the State, would be barred by lapse of time.

6. The fact that the Statute of Limitations has run against an imperfect obligation which is unenforceable by reason of some vice or defect therein, which may be cured or waived by the debtor, does not bar a cause of action on a new obligation growing out of the old one, when the vice or defect is waived.
7. The value of the materials furnished by the claimant in the performance of the services referred to in the New York Act of 1886, authorizing the board of claims to rehear and audit the claims of O'Hara & Co. for work and services performed by them for the State under the directions of the quarantine officials, constitutes a part of the claim.

(January 15, 1895.)

A PPEAL by the State, from an award of the Board of Claims, made in favor of plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Tabor, Atty-Gen., for appellant.

Mr. William B. Ruggles for respondent.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the State from an award made by the board of claims for services rendered and materials furnished at the request of the quarantine officials, by the claimant in the years 1875 and 1876, in repairing and fitting up vessels and property used in quarantine affairs in the Harbor of New York.

There can be no question but that the maintenance of the quarantine station in that harbor is of great public benefit and importance; nor but that the legitimate expenditures therefor are a public necessity justifying their incurrence and payment by the State. The organization of the quarantine system was created by the State for the benefit of the people: is under its control; its officers are appointed by it, and it has uniformly provided, in some form or another, for their compensation and for the procurement of the supplies necessary to its efficient operation, and it was the moral duty of the State to see that their agents properly discharged their obligations to the persons employed by them in the service of the State.

The services and materials in question were rendered and furnished at the request of the state officials, and compensation therefor was honestly earned by the claimant a long time since; and it is a reproach to the State that satisfaction of them should have been postponed so long by controversies among the state officials as to the department responsible for their payment.

The board of claims have found that in the years mentioned the claimant performed services and furnished materials in the repair of the quarantine steamers and other property of the State, under the direction of the quarantine official, of the value and for the amount named by them in the award appealed from. The undisputed evidence showed that the claimant, originally supposing the health officer to be liable for his claim, sued him in a state court and was defeated, upon the ground that that officer had incurred no personal liability by reason of the rendition of such services, and that the claim therefor was against the State.

Thereupon, in 1878, he filed his claim against the State before the board of audit, and after a hearing thereof before such board, it rendered a decision holding that the State was not liable therefor, but that the health officer was, and, therefore, refused to make an award in his favor, and dismissed the claim. Applications were thereafter made, on behalf of the claimant, to each successive Legislature for relief in every year, including that of 1885, and excepting that of 1880, with unavailing effect. In 1886, however, an Act was passed, being the law under which the board of claims based its authority to make the award in question, which is as follows:

"The board of claims is hereby authorized to rehear, audit and determine the claims of A. K. O'Hara & Co., for work and services done and performed by them for the State under the directions of the quarantine officials, and to award to them such sums as upon due proof before said board, shall be a reasonable compensation therefor."

It is now claimed by the Attorney-General for the State that this Act violates section 19, article 3, and section 14, article 7, of the Constitution, and is therefore unconstitutional and void.

3 L. R. A.

The provisions of the Constitution are as follows:

Article 3, § 19: "The Legislature shall neither audit nor allow any private claim or account against the State, but may appropriate money to pay such claims as shall have been audited and allowed according to law."

Article 7, § 14: "Neither the Legislature, canal board, canal appraisers, nor any person or persons, acting in behalf of the State, shall audit, allow or pay any claim which, as between citizens of the State, would be barred by lapse of time. The limitation of existing claims shall begin to run from the adoption of this section; but this provision shall not be construed to revive claims already barred by existing statutes, nor to repeal any statute fixing the time within which claims shall be presented or allowed, nor shall it extend to any claims duly presented within the time allowed by law and prosecuted with due diligence from the time of such presentment. But if the claimant shall be under legal disability, the claim may be presented, within two years after such disability is removed."

It was held by us in Cole v. State, 2 Cent. Rep. 884, 103 N. Y. 54, 1 N. Y. S. R. 354, that an Act of the Legislature recognizing meritorious services, rendered to the State without previous authority of law, and authorizing the board of claims to hear claims for compensation therefor and award such sum as they might think proper and just, was neither an audit nor allowance of a claim against the State within the meaning of section 19, article 3, of the Constitution. We think our decision in that case disposes of the objection to the Act under consideration. A brief reference to the history of this claim seems to show that it comes within the principle laid down in that case.

Under Laws 1876, chap. 444, the board of audit was organized and was authorized to hear all private claims and accounts against the State (except such as are now heard by the canal appraisers), and to determine the justice and amount thereof, and to allow such sums as it shall consider should equitably be paid by the State.

The hearing of the claim in question by that board in 1878 was had under this law, and no other tribunal then existed or was thereafter created by the State competent to hear and determine such a claim until 1883, more than six years after the service had been rendered, and that tribunal was authorized to hear only such claims as should arise within two years previous to the time of filing the claim before it.

The board of audit had no power to reopen and rehear claims once determined by it, and no appeal lay from its decisions except those provided by chapter 211, Laws of 1881, which were confined to awards made subsequent to January 1, 1879, and did not reach the award made upon the claim of the respondents. Their decision upon the claim, therefore, was final and conclusive between the parties, and determined the fact that for the services in question no legal claim then existed against the State on behalf of the claimants. That determination necessarily proceeded upon the ground that the persons upon whose request the services were rendered, had no authority to bind the State and, therefore, that no legal cause of action existed against it. It was undoubtedly within the province of the Legislature originally to have provided for the rendition of these services and the purchase of materials for the use and benefit of the quarantine station, and it is equally clear that it could, by subsequent legislation, ratify and approve any act performed for the benefit of the State, for which it had original authority to legislate and provide. Brown v. New York, 68 N. Y. 240; People v. Denison, 80 N. Y. 656; People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 529.

It cannot be questioned, we think, but that when individuals voluntarily furnish property or render valuable services to the State at the request of state officers for state purposes, but with the expectation of payment for the same, the Legislature may ratify the acts of such officers, although previously unauthorized, and create a legal liability on the part of the State to pay for such property and services enforceable in its tribunals. The Act of the Legislature in supplying defects or omissions in pre-existing legislation wherever a liability may be predicated against the State, is clearly not the audit of a claim, neither is it an allowance thereof. The power of auditing and allowing is expressly referred to the tribunal authorized to hear and determine such claims, and they may allow or reject them as in their judgment and discretion seems just.

This, we understand, to be the decision in the Cole Case, and we think it is founded on correct principles. As was there said, the exercise of such a power by the Legislature does not, in any just or reasonable sense, conflict with the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting it from auditing or allowing private claims or accounts against the State. It has undoubted power to authorize state officers and agents to contract debts, under certain circumstances against the State, and, as we have before said, it can legalize such as have been theretofore illegally contracted, by a subsequent exercise of its legitimate legislative power. It may create tribunals to hear and determine cases between the State and individuals, and it may by law enlarge the authority of existing tribunals to hear the same. In all this it neither audits nor allows claims, nor authorizes their payment. It simply provides a tribunal before which the State may be prosecuted, and enacts that a limitation upon the authority of the tribunal shall not apply to certain obligations. Such a limitation is created by and may therefore be removed by legislative authority.

It would certainly be very strange and would subject the State to great loss and damage, if, in cases of emergency, and when legislative authority could not be previously obtained to authorize the same, its servants should be powerless to obtain labor and materials necessary to save it from the destruction of its property and be compelled to lose advances made in reliance upon the justice and honor of the State, and believing that they would be subsequently reimbursed for expenditures made for its benefit.

It cannot, we think, be said that the section in question was intended to disable the State from paying for property or valuable services received by it from individuals, because they were furnished under the stress of an imminent necessity without previous authority of law. Although such acts constituted no legal claim against the State, and could not be enforced in an action at law, they formed in justice and right irresistible claims upon the honor of the State and are, we think, within the power of the Legislature to legalize, and, when authorized and approved by legal tribunals, within its power to provide for and pay. We conclude, therefore, that no constitutional objection to the act in question exists against it as a legitimate exercise of the power of the Legislature.

A more serious question arises over the prohibition imposed upon the board of claims against auditing or allowing claims which, as between individuals, would be barred by lapse of time. Would this claim have been so barred as between citizens of the State at the time this statute was passed? If it would, then it must come within the prohibition of the constitutional provision.

We are of the opinion that it is not saved therefrom by the proviso in the Constitution exempting existing claims which have been duly presented within the time allowed by law and prosecuted diligently thereafter. We think that proviso, by its express terms, applied only to claims existing at the time of the adoption of the Amendment, in 1874, and did not embrace future cases which were clearly covered by the first paragraph of the section. That paragraph stands alone and states the rule to be applied to all claims subsequently arising. The claim in question, having accrued after the adoption of the Amendment, must be determined by the rule of limitation which obtains "between citizens," as specified in the first paragraph.

It is not clear, precisely what the framers of the Amendment intended by this phrase; because there is but little analogy between the position of the State in reference to the prosecution of claims against it, and the condition of a citizen, subject at all times and in numerous tribunals, to be brought into court and prosecuted for his liabilities. The State can be prosecuted, in a legal sense, only by its own consent, and after it has created a tribunal to hear and decide claims against it.

It would be manifestly unjust to allow an honest claim against the State, to be defeated on account of its omission to provide a tribunal where it might be prosecuted. Hanger v. Abbott, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 532 [18 L. ed. 939].

In view of this condition, it was held by this court in Corkings v. State, 1 Cent. Rep. 77, 99 N. Y. 491, that presentation to and prosecution of claims before the Legislature, in the absence of other tribunals competent to hear them, would be sufficient to save them from the bar presented by the constitutional amendment against existing claims.

We are therefore compelled to consider the naked question whether, as between individuals, this claim would have been barred by the lapse of time, according to the general law of the State, when the statute was passed. In the consideration of that question, it must be taken as an established fact in the case, that prior to the passage of chapter 472, Laws of 1886, no legal claims, enforceable in any court, existed against the State for the demand in question. That question was adjudicated in 1878, by the board of audit, in favor of the State.

By the legislation of 1886 the authority of the quarantine officials, to contract for the services and materials in question on the part of the State, was adopted and approved by the Legislature, and the claim for compensation therefor then had for the first time a legal existence against the State. When, then, did a cause of action arise therefor in favor of the claimant against the State? Obviously not until the legislative recognition. The language of the Act of 1886 by clear implication recognizes the authority of the quarantine officials to contract for the services and materials in question, and acknowledges the liability of the State therefor, and the claim in question then had its origin.

It is conceded by the appellant that the award of the board of audit was not such an adjudication as would bar the claim presented to the board of claims; and it would seem to follow therefrom, that in the opinion of the appellant, the statute would not commence to run against the latter claim until its legislative recognition.

It is undoubtedly true that the Statutes of Limitation are equally effectual in ordinary cases against equitable and invalid claims as well as valid and legal ones; but we think in the case of an imperfect claim or obligation which is unenforceable by reason of some vice or defect therein which may be cured or waived by the debtor, that a right of action thereon arises at the time the claim becomes purged of the vice by the action of the debtor and not before. The Statute of Limitations commences to run only after a cause of action has accrued; and it does not follow that, because the statute has run against an imperfect obligation, the debtor may not create a new obligation although founded on one which has outlawed.

In the case of an individual contracting with pretended agent, who sues the supposed principal for an alleged breach of contract and has been defeated upon the ground of want of authority in the agent to make the contract, such an adjudication would not defeat an action brought upon the same contract legalized by a subsequent ratification, even though the liability upon the original contract had in the mean while become outlawed. The imperfect obligation imposed by the original contract would have been perfected by the ratification and the cause of action, although supported by the moral consideration afforded by the contract, would have been legally completed and made enforceable by the ratification alone.

Suppose the quarantine officials had purchased lands on the Harbor of New York for quarantine purposes without authority, and the State had afterwards refused to pay for them, but, after the statute had run against such claim, should by legislative action authorize and direct such officials to take possession of such lands and appropriate them to the use of the State, can anyone doubt that a cause of action would then arise against the State for the value of such lands? We think not.

It was said by Rapallo, J., in the Cole Case: "As a general rule money expended or services rendered by one individual for the benefit of another do not create a legal liability on the part of the person benefited to make compensation. But a law which should provide that in every such case if the party benefited ratifies the acts of the other and accepts the benefits, he should be liable, would be free from objection, so far at all events as it should apply to future transactions. When the Legislature is dealing with the imperfect obligation arising from such a state of facts, it seems to us it does not transcend its powers by passing a law affording a remedy even in respect to past transactions, where the State adopts the act and is the party to make the compensation."

The case of McDougall v. State, 11 Cent. Rep. 917, 109 N. Y. 80, 14 N. Y. S. R. 791, is not in conflict with any views herein presented. That claim arose upon a cause of action for damages in tort accruing in 1869. Liability for claims of this character was assumed by the State by chapter 821 of the Laws of 1870, and authority given to the canal appraisers to hear and determine them. It was saved as an existing claim from the operation of the Amendment to the Constitution in 1874 by the provision exempting claims duly presented and diligently prosecuted. It was held, although it had been duly presented, it had not been diligently prosecuted thereafter and was therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations.

We think the value of the materials furnished by the claimant in the performance of the services referred to in the Act constituted a part of the claim and was fairly within the spirit of the provision authorizing the hearing by the board of claims.

We are therefore of the opinion that the award appealed from should be affirmed.

All concur except Danforth, J., dissenting.

The principle that corporate acts outside of the powers of a corporation or of the officers appointed

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sheean & McCarn for appellants.
Mr. Ezra Keeler for appellee.

Beck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The part of the petition assailed by demurrer is in the following language:

"First count. Now comes the above-named plaintiff, and for its amended petition, in said case says that prior to the 5th day of February, 1877, it was, and has since continued to be, and now is, a corporation, duly organized under the Laws of the State of Iowa. That the above-named defendant, prior to the year 1871, was, and yet is, a municipal corporation, organized and existing under the laws of said State. That said plaintiff since said 5th day of February, 1877, has been, and now is, the absolute owner in fee simple of the following described real estate, situated within the corporate limits of said City of Anamosa, Iowa, to wit: Lot No. 6, in block No. 4, in Shaw's Addition to said city. That said real estate fronts for sixty feet, on the north end thereof, on Pine Street, and on the west side for 110 feet, on Garnaville Street, in said city. That prior to the year 1886 there was erected on said real estate a church edifice, and a costly stone wall along the north front and along a portion of the west side; also sidewalks and other improvements—all of which are yet on said premises. That in 1871 said defendant made a survey of the grades of said streets adjacent to said real estate, where said streets run along the west and north lines of said real estate, and set grade stakes to correspond with said survey, made a plat of said grade as thus surveyed, and kept the same since said time in the office of the city clerk of said city for the guidance of the officers of said city, and owners of abutting lots, in putting down sidewalks, curbing, and crossings along said streets. That prior to the year 1886 said defendant put down stone crossings on said streets in front of, and north and east and west of, said real estate, on the grade thus surveyed and platted in accordance with said grade, and that under the orders and directions of said defendant the owners of said real estate cut down the grade thereof along the whole north front, and along the whole of the west side, so as to correspond with said grade, and put down sidewalks along said whole north front and west side thereof in accordance with said grade, and also erected expensive stone walls along the whole of said north front, and along a portion of said north front, and along a portion of said west side, and made other improvements corresponding with said grades. That during the year 1886 said defendant unlawfully, wrongfully, and in violation of plaintiff's rights, excavated, cut down, and removed the earth from said streets adjacent to said real estate, along the whole north front, to the depth of about five feet below said grade, and along the whole of the west side thereof, to the depth of about six feet below said grade. That said cutting down of grading of said streets was not ordered to be done by the affirmative vote of two thirds of the city council or trustees of said city, as required by law, nor did said defendant, by resolution, ordinance or other legislative proceedings, provide for the grading, nor establish the grades, of said streets, before cutting down or grading the same, as required by law; nor did said defendant before thus changing the physical grade, of said streets, nor at any time, have the damages caused by said change assessed, appraised, or paid as required by law; but, on the contrary, the said defendant proceeded, as aforesaid, unlawfully, wrongfully, and in violation of plaintiff's rights, to cut down, excavate and remove the earth from said streets, to the injury of said real estate, and the damage of said plaintiff in the sum of—," etc.

The defendant demurred to the petition, on the ground that "The facts therein stated do not entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, because it does not appear that any grade was ever established on the streets mentioned, or that plaintiff made any improvements to conform to any established grade on said streets, or that defendant ever caused the grade of said streets to be changed, or that plaintiff has sustained any damage on account of any unlawful act or negligence of said defendant."

The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs standing on their petition, judgment was rendered for defendant.

2. In our opinion, the petition alleges a sufficient cause of action against defendant. The following provisions of the Code are to be considered and applied in the determination of the case: "Sec. 465: They [cities] shall have power to provide for the grading and repairs of any street, avenue, or alley, and the construction of sewers . . . but no street shall be graded, except the same be ordered to be done by the affirmative vote of two thirds of the city council or trustees."

Section 469 provides, that "When any city or town shall have established the grade of any street or alley, and any person shall have built or made any improvements on such street or alley according to the established grade thereof, and such city or town shall alter said established grade in such a manner as to injure or diminish the value of said property, said city or town shall pay to the owner or owners of said property so injured the amount of such damage or injury, which shall be assessed by three persons," etc. Prior to this statute, cities were not liable for injuries resulting from establishing or changing the grade of their streets, if it were prudently done, in the exercise of its authority as prescribed by law. Creal v. Keokuk, 4 G. Greene, 47.

The powers of the city are to be carried into effect and discharged through the provisions of ordinances enacted by the city. Code, § 482.

It cannot be claimed that the city, without to act for it, are void as respects the corporation, and that the corporation is not liable for injuries resulting from such acts, is distinguishable from that announced in the principal case. See 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 707, 768.

For liability of municipal corporations for negligent exercise of its powers, see Chapman v. Rochester, 1 L. R. A. 236, note. For torts of its agents and officers, see Hines v. Charlotte, 1 L. R. A. 844, note.

the enactment of an ordinance prescribing therefor, may establish or change the grade of its streets, or may order or cause the work of grading to be done upon the street, which results in injury to a property owner, and escape liability to him. If the city may establish and change the grades of a street, and direct the work to be done without the required ordinances, and incur no liability therefor, then could it, by dispensing with ordinances, make and change grades without incurring liability to the property owner who is injured thereby, thus defeating the requirements of law.

The city must exercise its power in the manner prescribed by its charter. If authority be conferred upon it to establish grades, and cause streets to be graded by ordinances, these things cannot be done in any other way. The city must pursue the law granting it authority. It cannot do, by the acts of its executive officers, or by simple resolution or direction of a majority vote of its council, that which its charter says shall be done by ordinance adopted by a two thirds vote. Burlington v. Kellar, 18 Iowa, 59; Noyes v. Mason City, 58 Iowa, 418.

Now, whether we regard the act complained of in the petition as the change of grade, or the original establishing of a grade, and the construction of the street in accord therewith, it was not done by an ordinance, resolution or other action of the city had in the manner and upon the vote of the council prescribed by the statute (Code, § 465); and if it be, indeed, a change of grade, the requirements of the Code, § 469, were not observed. In either view, we must regard the act complained of in the petition as not done in compliance with law, and hold that defendant is liable therefor.

In our opinion, the district court should have overruled the demurrer.

Reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Dennis McCARTHY,
v.
BOSTON & LOWELL R. CO.

(.....Mass.....)

In an action of tort brought by a father to recover for the loss of his son's services, the father will not be permitted to testify that in his own mind he did not intend to emancipate the son, if the facts in the case warrant a finding by the jury of an implied emancipation which would cut off the father's right to maintain the action.

(February 23, 1890.)

ON plaintiff's exceptions. Overruled.

This was an action of tort for damages incurred by the loss of the earnings of plaintiff's minor son, in consequence of injuries received by him by reason of the negligence of the defendant in the management of its railroad.

Trial was had in the superior court, before Sherman, J., where the verdict was for the defendant, and plaintiff excepted.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles Cowley for plaintiff.

Messrs. G. F. Richardson and W. H. Coolidge for defendant.

C. Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The facts disclosed in the present case were sufficient, if taken by themselves alone, to warrant the jury in finding an implied emancipation by the plaintiff of his son, which would cut off the father's right to collect and have the son's earnings, or to maintain an action of tort founded on the loss of the son's services. Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 272; Waddell v. Coggeshall, 2 Met. 89; Abbott v. Converse, 4 Allen, 530, 533; Dumain v. Greyana, 10 Allen, 270, 272; The Etna, 1 Ware, 462; Stansbury v. Bertron, 7 Watts & S. 362.

But the plaintiff contends that he did not, in his own mind, intend to emancipate his son, and the only question presented by the bill of exceptions is whether the plaintiff's undisclosed intent was a material element to be considered. If it was material, no doubt the plaintiff might testify to it directly. But we think it was not material.

If a father drives his minor son out of doors, and turns him upon the world to shift for himself, and then sues for his wages, he cannot be heard in court to say that in his own mind he nevertheless retained the intention of claiming them. Emancipation is a practical thing, and may be proved by conduct and acts; and the father's secret intent, contrary to the effect of his acts, could not affect the son's rights. By way of illustration, see West v. Platt, 127 Mass. 337, 372, and cases there cited; Ford v. Ford, 8 New Eng. Rep. 785, 143 Mass. 577, 578; O'Donnell v. Clinton, 5 New Eng. Rep. 433, 145 Mass. 461, 463.

The father's claim to recover damages for a personal injury to the son rests on the same ground as a claim to recover for his wages. He had forfeited his rights by his acts.

Exceptions overruled.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE, as rel. Frank M. HART,

v.

Frank McELROY et al., Appts.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Although the courts of Michigan may take cognizance of legislative journals for the purpose of determining whether constitutional methods have been followed in the passage of a law they cannot act upon anything not found in the journal, or presume that any requirement of the Constitution has not been fulfilled, in determining the validity of a statute.
2. Every intendment is to be made in favor of the constitutionality of a statute.
3. A statute whose object as expressed in the title is to incorporate a city, which is substituted for a statute whose object as expressed in the title is to organize a new township, cannot be considered a new bill, so as to be invalid under Michigan Constitution, art. 4, § 23, because not introduced within the first fifty days of the session, when the lands to be affected in both the bill and the substitute are shown to belong to the same county, and the body of the original bill does not appear in the legislative journals.
4. The legislative practice of reading a bill twice by title and only once at length, having long been maintained in Michigan, must be regarded by the courts as a substantial compliance with Michigan Constitution, art. 4, § 19, which provides that "Every bill and joint resolution shall be read three times in each House before final passage thereof."

Passage of Acts.

The "passage" of an Act, in general, means its completion as a law, by the approval of the Executive, its passage over his veto, or the expiration of the time limited for its return if neither signed nor vetoed. Logan v. State, 8 Helak. 442; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 543.

People v. Rice (Mich.) 7 West. Rep. 642; Atty-Gen. v. Amos, 60 Mich. 372.

The provision of the Constitution as to the three readings is as mandatory as that in respect to the nonintroduction of new bills after the fifty day limit; and noncompliance shown of record renders the law a nullity.

Wall v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 117.

The questions involved are proper to be raised by demurrer. The journals are constitutional records, and the court takes notice of their contents (People v. Rice, supra), and the court also takes cognizance of the boundaries of the municipal subdivisions of the State.

LaGrange v. Chapman, 11 Mich. 500; Wright v. Dunham, 13 Mich. 418.

There was therefore no proof necessary to be offered, none in fact which could be given, the question being one of law solely.

People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 492.

Morse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Prosecuting Attorney for the County of St. Clair filed an information in the circuit court for that county to test the validity of Act No. 500 of the Local Laws of 1887, purporting to incorporate the City of Marine City, in said county. The defendants are officers of said city, elected and holding public offices by virtue of said Act. The Act is claimed to be void because it was not introduced in the Legislature until after the expiration of fifty days, and was read but once in the Lower House of the Legislature, and was not read three times, as the Constitution requires.

The replication to the plea of the respondents sets forth that the session of the Legislature of 1887 began on the 5th day of January; that on February 18 a bill, denominated "House Bill No. 491," entitled "A Bill Detaching Certain Lands from the Township of Ft. Gratiot, in the County of St. Clair, and Organizing the Same into a New Township, to be Known as the Township of 'Huronla,'" was introduced by Representative Wellman, and referred to the committee on towns and counties.

The bill was discharged from this committee, May 26, and referred to the committee on municipal corporations, May 27. This last committee reported a substitute for said bill, which substitute was entitled "A Bill to Incorporate the City of Marine City, in the County of St. Clair, and to Repeal Act No. 328 of Local Acts of 1885, Entitled 'An Act to Reincorporate the Village of Marine City,' Approved April 23, 1885." The substitute was at once placed on the general order, and on June 3 discharged from such order, and under a suspension of the rules passed, and ordered to take immediate effect. On the same day it was sent to the Senate, and there passed, after but one reading, under a suspension of the rules, and the order for immediate effect concurred in. It was returned to the House, and on June 7 referred to the committee on engrossment and enrollment. Being duly enrolled, it received the signature of the Governor, June 8, 1887.

It is claimed under these circumstances, in said replication, that the bill as passed was not introduced in either House of the Legislature until May 27, 1887, when it appeared as a substitute in the report of the committee on municipal corporations; that the substitute was in no way germane to the subject matter of said house bill 491, as introduced in the first place, and that the territory embraced within the Township of Fort Gratiot does not include or liberal one is commanded. Thus, where a strict construction would have the effect of limiting and destroying, while some popular acceptance would support, the Act, the latter must be adopted. Com. v. Butler, 99 Pa. 535, 540; Farmers & M. Bank v. Smith, 3 Berg. & R. 63; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Coons, 5 Watts & S. 101.

So, a law speaking of officers by their titles of office will be presumed to be intended to operate upon future incumbents also, in order to escape the objection of unconstitutionality as a private or lo-any of the territory incorporated in Marion City by the substitute.

After the filing of this replication, the respondents obtained leave to file an amended plea and answer, and did so. In this amended answer they set forth the Act under which the city was organized, and averred its proper and correct passage by the Legislature according to law, showing the certificate of the proper officers that it passed both Houses, and was ordered to take immediate effect; also the approval of the Governor, and the certificate of the Secretary of State that it had become a law. It also appears upon the statute books as one of the Local Acts of 1887. See Local Acts 1887, p. 665.

To this amended plea and answer the prosecuting attorney replied that "Act No. 500 of the Laws of 1887 is not, and never has been, of any validity or force, and is now and always has been, void and of no effect, because the same was not introduced into or brought before the said Legislature until after the expiration of more than fifty days from and after the commencement of said session, and because the same was only read once in the Lower House of said Legislature, and was not read therein three times, as the Constitution of this State requires," and set forth the same, with other matters not necessary here to be mentioned, as causes of demurrer to said plea and answer. The respondents joined in said demurrer, and prayed the quashing of said information.

Upon the hearing, the journals of the two Houses were used, and it was shown therefrom the state of facts set forth in the replication, except that the bill, before it was referred to a committee, was read twice by its title, and the substitute once at length before its passage in the House, and also that the bill, in the shape of the substitute, was read twice by its title, and once at length in the Senate before its passage.

We held, in People ex rel. Attorney-General v. Rice, 7 West. Rep. 642, 31 N. W. Rep. 303, that parties could not stipulate or agree, or admit by pleading, that a statute was not properly or constitutionally passed by the Legislature, and that no parol proof could be used for that purpose. In that case we took judicial knowledge of the contents of the legislative journals, and found no flaw in the passage of the Act then under consideration. But it is held by reputable authority, and with some show of reason, that courts cannot look beyond the enrolled Act to ascertain whether the Constitution has been complied with in its passage.

If the Act, as in this case, is authenticated by the signature of the presiding officers of both Houses, approved by the Governor, and certified in the published laws by the Secretary of State, it is declared by the courts of last resort in many of the States that the court will not go behind these certificates, and search further to ascertain whether such facts existed as gave these officers constitutional warrant for their action. State v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176; Boans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514; Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 256; Bender v. State, 53 Ind. 254; Pangborn v. Young, 23 N. J. L. 41; Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1; Eld v. Gorham, 20 Conn. 8; Pacific R. Co. v. Governor, 23 Mo. 353; People v. Dentin, 33 N. Y. 269.

The courts of some of the States have taken cognizance of the journals, and have looked into them for the purpose of determining whether the constitutional methods have been followed in the passage of laws. But it is held, in all cases, that the presumption is always strong that the Legislature has not violated the Constitution in the passage of an Act, duly authenticated, as stated above; and that the proof furcal law. Seneca County v. Allen, 1 Cent. Rep. 71, 30 N. Y. 332.

It is a safe and wholesome rule to adopt the restricted construction of a statute, when a more liberal one will bring it in conflict with the fundamental law. People v. Board of Education, 18 Barb. 400, 402. See also Com. v. Butler, 30 Pa. 541; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 744.

When a law is signed by the speakers of both Houses, and approved by the Governor, it is presumed to have been passed in conformity to constitutional requirements. Larrison v. Peoria, A. & D. R. Co. 77 Ill. 11; Turley v. Logan Co. 17 Ill. 151.

Courts cannot go behind these to inquire into the form of its passage. Kilgore v. Magee, 35 Pa. 401.

The certificates of the speakers of the two Houses respectively, that an Act has passed both Houses, conclude the court upon any inquiry in that direction. Stout v. Grant Co. 5 West. Rep. 683, 107 Ind. 346; Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514; Bender v. State, 53 Ind. 254; Madison Co. v. Burford, 38 Ind. 333.

Where a statute is of doubtful or uncertain meaning a recurrence to the circumstances under which it was passed may be had to ascertain the probable intention of the Legislature in enacting it; and to that end the legislative history of the statute may be inquired into. Walter A. Wood Mowing & H. Mach. Co. v. Caldwell, 34 Ind. 270.

And for this purpose Acts in part repealed may be referred to. Frather v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 33 Ind. 32; Douglas v. Howland, 34 Wend. 41; Taylor v. Washington Co. 37 Ind. 333.

Joint resolutions.

A joint resolution, when duly enrolled, signed and approved, is equal in dignity and equally effectual to modify or repeal existing laws. Swann v. Hook, 40 Min. 333.

But a joint resolution on a subject which by the Constitution requires an Act thereof is void. Boyes v. Crane, 1 W. Va. 173.

Presumptions in favor of published statutes.

The presumption is that a published law was correctly passed as to matters of form. People v. Chicago Co. 3 N. Y. 317.

When the Constitution does not require the journals of the General Assembly to affirmatively show that a particular thing necessary to the validity of legislative action was done, it will be presumed in their silence, unless the contrary is shown, that the legislature observed their obligation. *Hall v. The certificate of the Secretary of State to a volume of the Revised Statutes is prima facie evidence of a section embodied therein. Gelders v. Kansas City, F. & G. R. Co. 1 West. Rep. 403, 18 Mo. App. 333.

nished by the journals must be clear, in order to overcome this presumption. State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 148, 86 N. W. Rep. 443; Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475; *Williams v. It would seem that in this State the practice of this court has been to look into the legislative journals, and to go behind the authentication of the Act, to ascertain whether the provisions of the Constitution have been complied with in the procedure to its passage.

In Green v. Graves the court evidently did this, and decided "an Act to organize and regulate banking associations" to be unconstitutional because it did not receive the assent of two thirds of the members of each house. See 1 Doug. (Mich.) 351.

In People v. Onondaga, 16 Mich. 254, the court examined the journals, and ascertained that the title of the Act as engrossed and signed by the Governor differed from the title of the bill as passed. Campbell, J., in his opinion, says: "We have certainly the right to look behind the enrollment of a statute for some purposes, in order to determine whether it passed the Legislature under the conditions required by the Constitution; as, for example, to ascertain what the vote was upon it;" citing Green v. Graves, supra.

And in People, ex rel. Attorney-General, v. Rice, 7 West. Rep. 642, 81 N. W. Rep. 203, this court again examined the journals.

But in none of these cases does it appear that the right to do so was questioned upon the argument.

I am of the opinion that the right of the courts to look into the journals for certain purposes, and especially in such cases as Green v. Graves and People v. Onondaga, should be sustained, rather than to hold that the enrollment and authentication of the Act, as enrolled by the proper officers, is conclusive. The courts certainly ought to have the right to open the journals of the Legislature to ascertain whether the fraud or mistake of some clerk or employé of the Legislature or its committees has not imposed upon the statute books a different law from the one actually passed by the Legislature, or to determine whether the requisite number of votes have been given under the Constitution to pass a law, when the Constitution requires that the ayes and noes shall be entered upon such journals. It must have been intended by the framers of that instrument, on such requirement, that the courts should look into the journals to determine whether the ayes were sufficient to pass a bill in either House as recorded in the journals.

How far the journals may be examined, to impeach duly authenticated Acts of the Legislature, it is not necessary here to determine. We certainly cannot act upon anything not found in the journals, nor can we presume that any requirement of the Constitution has not been fulfilled unless the fact appears affirmatively in such journals; and every intendment is to be made in favor of the constitutionality of the passage of the Act.

We held in People, ex rel. Attorney-General, 3 L. R. A.

v. Rice, supra, that if the object of the Act as passed is fully expressed in its title, the form or status of such title at its introduction, or during any of the stages of legislation before it becomes a law, is immaterial. In the present case, therefore, the Act is not unconstitutional because the title of the bill as introduced differed from the title of the substitute or the Act as passed. The body of this bill, as introduced by Mr. Wellman, does not appear in the house journal, nor does the Constitution require that it should. We have no right to presume that the body of the substitute was not germane to the body of the bill. The title throws some light upon the subject in both the bill and substitute, and from these titles it would appear that the subject to be legislated upon related to the same matter, to wit: the incorporation of certain territory in the same County of St. Clair into a new political organization or municipality—the bill, to take territory from the Township of Fort Gratiot, in the County of St. Clair, and organizing therefrom a new township to be called "Huronla," and the substitute to incorporate the City of Marine City within the same county. See Attorney-General v. Amos, 60 Mich. 372, 380, 27 N. W. Rep. 571.

We are not informed by the journal what the description of this particular territory was in the body of the bill as introduced, and we cannot go outside of the journals to ascertain it; nor do we consider that it was necessary that the description of the territory in the bill should have been identical with that of the substitute. The lands and property to be affected in both the bill and substitute evidently, from the titles, being in the same county, we are not prepared to say that even the spirit of the constitutional provision was violated. Certainly there is no affirmative showing from the journals that the letter of the constitutional requirement was not observed. The bill was introduced within the fifty day limit. The substitute cannot be considered a new bill. Article 4, § 28.

As to the reading of the bill and substitute twice by the titles and only once at length, it cannot be considered, at this late day, a violation of section 19, article 4, of the Constitution, which provides that "Every bill and joint resolution shall be read three times in each house before the final passage thereof. The legislative practice of reading the same twice by title and only once at length has been maintained too long in this State to be now overthrown by the courts. It would deprive us of all statutory law. The Constitution, in terms, does not direct that the reading shall be at length, and, while such reading might be the better practice, we cannot hold that it is imperatively required that it should be so read more than once. This Act, as it passed, was read once in each House at length, as appears from the journals.

The judgment of the Court below must be reversed and vacated. Judgment will be entered here for the respondents, with costs of both courts against the relator, Frank Hart.

Long, J., did not sit. The other Justices concurred.

(....Ind.....)

1. A general verdict must control special interrogatories, unless there is irreconcilable conflict.
2. Riding a horse at an improper speed along a much used public street in a populous city and at the same time looking in another direction from that in which the rider is going, is culpable negligence.
3. A footman about to cross a public street is not required to exercise the same high degree of vigilance in order to avoid contact with a horseman that is required at railroad crossings. Foot passengers have equal rights in the streets with those mounted on horseback or driving in carriages. Neither has a priority of right over the other; both are bound to use reasonable care to avoid collision.
4. A general objection to evidence as "incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant," is not sufficient to present any question on appeal.
5. On the question of negligence in riding at an improper speed on a street, evidence is admissible that there is more travel on that street than on any other in the city.

(January 8, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Allen County (Hurch, J.), in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for a personal injury. Affirmed. The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Myer L. Groff for appellant.

Messrs. J. B. Harper and W. G. Cole-rick for appellee.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by Harriet Frost against Elza T. Stringer, and his minor son, Frederick O. Stringer, to recover damages alleged to have been wrongfully inflicted by the defendant, Frederick O. Stringer, upon the plaintiff, in negligently riding his father's horse upon her while she was crossing a public street in the City of Fort Wayne. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the father, and against Frederick O. Stringer; and they also returned answers to special interrogatories submitted to them by the parties, respectively. On the appellant's behalf it is contended that the answers to special interrogatories make it apparent that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and that it was therefore error for the court to overrule his motion for judgment notwithstanding the general verdict.

It is doubtless the rule in cases of this nature that a recovery will not be sustained whenever there is negligence on the part of the plaintiff contributing directly, or which was a proximate cause, to the occurrence from which the injury arises, and that the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the injury is not attributable to any want of proper care on his part.

Murphy v. Deane, 101 Mass. 455. We do not, however, concur in the view that this rule was violated by overruling the appellant's motion for judgment. The general verdict affirmed the de endant's negligence, and that the plaintiff was herself in the exercise of due care; and it is too well settled to justify the citation of authority that, unless the facts specially found are in irreconcilable conflict with the general verdict, the general verdict must control.

It would serve no useful purpose to set out the interrogatories and the answers of the jury. It is quite sufficient to say they show beyond question that the defendant was culpably negligent, in that at the time of the collision he was riding his horse at an improper rate of speed, along a much used public street, in a populous city, and at the same time looking in another direction from that in which he was rapidly proceeding, and that they do not show the neglect of the plaintiff to take any reasonable precaution which would have prevented the collision that occasioned the injury.

We agree that it is the duty of a person crossing, or about to cross, a public street on foot, to look and take precautions according to the character of the thoroughfare, so as to avoid collision with approaching horsemen or vehicles; but it is obviously not necessary that the same high degree of vigilance should be demanded of a footman about to cross a public street, in order to avoid contact with a horseman who is likewise under a duty to be on the lookout, and to have his horse under careful control, as is required at railroad crossings over which engines and trains of cars are necessarily run at a rate of speed not readily governable. Wendell v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 420; Barker v. Savage, 45 N. Y. 191; Williams v. Grealy, 112 Mass. 79.

Unless the occasion is of an extraordinary character, persons have no right to ride or drive through the streets of a populous city at a rate of speed which makes it dangerous to foot travelers using ordinary care; while trains of cars cannot be moved so that their speed may be averted in a moment, when footmen are seen in the way.

The court committed no error in overruling the appellant's motion for judgment, notwithstanding the general verdict.

It is not necessary to discuss the sufficiency of the evidence. The plaintiff's testimony, which the jury must have accepted as true, sustains the verdict to the fullest extent. Accepting the plaintiff's testimony, it cannot be said that she was guilty of contributory negligence, or that the want of ordinary care on her part proximately or directly contributed to the injury. Foot passengers have equal rights in the streets with those mounted on horseback or driving in carriages. Neither have a priority of right over the other. Both are bound to use reasonable care to avoid collision. Belton v. Baxter, 54 N. Y. 245; Cotton v. Wood, 8 C. B. N. S. 571.

The plaintiff had the right to cross the street at the crosswalk or elsewhere, exercising such caution and prudence as the circumstances demanded to avoid being injured, while the defendant had the right to ride along the street, observing such watchfulness for footmen, and having his animal under such control, as would enable him to avoid injury to others, who had corresponding and reciprocal rights in the street. Simons v. Gaynor, 89 Ind. 165; Murphy v. Orr, 96 N. Y. 14; Moebius v. Herrmann, 106 N. Y. 349, 11 Cent. Rep. 90, 15 N. E. Rep. 415; Brooks v. Schwerin, 54 N. Y. 343; Daniels v. Clegg, 28 Mich. 82; Shapleigh v. Wyman, 134 Mass. 118.

Children and infirm persons, as well as those who are of mature years, and in the vigor and activity of health, have the right to walk along or across the streets of a city, observing such care as persons of like age and condition are accustomed to use; and all have a right to assume that carriages will not be driven or horses ridden over the streets at an improper rate of speed. Birkett v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 110 N. Y. 504, 18 Cent. Rep. 421, 18 N. E. Rep. 108.

It cannot, therefore, be said, as a matter of law, that one is guilty of negligence who does not anticipate and take special precautions against injury from the reckless and improper conduct of others in riding or driving at an unusual and dangerous rate of speed. Coombs v. Purrington, 49 Maine, 382; Boss v. Litton, 5 Car. & P. 407; Williams v. Richards, 8 Car. & K. 81.

Some questions were asked of witnesses produced by the plaintiff below which were objected to as "incompetent, immaterial and irrelevant." It has often been decided that an objection of this general character, without more, presents no question for decision. Bundy v. Cunningham, 107 Ind. 860, 5 West. Rep. 540, 8 N. E. Rep. 174; Chapman v. Moore, 107 Ind. 228, 5 West. Rep. 269, 8 N. E. Rep. 80; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Walker, 118 Ind. 196, 12 West. Rep. 731, 15 N. E. Rep. 234.

A witness was also permitted to testify, over objection, that there was more travel upon the street over which the defendant was riding at the time he ran upon the plaintiff than upon any other street in the City of Fort Wayne. As tending to show the impropriety of the defendant's conduct in riding at an immoderate rate of speed, this evidence was competent.

The alleged modification of the instructions asked by the appellant presents no question which requires a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

NEVADA SUPREME COURT.

Mary Jane POWELL, Resp't.,

v.

D. C. CAMPBELL, App't.

(....Nov.....)

1. When a divorce is granted to a wife for causes other than adultery, if the accomplishment of her support renders it necessary, the court may decree to her the title of either real or personal property belonging to her husband, under Nevada General Statutes, § 493, authorizing property, in certain cases, to be "set apart" for the support of the wife under such circumstances.
2. The rule of lis pendens applies to one who purchases real property from a husband, with actual notice of a pending divorce suit in which the wife seeks a decree giving her the title to the property.

3. A sale of property by a husband, pending a divorce suit in which a decree is asked setting apart the property to the wife, is not taken out of the rule of lis pendens by the fact that the wife told him he could sell it if he wanted to, and that she wished he would, where the purchaser had no knowledge of such statements.

4. A suit in equity by a woman to set aside a deed made by her former husband pending a divorce suit, in which a decree was made giving her the land, will not be defeated on the ground that she has a complete remedy at law.

(January 5, 1880.)

APPEAL by defendant, from a judgment of the Washoe County District Court in favor of plaintiff in an action to set aside a conveyance of land. Affirmed.

NOTE.—Divorce; rule of lis pendens.

Jurisdiction in a suit for divorce may be acquired by a procedure against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. In such case the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714 (24 L. ed. 585).

The only ground on which a lis pendens is created in a divorce suit is where by the allegations of the bill some property is so put in litigation and brought under the jurisdiction of the court as to be bound to abide the decree of the court. Spencer v. Spencer, 9 R. I. 162; Bennett, Lis Pendens, 180.

As a general rule bills filed for alimony and maintenance merely do not constitute lis pendens. Brightman v. Brightman, 1 R. I. 112; Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. 682; Gilmore v. Gilmore, 5 Jones, Eq. 284; Baird v. Baird, Phil. Eq. 817.

The rule of lis pendens, if applicable at all to a simple petition for divorce, alimony, etc., where the property sought to be charged is described, is only applicable because it rests upon the latter ground; and therefore notice of the filing of the petition to third persons, who are creditors of the respondent's husband, is not, as to such persons, equivalent to service so as to postpone their bond lis attachments of the property described. Spencer v. Spencer, 9 R. I. 163. See Hopkins v. McLaren, 4 Cow. 697; 2 Sargl. Vend. 1045, note 2; Newman v. 2 L. R. A.

Pending a suit for divorce brought by the present plaintiff against her husband, he conveyed certain land to defendant. This land was set apart to plaintiff by the decree in the divorce suit, and this action was brought to set aside the conveyance by the husband.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. R. H. Lindsay and R. M. Clarke, for appellant:

The decree in Powell v. Powell did not operate to clothe respondent with title.

Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 184, 185, 170, 428, 1817, 1818.

If the court had the power to do so at all, that could have been done only by enforcing Powell's appearance and ordering him to convey and, upon his neglect or refusal so to do, to appoint a commissioner to execute such conveyance.

Gen. Laws, Nev. § 493.

Respondent, having failed to avail herself of the provisions of the statute, and of the law, in the divorce case, cannot now be heard to complain, in another and a separate action, and subsequent to the term of court at which the divorce suit was tried.

Stewart, Marriage & Divorce, § 326, and cases cited; Harris v. Harris, 36 Barb. 88; Clemens v. Clemens, 87 N. Y. 59, 73; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 787.

It was material for appellant to show that respondent consented to the sale of the property pending the divorce suit. But for the divorce suit Richard Powell could have sold without respondent's consent, and respondent could relieve him from any disability which the divorce proceedings imposed, granting that the divorce proceedings deprived him of such power. The question is not one of estoppel of respondent, but authority in Richard Powell to sell. If the divorce proceeding suspended this authority, respondent's consent revived it.

Kottman v. Peyton, 1 Speers, Eq. 46; Terry v. Hopkins, 1 Hill, Eq. 1; Cheslure v. Payne, 16 B. Mon. 618.

Messrs. William Webster and S. D. King, for respondent:

Defendant intruded himself into the controversy by taking, from the former defendant, title to the subject matter of the controversy, with actual knowledge of the rights and claims of plaintiff therein; and he is now bound by the adjudication therein.

Barber v. Barber, 62 U. S. 21 How. 582 (16 L. ed. 226); Cheever v. Wilson, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 108 (19 L. ed. 604); Tilton v. Cofield, 98 U. S. 168 (23 L. ed. 858).

Any claim that Jane Powell, by her declarations, vested Richard Powell with a power to convey seems fallacious.

Gen. Laws, 2624; Hepburn v. Dubois, 87 U. S. 12 Pet. 345 (9 L. ed. 1111).

Jane and Richard Powell were husband and wife at the time; and the declarations, if made, were communications between husband and wife, and hence not admissible in evidence.

Gen. Stat. § 3403; Terry v. Elcker, 1 Bailey, L. 568; Com. v. Hayes, 5 New Eng. Rep. 268, 145 Mass. 289; Bowman v. Patrick, 32 Fed. Rep. 368; Brock v. Brock, 8 Cent. The judgment in a matrimonial suit is conclusive; it is an adjudication upon the status of the parties (Freeman, Judgments, 8d ed. § 610); yet the power conferred on our courts to grant divorces is conferred by statute, and is as much so conferred as any of the powers given to our courts in divorce matters—upon which theory a collateral attack upon Powell v. Powell is excluded.

Strangers to the record cannot collaterally interpose objections, which can alone be made in a direct proceeding by motion or writ of error.

Leonard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the — day of March, 1886, respondent commenced an action in the District Court of Washoe County, to obtain a decree of divorce a vinculo against her husband, Richard Powell, on the ground of extreme cruelty. In her complaint she fully and specifically described certain lands, whereon was the residence of Powell and wife, and certain personal property, all the separate property of the said Powell, of the value of about $1,000, which she alleged might, by order of the court, be applied to her support and maintenance, and in aid of the prosecution of her action against the defendant. She also alleged that said property was all the property owned by the defendant; that she was without means to prosecute her action, that she was impecunious, and in delicate health; that her health had suffered because of the defendant's cruelty towards her; that she was dependent upon her friends and relatives for support and subsistence. She prayed for a decree of divorce, and that all the real and personal property of the defendant be set apart to her for her support and maintenance, except such as might be appropriated for her maintenance, and in aid of her action against the defendant pending litigation; that the title to the real property of defendant be decreed to her; and for such other relief as she might be entitled to receive.

Personal service of summons, attached to a certified copy of the complaint, was made upon the defendant, Powell, in Washoe County, March 3, 1886. Defendant appeared for the purpose of contesting plaintiff's application for an allowance for suit money and support pending the litigation; but he failed to answer the complaint, or to appear in the action, except as before stated.

On the 30th day of March, 1886, the case came on for trial. Plaintiff introduced her evidence, and, it appearing that defendant's default had been entered, the court entered a decree dissolving the marriage of plaintiff and defendant, "and that the plaintiff do have for her support, from and out of the separate property of the defendant, two horses and their harness and one wagon . . . described in the complaint and findings of fact filed in said action . . . that plaintiff have title to said property, and all of it, against the defendant, and that she have possession thereof; that plaintiff do have against the defendant, and from and out of his separate property, the following described real property, and real property interests and appurtenances, to wit: [Then following a definite description, as stated in the complaint.] It is ordered, adjudged and decreed by the court that the title to said land and water, and the use of said water, together with the improvements and appurtenances with said lands and water, and the use of said water, be, and the same is, taken from and out of the defendant, and placed in and confirmed to the plaintiff, and to her heirs and assigns, and that she have possession thereof as against the defendant."

March 25, 1886, pending the divorce suit, defendant in this action took a deed of conveyance to himself from Richard Powell of all the real property and property rights described in the complaint and decree in the divorce case, and a transfer and assignment of all the personal property described therein; and at the commencement of this action this defendant still held the title and possession of said real property. The decree in the divorce case remains unreversed and unmodified.

Prior to and at the time he received said conveyance, and before making any payment on account of said purchase, defendant had actual personal knowledge of the pendency of the divorce suit of Powell v. Powell, and that the title and disposition of all of said property, real and personal, was involved in said action, and that the plaintiff therein claimed and demanded relief therein in respect to all of said property. The value of the property sold by Powell to defendant was at least $3,000, while the price paid was but $1,400.

This action was commenced June 26, 1886, to annul the deed from Powell to defendant, and to compel the latter to convey to plaintiff, by good and sufficient deed, the real property described in Powell's deed to him. Defendant, Campbell, appeared and answered. In her complaint plaintiff charges that Powell gave, and Campbell received, the deed above mentioned, with intent to cheat and defraud plaintiff, and to defeat the operation of any judgment that might be recovered in the said divorce suit; but the findings do not cover this issue.

The court proceeded upon the theory that defendant was a purchaser pendente lite, with actual knowledge of the then pending suit for divorce, the property to be affected thereby, and the relief demanded; that in this action he was as conclusively bound by the decree in that case as he would have been if he had been made a party defendant; and that plaintiff could maintain this action to acquire from him the legal title to property to which she had acquired the equitable title in the divorce suit. A decree was entered accordingly. From that decree, and an order overruling defendant's motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

At the trial plaintiff offered, and the court admitted, in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Powell v. Powell, against defendant's objections, based upon several grounds stated, the first and most important of which was as follows: "That said judgment roll, decree and each and all of said papers, are irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent as evidence for any purpose in this case, for the reason that the said decree is a nullity, in so far as it attempts to divest the title of the property mentioned in said decree out of Richard Powell, and vest it in the plaintiff in this action." The fourth is as follows: "It being admitted by the pleadings in this action that all the property in dispute herein was, before the commencement of the action of Powell v. Powell, the separate property of said Richard Powell, the court which tried said action had no power to decree the title to any of it to the plaintiff in said divorce case."

These grounds of objection may be considered together. If, under the statute, the district court has power, in any suit for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty of the husband, to divest him of the title to his separate property, and invest the wife with the same, so far as that may be done by a decree, then the objection made upon the grounds above stated was not well taken; because, if there was power, then the most that can be claimed is that it was error to decree the title, and the decree cannot be assailed collaterally. It is undoubtedly true that if the court had power to decree the title, such power must be found in the statute. Perkins v. Perkins, 16 Mich. 167; Bacon v. Bacon, 48 Wis. 202; Donovan v. Donovan, 20 Wis. 586; Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 879.

Does our statute, in a proper case, confer such power?

In Wuest v. Wuest, upon the facts shown, this court upheld a decree awarding certain real estate to the wife absolutely. 17 Nev. 221.

In Lake v. Bender, 18 Nev. 861, we did say, and now reiterate the same, that the object of the statute was to provide proper support for the wife and minor children, and that the legislative intent to limit the disposition of the husband's property to their proper support was manifest. In that case, where there was a direct appeal, and where, consequently, we could consider mere errors, the court below had decreed to Mrs. Lake $150 per month for her support, and made the same a charge and lien upon certain real estate. She appealed, and it was urged in her behalf that Lake's separate property should have been divided between the spouses, and that in making an order for a monthly payment of $150 the court abused its discretion. It was to this claim for a division, under the circumstances, that we directed our argument; and we tried to show that, in the case then in hand, a decree investing Mrs. Lake with the title to specific property was not necessary for her proper support, and consequently that it should not be granted.

If, in an action of this character, the statute permits the court to decree to the wife any portion of the husband's separate property absolutely, it should never be done unless such action is reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of the primary object of the statute—support of the wife and minor children; and if, in any case, the discretion of the trial court should be abused, this court, upon direct appeal, would not fail to correct the error.

The statute provides that "When the marriage shall be dissolved by the husband being sentenced to imprisonment, and when a divorce shall be ordered for the cause of adultery committed by the husband, the wife shall be an-titled to the same proportion of his lands and property as if he were dead; but in other cases the court may set apart such portion for her support and the support of their children as shall be deemed just and equitable." Gen. Stat. § 496.

The court may "set apart" so much of the husband's separate property, in case of divorce for extreme cruelty, as, under the circumstances, is just and reasonable for the support of the wife and their children. If more is set apart than is just and reasonable for support, it is error; but, until reversed or modified on appeal, the decree in this respect is not void. Does the power to set apart include the power to decree the husband's title to her, if in a given case it is necessary to do so in order to provide proper support for the wife and children? In this, as in all other cases of statutory construction, we must find, if possible, the legislative intent; and, in an earnest endeavor to do so in this case, the first thought that comes to our minds is, as before stated, that the primary object of the Legislature was to give the wife and children a support out of his property; and, if the accomplishment of this object depends upon decreeing to her the title, what good reason can be given for withholding it? Is the entire title any more sacred than the absolute right of use for life, if the whole is required?

The learned counsel for appellant say: "The pretense that clothing the wife with the absolute title to the husband's property, and imposing no restrictions upon its disposal, is doing nothing more than setting it apart for her support, is too absurd for argument." Let us see:

The section of the statute under consideration was first passed by the Legislature of 1861, Stat. 1861, p. 99, § 27. That section was amended in 1865 (Stat. 1864-65, p. 99), although the amended section, in respect to the part under consideration, is substantially the same as the original. The Divorce Act of 1861 was passed November 28, 1861. The following day the Probate Act was passed (Stat. 1861, p. 186); and yet, in the last named Act these words are used: "If there is no law in force exempting property from execution, the following shall be set apart for the use of the widow or minor child or children, and shall not be subject to administration . . . When property shall have been set apart for the use of the family, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, if the deceased shall have left a widow, and no minor child, such property shall be the property of the widow. If he shall have left, also, a minor child or children, the one half of such property shall belong to the widow, and the remainder to the child, or in equal shares to the children, if there be more than one. If there be no widow, the whole shall belong to the minor child or children."

And in the fourth section of the Homestead Act of 1865 (Gen. Stat. § 542) is this language: "The homestead and all other property exempt by law from sale under execution shall, upon the death of either spouse, be set apart by the court as the sole property of the surviving spouse, for his or her benefit, and that of his or her legitimate child or children."

So we see that, in the Probate Act and Homestead Law, the words "set apart," were used in the sense that property set apart should belong absolutely to the persons for whose benefit the statute made provisions. It is true that in the Divorce Act it is not declared that the property set apart for the support of the wife and children shall belong to the wife, and for a good reason. The Legislature intended only to provide support out of his property, and it was not intended that the title should be set apart unless necessity required it. But if such necessity exists, why may not the words "set apart" have as broad meaning as they are declared to have in the other statutes quoted?

Again; if in no case can the court decree to the wife any portion of the husband's real estate in its entirety, then the same is true in relation to his personal property. No greater power is given in one case than in the other. Did the same Legislature that gave to widows and fatherless children, absolutely, a liberal amount of property, including household goods, intend in all cases to prohibit courts from providing the same security of home and support to the woman who is compelled to seek the law's protection against the husband's cruelties and indignities? The language and spirit of the Divorce Law do not show such intention, and the same words used in the other statutes referred to lead the mind to an opposite conclusion. Authorities upon this question differ greatly, because they are generally based upon dissimilar statutes. But an examination as brief as possible of some of them will, we think, sustain our conclusion.

Counsel for appellant refer us to Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 187; Rogers v. Vines, 6 Ired. L. 298; Darrenberger v. Haupt, 10 Nev. 43; Lake v. Bender, 18 Nev. 402, 4 Pac. Rep. 711, and 7 Pac. Rep. 74.

The last two are not opposed to our construction.

In Maguire v. Maguire the court decreed a divorce a vinculo, allowed the wife to marry again after two years, interdicted a future marriage by the husband, and secured to the wife all the property owned by her in her own right at the time of her marriage. The case was taken to the court of appeals by writ of error for a revision of the decree. The court said:

"But the decree itself is not for alimony; and if it had been such, it would be erroneous, because it does not secure to the wife, as wife, an annuity or other personal right to maintenance; but it purports to confirm to her, as a feme sole, the absolute title to property, which should never be done in case of mere alimony."

The seventh section of the Statute of 1809, under which the chancellor proceeded in that case, was as follows: "The court pronouncing the decree of divorce shall regulate and order the division of the estate, real and personal, in such way as to them shall seem just and right, having due regard to each party, and the children, if any; Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the court to compel either of the parties to divest himself or herself of the title to the real estate." 1 Litt. & S. Dig. Ky. 1822, p. 443.

Under such a statute, the decision is not an authority against our conclusion under our statute. The same may be said of Quisenberry v. Quisenberry, 1 Duv. 198; Lozett v. Lovett, 11 Ala. 767; and Fishli v. Fishli, 2 Litt. 843.

But Berthelemy v. Johnson, 8 B. Mon. 90, does throw light upon our case. We quote from the opinion: "Jacques C. Berthelemy seeks the reversal of a judgment in bar of an action of ejectment brought by him against Cave Johnson, the defendant in error. The plaintiff claims a legal right of entry in the land in contest, as sole heir of his deceased father, to whom the defendant had conveyed the title in fee, in the year 1797. The defendant relies on a divorce a vinculo of the wife of the decedent, adjudged in virtue of an Act of Assembly passed in December, 1803; a judicial sentence declaring that the fee simple title to said land should vest absolutely in the divorced wife; and a subsequent sale and conveyance of it by her to him . . . The same enactment [1803] authorized the court, without qualification as to mode, to secure to the wife support out of the husband's estate; and the court adjudged that the fee simple title to the said tract of land should vest in her as one of the means of securing that support. This did not, in our opinion, exceed either the legislative power, or the plenary discretion confided to the court; and therefore, were it deemed erroneous, it would not be void."

We have not been able to find the Act of Assembly referred to, but, taking the court's statement of its provisions as correct, they were, in substance and effect, like ours.

In Rogers v. Vines the question was whether under the statute, when slaves were assigned to the wife for alimony out of the husband's estate, she had the absolute property in them. The statute authorized the court to allow her such alimony as her husband's circumstances would permit, not exceeding one third of the annual income or profits of his estate or occupation, or to assign to her separate use such part of the real and personal estate of the husband as the court should think fit, not exceeding one third part thereof, as the justice of the case might require, which should continue until a reconciliation should take place between the parties. The court held that the provision that her separate use should continue until reconciliation was absolutely inconsistent with a power of sale in the wife; because either the sale would prevent the revesting of the property in the husband upon a reconciliation, which would defeat the policy of the Legislature, and directly contradict the Act, or the wife would have the power of defeating her sale by returning to her husband—which the Legislature could not have intended. The conclusion of the court was that the separate enjoyment of specific things was given as alimony in lieu of money, and that the wife's right was, by its nature and the terms of the statute, limited to the period of separation, and that it terminated by the death of either.

In Calame v. Calame, 25 N. J. Eq. 548, the decision was similar to that in Rogers v. Vines. The statute provided that the court might make such order touching alimony and maintenance of the wife and children by the husband as should be fit, reasonable and just. It then provided the manner and means of enforcing payment. The court held that the modes appointed to enforce payment of the alimony, such as requiring security from the husband, and authorizing the sequestration of his personal estate, and the rents and profits of his real estate, were in opposition to the idea that a part of the land itself could be set apart for the wife; and from the entire statute it was held that the words "alimony" and "maintenance" were used in their established technical sense; that is, money payments of the character of an annuity.

The two cases last referred to are not against our conclusion. The words alimony and maintenance are not used in the body of our statute, and there are no similar provisions indicating such an intention as is shown in the North Carolina and New Jersey Statutes.

In Illinois the statute authorizes courts to make such order touching alimony and maintenance of the wife, and the care, custody and support of the children, as shall be fit, reasonable and just; and, when the wife is complainant, to order the husband to give reasonable security for such alimony and maintenance, or to enforce the payment of such alimony and maintenance in any other manner consistent with the practice of the court. And the court may from time to time make such alterations in the allowance of alimony and maintenance as shall appear reasonable and proper. Scates, Stat. 151, § 6.

Yet, under this statute, similar in most respects to that of New Jersey, the supreme court has held in many cases that courts have power to assign, as alimony, to the wife a part of the real estate of the husband, but has said at the same time that this should not be done except under special circumstances, rendering such action necessary for the support of the wife and children.

In Ohio, under a statute allowing alimony out of the husband's real and personal property, "which may be allowed in real or personal property," the supreme court held that, if allowed in real property, it was not error to decree to her the absolute title in fee. Broadwell v. Broadwell, 21 Ohio St. 657.

Without a further examination of authorities, our conclusion is that if, in the proper accomplishment of the primary object of the statute—the support of the wife and children—it is reasonably necessary to invest the wife with the husband's title to property; if, in other words, without an investiture of the title, the object of the statute will be defeated—then the statute permits such investiture in the wife, as one of the means of securing her support.

In an action for divorce, where the complaining wife alleges her necessities and the defendant's abilities, and asks that certain particularly described real estate be set apart and decreed to her for her support, can the rule of lis pendens be invoked by the wife against one who purchases pendente lite, with actual notice of the divorce suit and other facts before stated? We think it can, upon reason and authority. The statute provides that if either party is about to do any act that may defeat or render less effectual any order which the court may ultimately make concerning property, an order shall be made for the preservation thereof. It is claimed that this remedy is exclusive; that, unless restrained, Powell's sale to defendant was valid. Our opinion is that this preventive remedy does not affect the ordinary rule as to purchasers pendente lite, if this is a case where that rule can be invoked.

"In order to bring the doctrine of lis pendens into effect, it is indispensable that the litigation should be about some specific thing, which must necessarily be affected by the termination of the suit . . . It is further essential to the existence of lis pendens that the particular property involved in the suit must be so pointed out by the proceedings as to warn the whole world that they intermeddle at their peril." Freem. Judgm. §§ 196, 197.

The same author says: "Lis pendens is notice of all facts apparent on the face of the pleadings, and of those other facts of which the facts so stated necessarily put the purchaser on inquiry." Id. § 198.

In many cases where, in divorce proceedings, the application is for alimony proper—that is, an allowance to be paid at regular periods for the wife's support—and especially where there was no statute allowing her any specific part of the husband's estate, it has been held that the rule of lis pendens does not apply, because such a suit is in personam, and does not apply to any specific part of the personal or real estate of the husband. Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. (Va.) 662; Brightman v. Brightman, 1 R. I. 112; Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md. 562.

But where the statute permits the husband's estate to be set apart to the wife for life, or, if necessary, in fee, for her support, and in her complaint she specifically describes property which she asks the court to decree to her for her support, there seems to be no well founded reason why the rule of lis pendens should not apply. True, it may be said that the decree of divorce is the first object of the suit, and that support is but an incident. But it is also true that when divorce is sought and granted, and support is required from the husband, the law permits the court, and it is the court's duty, to provide such support as is reasonable and just under all the circumstances. In such a case a purchaser pendente lite, with notice of the suit and its objects, knows that the property described may be decreed to the wife, and that one of the objects of the suit is to obtain a decree awarding such property to her.

"The primary object for which the suit is brought is not material, provided the court has jurisdiction of the property for secondary purposes; and so it would seem that where a bill for divorce and alimony is filed by the wife against the husband, and there is no special allegation in it pointing out any particular property which is sought to be charged with the payment of the alimony, there will be no lis pendens as to either real or personal property of the defendant. Such a case cannot be distinguished from those where the action is professedly in personam, and where the contention in the case is entirely independent of any particular property . . . If, however, the bill should contain special allegations—should point out particular real or personal property—and, within the limits of the manifest jurisdiction and powers of the court to grant the relief, should seek to have alimony assigned out of such specific property, there would be constructive notice of the lis pendens." Bennett, Lis Pendens, § 69. See also section 219. Daniel 2 L. R. A.

v. Hodges, 87 N. C. 98, supports the text just quoted.

In Ulrich v. Ulrich, 8 Mackey, 200, the court followed Daniel v. Hodges, and held that while the rule is that, in a bill for alimony and maintenance, there is no lis pendens as to the property generally; yet where, as in that case, a certain lot is described in the bill, and it is alleged that the lot constitutes the principal property of the defendant, out of which alimony should be decreed, there is lis pendens as to such property. And see Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 22; Vanzant v. Vanzant, 23 Ill. 543; Tolerton v. Willard, 30 Ohio St. 588; Sapp v. Wightman, 103 Ill. 158.

We are satisfied that the rule of lis pendens applies in this case as to the property in question; and it follows that the defendant occupies the attitude of a pendente lite purchaser, and is therefore bound by the decree in the divorce case, and by all the proceedings therein that are not coram non judice, unless other facts existed which, if proven, would relieve him from the operation of the general rule.

This leads us to an exception taken at the trial, to the exclusion of testimony. On cross examination plaintiff was asked this question: "During the pendency of the divorce suit between you and Richard Powell, and before the trial of said cause, and before Powell sold the property to Campbell, at the house of George Anderson, in this county, did you not state to Richard Powell words as follows, or to this effect: 'You can sell the ranch if you wish to [meaning the ranch sold to Campbell]. I wish to God you would sell it, as it has always been a millstone around our necks?'" It was not claimed that these words, if uttered, were communicated to Campbell, and the court sustained plaintiff's objection to the question.

Counsel for appellant say: "The question is not one of estoppel of respondent, but authority in Richard Powell to sell. If the divorce proceeding suspended this authority, respondent's consent revived it."

Since there is no element of estoppel in the case, the objection raised is easily disposed of. Powell required no authority from his wife or anybody else to sell. He had the power to sell, and the sale between him and Campbell was valid; but he could not affect her rights by a sale pendente lite, at least without a valid release or satisfaction of her claim for support, and neither release nor satisfaction was effected by her statement to Powell, if she made it. Nothing less than a valid contract, based upon a sufficient consideration, could release the property from the claim already impressed upon it. Suppose, pending the divorce suit, plaintiff had said to Powell, "You may keep the property—I do not want it," and Powell, without selling the property, had set up that statement in answer to her claim for support, and had offered evidence showing what she stated. It would hardly be claimed that such a statement would have deprived her of provision for support, if at the trial she had insisted upon her rights. The court did not err in excluding this testimony.

At the close of plaintiff's case in chief, defendant moved the court to require plaintiff to make Richard Powell a party defendant to this action, and that he be brought in as a party defendant, for the reason that the pleadings and proofs showed that a complete determination of the controversy could not be had without his presence. The motion was denied, and it is claimed that the court erred.

We do not think so. In the divorce case, the court had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and the entire subject matter of the action. He did not answer or defend, but, in a legal sense, he had his day in court. Neither he nor Campbell, in this action, could assail the decree in the divorce case, or any proceeding therein, except for want of jurisdiction. The record before us does not show that in the divorce case the court exceeded its jurisdiction. Powell's rights were determined in that case, and could not be retried in this. Campbell had the same defenses that he and Powell would have had. The decree in the divorce case being in force, we are unable to see that Powell has any interest in this case, or is affected by the decree.

It is further urged that "If the judgment in the divorce suit is valid and binding in so far as it attempts to vest title in respondent, then such title is complete by the terms of the decree, and respondent has a complete remedy at law, and this equitable action cannot be maintained; that a defendant cannot, by a transfer pendente lite, defeat the action; the plaintiff may notwithstanding proceed to judgment and effect the assignee."

In support of the statement last made, three cases in ejectment are cited. Undoubtedly, in an action of ejectment, plaintiff prevailing, all persons entering under the defendant, pendente lite, may be dispossessed under the judgment. Freem. Judgm. § 171.

But we are cited to no authorities holding that this may be done under a decree like that in Powell v. Powell, or that Mrs. Powell could have sustained ejectment against Campbell after obtaining her decree against Powell. Campbell had the legal title and possession. She had only an equitable right to both. The original equity doctrine was that a decree was not, of itself, a legal title, and did not transfer title. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1817.

But in many of the States statutes have been passed providing that a decree shall operate as a conveyance. "When the object of a suit is to compel the conveyance of the legal title by the defendant, and the decree does not require a sale, the title will not pass until the deed is executed, unless it be provided, as has been done in some of the States, by statute, that the decreed itself shall operate as a conveyance." Miller v. Sherry, 60 U. S. 2 Wall. 248 [17 L. ed. 829].

It is probable that plaintiff might have made Campbell a party to the divorce suit after the conveyance to him from Powell, if she was aware of the sale—a fact not disclosed by the record. Still, was she not entitled to maintain this action to recover a conveyance by defendant of a legal estate corresponding to her equitable title? 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 152. Such actions have been sustained by the most distinguished courts.

In Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. Jr. 199, the court said: "This is not the case of the legal estate acquired during the pendency of the suit, in which instance it might be necessary, in order to avoid it, to have recourse to a new suit." "Although the maxim is, Pendente lite nihil innovetur, that maxim is not to be understood as warranting the conclusion that the conveyance so made is absolutely null and void, at all times and for all purposes. The true interpretation of the maxim is that the conveyance does not vary the rights of the parties in that suit, and they are not bound to take notice of the title acquired under it, but with regard to them, the title is to be taken as if it had never existed." "If, however, the purchaser pendente lite be a purchaser of the legal estate, and not of a mere equitable estate, it may, after the determination of the pending suit, be necessary, in order to compel a surrender of his title, or to declare it void, to institute a new suit against him." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 908, and note 8.

Besides, it is admitted by counsel for appellant that Campbell could have been made a party defendant in the divorce suit; and if the facts and law warranted it, he could have been made to pass the title to the property in question to plaintiff. The record does not show that plaintiff knew, or had reason to know, of the conveyance from Powell to Campbell, before the trial, or until after it was completed.

It is shown by the court's findings that the divorce suit was commenced March, 1836; that during its pendency, March 25, 1836, Powell conveyed to Campbell; but it nowhere appears that plaintiff had any knowledge of the conveyance, or of any facts making it incumbent upon her to make inquiries concerning it, until after trial.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

PENNSYLVANIA R. CO., Plf. in Err.,

Mary BOWERS.

The Pennsylvania Act of 1868 (P. L. 53), limiting the amount to be recovered in actions against railroad companies and common carriers for negligence to $3,000 in cases of personal injuries and $5,000 in case of death, providing that "Upon the acceptance of the provisions hereof by any carrier or corporation the same shall become a part of its Act of Incorporation," does not constitute a contract with a corporation, and is abrogated by the new Constitution of Pennsylvania, art. 3, § 21, providing that no statute shall limit the amount of recovery for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to persons or property.

(February 11, 1889.)

ERROR to the Common Pleas No. 1 of Philadelphia County, to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death alleged to have been occasioned by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

At the trial before Bregy, J., a verdict was returned for plaintiff for $14,600. A remittitur was filed for all above $10,000 and judgment entered for that sum; whereupon defendant took this writ, assigning for error, inter alia, the affirmance of plaintiff's second point, which appears in the opinion.

Mr. George Tucker Bispham, for plaintiff in error:

A consideration for the Act of 1868 passed to the State from the company, to wit: the subjection of the latter to the Fourth Constitutional Amendment of 1867, as follows: "The Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation hereafter conferred by or under any special or general law, whenever, in their opinion, it may be injurious to the citizens of this Commonwealth—in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators."

Pa. R. Co. v. Duncan, 2 Cent. Rep. 551, 111 Pa. 362.

The Act of 1868, therefore, when accepted, amounted to a contract between the company and the Commonwealth.

Hays v. Com. 82 Pa. 523; Pa. R. Co. v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 21.

Mr. P. F. Rothermel, Jr., for defendant in error:

The limitation of liability claimed by the defendant corporation, by virtue of their alleged acceptance of the Act of April 4, 1868, has been avoided by section 21 of article 3 of the Constitution of 1874.

Pa. R. Co. v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 34; Lewis v. Hollahan, 108 Pa. 425; Pa. R. Co. v. Duncan, 2 Cent. Rep. 551, 111 Pa. 352.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The fifth assignment squarely raises the important question of this case. It alleges that the learned court below erred in affirming the plaintiff's second point. The point is as follows: "That the limitation of liability for damages claimed by the defendant under and by virtue of the Act of April 4, 1868, has been revoked and avoided, as to the defendant corporation, by the provisions of the 21st section of article 3 of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, known as the New Constitution."

The second section of the Act of 1868 (P. L. 58) limits the amount to be recovered in actions against railroad companies and common carriers for negligence, to $3,000 in cases of personal injuries, and $5,000 in case of death. The 4th section of said Act provides that "Upon the acceptance of the provisions hereof, by any carrier or corporation, the same shall become a part of its Act of incorporation."

Upon the trial below the defendant company proved its acceptance of the provisions of this Act, and claimed that by such acceptance the Act of 1868 was written into its charter. The manner of the proof of this fact has been criticised. The acceptance, as shown upon the trial, was by resolution of the board of managers, and not by vote of the stockholders. We prefer, however, not to decide this case upon technical grounds, and shall treat the action of the managers as an acceptance by the company.

Section 21 of article 3 of the Constitution is as follows: "No Act of the General Assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to persons or property; and in case of death from such injuries, the right of action shall survive, and the General Assembly shall prescribe for whose benefit such actions shall be prosecuted. No Act shall prescribe any limitations of time within which suits may be brought against corporations for injuries to persons or property, or for other causes, different from those fixed by general laws regulating actions against natural persons; and such Acts now existing are avoided."

This clause of the Constitution first came up for consideration in connection with the Act of 1868, in Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 21. It was there held, Mr. Justice Trunkey dissenting, that the Act of 1868 was not avoided by the above recited clause in the Constitution. The writer of this delivered the opinion in that case. It was followed by Lewis v. Hollahan, 108 Pa. 425, where it was said by Mr. Justice Sterrett:

"The case of Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Langdon, cited and relied on by the plaintiff in error, was well decided on other controlling questions; but we do not see our way clear to follow it as authority on the precise constitutional question involved in this case. One of the questions in that case was as to the acceptance by the company of the Act of 1868. In this case the question does not arise."

There was no dissent in that case. In a subsequent case—Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company v. Conway, 8 Cent. Rep. 244, 112 Pa. 51—there was an attempt to raise the same question on the part of the above named railroad company. There was no proof on the trial below that the company had accepted the provisions of the Act of 1868, and that case was decided upon other grounds. In delivering the opinion of the court I said:

"It may not be out of place just here to correct a misapprehension of the learned Judge below in regard to Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Langdon. That case has not been overruled, as he supposes. Some of the reasoning by which it was supported is not sustained by the late case of Lewis v. Hollahan; and as my brethren are wiser than myself I cheerfully submit to their views. Moreover, if, when the main question comes up again, Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Langdon shall be found to be a mistake, it will afford me pleasure to join in overruling it."

This was our latest deliverance upon this subject. The broad question is now fairly presented again. We have been aided by an exceptionally able argument, and it is fitting that we should now review our former ruling, and if necessary, correct it. I am free to say that my own views upon this question have undergone a serious change.

The first thought which an examination of it suggests is the effect of the acceptance by the defendant company of the Act of 1868. If it was a contract with the State, based upon a sufficient consideration, and a contract which the State had the power to make, there would be room for the argument that it came within the principle of the well known line of cases commencing with Dartmouth College. The Act of 1868, however, was not a part of the original charter of the company; its road was not constructed, nor was a dollar expended upon the faith of it. So far as appears by this record no consideration was paid for it. It was an additional franchise or right which the State granted to the company, and which does not necessarily involve a contract.

At common law a promise without consideration is not binding; so, I apprehend, a franchise granted without a consideration moving from the grantees of such franchise, is not binding upon the State. The rule as laid down in 2 Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 1050, is as follows: "A franchise is a mere legal right or privilege and may result from a simple legislative enactment without any contract between the State and the possessors of the privilege. There is a plain distinction between a simple legislative enactment that a person or association shall be authorized to exercise certain rights or powers, and a contract or treaty made by the State through its Legislature, that the person or associations shall be entitled to exercise the rights or powers. If a franchise is the result of a mere legislative enactment, it may be undoubtedly cut short by repeal of the enactment. If, however, the franchise is conferred by a contract or treaty on the part of the State, and is absolute in terms, it must be regarded as an irrevocable right."

Based upon the same common-law rule, that a promise without a consideration is not binding, a grant of exemption from taxation by the Legislature, unless based upon a consideration, does not bind the State, and property thus exempted by one Legislature may be taxed by the next. In the recent case of Philadelphia & Gray's Ferry Passenger Railway Company's Appeal, 109 Pa. 128, in which I had the honor to deliver the opinion of the court, the rule is thus stated: "There is reason and authority for holding that a supplement to a charter of incorporation, which merely confers upon it a new right, or enlarges an old one, without imposing any new or additional burden upon it, is a mere license or promise by the State, and may be revoked at pleasure. It is without consideration to support it, and cannot bind a subsequent Legislature. Johnson v. Orow, 87 Pa. 184; Christ Church v. Philadelphia County, 63 U. S. 24 How. 300 [16 L. ed. 602]. In the present age of corporate greed it would be dangerous to hold the contrary doctrine. Were we to do so, corporations, instead of being the creatures of the State, might become its masters."

In the same line are Tucker v. Ferguson, 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 574 [22 L. ed. 816]; West Wisconsin R. Co. v. Trempealeau County, 93 U. S. 595 [23 L. ed. 814]; East Saginaw Salt Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 373 [20 L. ed. 611]; Hewitt v. New York & O. M. R. Co. 12 Blatchf. 453.

The right to recover damages for acts of negligence resulting in death did not exist at common law. It was conferred by the Legislature, and the authority which gave it can take it away. It follows that it may limit it. The right of the Legislature to barter away this right to a corporation, or to limit it so as to make it a binding contract beyond the reach or power of subsequent Legislatures may well be doubted.

It was within the power of the Legislature at any time to repeal the Act of 1868. It follows that it came within the power of the constitutional repeal, and we are all of opinion that the provisions referred to of said Act are avoided by the present Constitution. I make no apology for my change of views. Had I adhered to those formerly expressed there might have been occasion for one.

Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Langdon, as was said by our Brother Sterrett in Lewis v. Hollahan, supra, was well decided on other controlling questions, and upon all of those questions it stands as authority. To the extent, however, that it refers to the effect of the present Constitution upon the Act of 1868 it is now overruled.

the trial in the superior court before Hammond, J., defendant was found guilty of an assault, and he thereupon alleged exceptions.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. John McIlvene for defendant.

Mr. Andrew J. Waterman, Atty-Gen., for the Commonwealth.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an indictment for robbery, in which the defendant has been found guilty of an assault. The evidence for the Commonwealth was that the defendant had bought clothes amounting to $21.55 of one Mitchelman, who called at the defendant's house by appointment, for his pay; that some discussion arose about the bill, and that the defendant went up stairs, brought down the clothes, placed them on a chair and put $20 on a table, and told Mitchelman that he could have the money or the clothes; that Mitchelman took the money and put it in his pocket and told the defendant he owed him $1.55, whereupon the defendant demanded his money back, and on Mitchelman refusing, attacked him, threw him on the floor and choked him until Mitchelman gave him a pocketbook containing $29.

The defendant's counsel denied the receiving of the pocketbook and said that he could show that the assault was justifiable under the circumstances of the case—as the defendant believed that he had a right to recover his own money by force, if necessary.

The presiding Justice stated that he should be obliged to rule that the defendant would not be justified in assaulting Mitchelman to get his own money, and that he should rule as follows: "If the jury are satisfied that the defendant choked and otherwise assaulted Mitchelman, they would be warranted in finding the defendant guilty, although the sole motive of the defendant was by his violence to get from Mitchelman, by force, money which the defendant honestly believed to be his own." Upon this the defendant saved his exceptions and declined to introduce evidence. The jury were instructed as stated, and found the defendant guilty.

On the evidence for the Commonwealth it appeared that the defendant offered the $20 to Mitchelman only on condition that Mitchelman should accept that sum as full payment of his disputed bill, and that Mitchelman took the money and at the same moment or just afterwards as part of the same transaction, repudiated the condition. If this was the case, since Mitchelman of course, whatever the sum due him, had no right to that particular money except on the conditions on which it was offered (Com. v. Stebbins, 8 Gray, 492), he took the money wrongfully from the possession of the defendant, or the jury might have found that he did, whether the true view be that the defendant did not give up possession, or that it was obtained from him by Mitchelman's fraud. Com. v. Deblin, 2 New Eng. Rep. 101, 141 Mass. 423; Chiffer's Case, Sir T. Raym. 275, 276; Reg. v. Thompson, Leigh & Cave, 235; Reg. v. Stanley, 12 Cox, C. C. 269; Reg. v. Rodway, 9 Car. & P. 784; Rez v. Williams, 4 Car. & P. 890; 2 East, P. C. chap. 16, §§ 110-113. See Reg. v. Cohen, 2 Den. C. C. 249, and cases infra.

The defendant made a demand, if that was necessary, which we do not imply, before using force. Green v. Goddard, 2 Salk. 641; Polkinhorn v. Wright, 8 Q. B. 197; Com. v. Clark, 2 Met. 23, 25, and cases infra.

It is settled by ancient and modern authority, that, under such circumstances, a man may defend or regain his momentarily interrupted possession, by the use of reasonable force, short of wounding or the employment of a dangerous weapon. Com. v. Lynn, 123 Mass. 218; Com. v. Kennard, 8 Pick. 183; Anderson v. State, 6 Baxter, 609; State v. Elliot, 11 N. H. 540, 545; Rez v. Milton, Mood. & M. 107; Y. B. 9 Edw. IV. 23, pl. 42; 19 Hen. VI. 31, pl. 59; 21 Hen. VI. 27, pl. 9. See Seaman v. Cuppledick, Owen, 150; Taylor v. Markham, Cro. Jac. 224; 8 C. Yelv. 157; 1 Brownlow, 215; Shingleton v. Smith, Lutw. 1431, 1433; 2 Inst. 316; Finch, Law, 203; 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 60, § 23; 8 Bl. Com. 121.

To this extent the right to protect one's possession has been regarded as an extension of the right to protect one's person, with which it is generally mentioned. Baldwin v. Hayden, 6 Conn. 453; Y. B. 19 Hen. VI. 31, pl. 59; Rogers v. Spencer, 18 Mees. & W. 579, 581; 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 60, § 23; 8 Bl. Com. 120, 131.

We need not consider whether this explanation is quite adequate. There are weighty decisions which go further than those above cited, and which hardly can stand on the right of self defense, but involve other considerations of policy. It has been held that even where a considerable time had elapsed between the wrongful taking of the defendant's property and the assault, the defendant had a right to regain possession by reasonable force, after demand upon the third person in possession in like manner as he might have protected it, without civil liability. Whatever the true rule may be,

Drake v. State, 5 Tex. App. 649; Hinchcliffe's Case, Lewin C. C. 161.

It extends to the defense and protection of property before taken, but not to its recovery after it is taken (1 Whart. Cr. Law, 8th ed. § 102); unless it can be retaken without undue violence. State v. Elliot, 11 N. H. 540.

The degree of force must not exceed the bounds of defense and prevention. Gallagher v. State, 3 Minn. 270; State v. Quin, 8 Brev. 515.

Degree of force employed.

The degree of force which may be used in the exercise of the right of defense of person or property depends on the circumstances of each case and the condition of both parties. People v. Doe, 1 Mich. 451; Patten v. People, 18 Mich. 314; Cotton v. State, 31 Miss. 504; Jackson v. State, Horr & T. 476; Oliver 2 L. R. A.

v. State, 17 Ala. 547; Com. v. Seibert, Horr. & T. 683.

An attack on property may be forcibly repelled, and the property may be rescued from another's hand. State v. Miller, 12 Vt. 437; Johnson v. Tompkins, Bald. 571; Com. v. Lakeman, 4 Cush. 607; Filkins v. People, 69 N. Y. 101; Harrington v. People, 6 Barb. 603.

The owner of property may retake it, but not with an excess of violence (Com. v. McFue, 16 Gray, 227; Overdeer v. Lewis, 1 Watts & S. 90); but in retaking stolen property the owner has no right to retake it by a breach of the peace. Henrix v. State, 50 Ala. 143; 2 Bush. Cr. Law, 6th ed. § 790, 791; 2 Russ. Cr. 9th ed. 233; Dosty, Cr. Law, § 145 c.

If a party vindicating his rights uses excessive force, he is guilty of an assault, otherwise not. Golden v. State, 1 S. C. 233; Glass v. O'Grady, 17 Up. Can. C. P. 233.

probably there is no difference in this respect between the civil and the criminal law. Blades v. Higgs, 10 C. B. N. S. 718; S. C. 12 C. B. N. S. 501; 13 C. B. N. S. 844; 11 H. L. Cas. 621; Com. v. McOue, 16 Gray, 226, 227.

The principle has been extended to a case where the defendant had yielded possession to the person assaulted, through the fraud of the latter. Hodgden v. Hubbard, 18 Vt. 504. See Johnson v. Perry, 56 Vt. 708.

On the other hand a distinction has been taken between the right to maintain possession and the right to regain it from another who is peaceably established in it, although the possession of the latter is wrongful. Bobb v. Bosworth, Litt. Sel. Cas. 81. See Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 240; Andre v. Johnson, 6 Blackf. 375; Davis v. Whitridge, 2 Strobb. L. 232; 3 Bl. Com. 4.

It is unnecessary to decide whether, in this case, if Mitchelman had taken the money with a fraudulent intent but had not repudiated the condition until afterwards, the defendant would have had any other remedy than to hold him to his bargain if he could, even if he knew that Mitchelman still had the identical money upon his person.

If the force used by the defendant was excessive the jury would have been warranted in finding him guilty. Whether it was excessive or not was a question for them; the judge could not rule that it was not, as matter of law. Com. v. Clark, 2 Met. 28.

Therefore, the instruction given to them, taken only literally, was correct. But the preliminary statement went further and was erroneous; and coupling that statement with the defendant's offer of proof and his course after the rulings, we think it fair to assume that the instruction was not understood to be limited, or indeed to be directed, to the case of excessive force, which, so far as appears, had not been mentioned; but that it was intended and understood to mean that any assault to regain his own money would warrant finding the defendant guilty. Therefore the exceptions must be sustained.

It will be seen that our decision is irrespective of the defendant's belief as to what he had a right to do. If the charge of robbery had been persisted in, and the difficulties which we have stated could have been got over, we might have had to consider cases like Reg. v. Boden, 1 Car. & K. 895, 897; Reg. v. Hemmings, 4 Fost. & F. 50; State v. Holyway, 41 Iowa, 200. Compare Com. v. Stobbins, supra; Com. v. McDuffy, 126 Mass. 467.

There is no question here of the effect of a reasonable but mistaken belief with regard to the facts. State v. Nash, 88 N. C. 618. The facts were as the defendant believed them to be.

Exceptions sustained.

Henry J. BARTLETT

v.

Anson G. STANCHFIELD.

(.....Mass.....)

A written contract for building a house, stipulating that no charge for extra work or materials shall be made, unless ordered in writing, will not prevent the contractor from recovering for extra expense incurred on the express agreement of the other party to pay for it, or on his request therefor, under circumstances implying a consent to be liable for it, irrespective of the written contract. Parties cannot, by contract, tie up their freedom of dealing with each other.

3 L. R. A.

(January 5, 1880.)

ON defendant's exceptions. Overruled.

The action was brought in the Superior Court of Suffolk County, before Blodgett, J., to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a building contract.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. B. Wadleigh for defendant.

Messrs. Morse & Allen for plaintiff.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented by the exceptions concerns the defendant's liability for extra work and materials furnished in connection with a house which the plaintiff had been building for the defendant under a written contract.

The contract contained the following clause:

"And it is further agreed that should the owner, during the progress of said construction, request any alteration of, addition to, deviation from or omissions concerning the construction of said houses, as set forth herein; and in said plans and specifications, the same shall be made by the said Bartlett, and shall in no way affect this agreement, but shall be added to or deducted from the amount thereof, by a fair and reasonable valuation; and that no charge shall be made for extra work or materials, unless the same is ordered in writing, and the price thereof agreed upon."

The plaintiff's evidence was that the blind drains—one item in question—were put in during the progress of the work, and that the defendant promised to pay for them; and that the other items—picture moldings, covers for trays and shelves—were furnished at the defendant's oral request, "after the completion of the house in conformity to the written contract."

The evidence was objected to, and the court was asked to rule that, as the work and materials were not ordered in writing, and no price was agreed upon, the plaintiff could not recover. To this it might be enough to answer that except as to the drains there was evidence that the work was done after the contract had been performed, and independent of it. But, under the instructions of the court, the jury probably found that the terms of the written contract, if applicable, had been waived, and that the items had been furnished under a substituted oral contract.

The main argument for the defendant is that, if the work fell within the provisions of the contract, there was no evidence of a waiver. We are of opinion that there was evidence for the jury. Attempts of parties to tie up by contract their freedom of dealing with each other are futile. The contract is a fact to be taken into account in interpreting the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff and defendant, no doubt. But it cannot be assumed, as matter of law, that the contract governed all that was done until it was renounced in so many words, because the parties had a right to renounce it in any way, and by any mode of expression, they saw fit. They could substitute a new oral contract by conduct and intimation, as well as by express words. 9

In deciding whether they had waived the terms of the written contract, the jury had a right to assume that both parties remembered it, and knew its legal meaning. On that assumption, the question of waiver was a question as to what the plaintiff fairly might have understood to be the meaning of the defendant's conduct. If the plaintiff had a right to understand that the defendant expressed a consent to be liable, irrespective of the written contract, and furnished the work and materials on that understanding, the defendant is bound. West v. Platt, 127 Mass. 867, 872; O'Donnell v. Clinton, 5 New Eng. Rep. 433, 145 Mass. 461, 463.

As to the drains, the evidence was that the defendant requested the plaintiff to build them, and promised to pay for them. The jury had a right to infer that the request and promise imported a renunciation of any terms in the written contract inconsistent with a duty to pay. As to the other items furnished later, it is stated that there was evidence tending to show that they were furnished at the defendant's own request; but it does not appear what the evidence was, or what were the circumstances or form of the request. So far as appears, certainly, the jury had a right to infer that the request imported a promise to pay, and a like substitution of an oral contract. The furnishing of the items was sufficient consideration for the substitution, as well as for the contract substituted.

Exceptions overruled.

The questions presented are stated in the opinion.

Mr. David D. Acker for appellant.

Mr. D. J. Dean for respondent.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the ordinance of the board of aldermen, under which the work of regulating, grading and paving Broadway was done, appeared on its face to be contrary to the law, and therefore to be void, this action to recover back the moneys paid by plaintiff should fail. This appears to be substantially conceded, as a proposition, by plaintiff's counsel, where, under his second point, that the payment was not voluntary, he says: "As a matter of law, the assessment being valid on its face, the payment was not voluntary."

As a matter of fact, the payment of the assessment in question was effected by the mortgagee of the property, who, upon making the mortgage loan, deducted its amount from the moneys payable to the plaintiff, and satisfied the lien of record. This fact, of course, frees the case from the element of a payment under duress of person or of goods, through the coercive action of the municipal authorities. The issue before the trial court was as to the legality of the assessment with respect to the ordering of the work, and the manner of its performance; and upon that point proof was had. The resolution or ordinance under which the work was done provided for "the same to be done in such manner as the said commissioner may deem expedient and for the best interests of the city and of the property owners."

It appears that the commissioner of public works, who was referred to, contracted in writing with one Tracy for the performance of the work at the price of upwards of $140,000; and it also appears that this contract was not made after any public advertisement for bids. But, for the purposes of this case, the sole question which we shall consider is whether this ordinance, on its face, carried notice of the illegality of the corporate Act—not whether matters of proof dehors the record otherwise established the invalidity of the assessment. If the ordinance was on its face void, then the plaintiff cannot plead her ignorance of the law in justification of the payment. The principle is elementary that a party cannot recover back money paid, upon the ground that he supposed he was bound in law to pay it.

The ordinance delegates to the commissioner of public works a discretion in the performance of the work which it orders done; for it reads that it is "to be done in such manner as the said commissioner shall deem expedient," etc.

In Re Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, 75 N. Y. 388, this court held that where an aggregate expenditure of more than $1,000 was involved in the completion of any particular work for the corporation, the same must be by contract, to be awarded to the lowest bidder, after advertisement for sealed proposals, unless otherwise ordered by a vote of three fourths of the members elected to the common council. This was deemed an imperative requirement of the law, under the provisions of section 91 of chapter 335 of the Laws of 1873; and as its provisions were embodied in the consolidation Act of 1882 (section 64), they are equally imperative here. In the case cited, Judge Rapallo said, with respect to words in the ordinance precisely similar to those quoted from this record, and which were there claimed to author-though the levy and tax were illegal. Lea v. Memphis, 9 Baxt. 103. It would be otherwise if payment were made after delinquency. Smith v. Farrelly, 52 Cal. 77; De Fremery v. Austin, 53 Cal. 380; Cooley, Taxn. 812.

Such a threat is idle and does not constitute coercion (Williams v. Corcoran, 46 Cal. 556); so of a threat to close up a shop if the tax was not paid (Vicksburg v. Butler, 56 Miss. 72); or to stop a hack. Jackson v. Newman, 59 Miss. 385.

Other instances of voluntary payment.

Where a court without authority made an order for the payment of a tax, and payment was made accordingly. Drake v. Shurtliff, 24 Hun, 422; Bailey v. Buell, 50 N. Y. 602.

A payment made to save property from being sold under an authority void on its face, and without possession or control of the property, is voluntary. Sonoma County Tax Case, 13 Fed. Rep. 738.

So is a payment made where the tax could only be enforced in judicial proceedings in which the party would have a right to be heard, but which are not yet taken. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Tappan, 16 Blatchf. 236.

A payment made before demand, or before any threat or step indicating an intention to levy under the warrant, is voluntary; it is not necessary to await an actual seizure. Ralsler v. Athens, 63 Ala. 193; Union Bank v. New York, 51 Barb. 159; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Dodge County, 98 U. S. 541 (26 L. ed. 193).

Where there is no legal duress of person or property, payment when made must be considered as voluntary, and, upon well settled principles, cannot be recovered. Bank of Woodland v. Webber, 52 Cal. 73; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 598; Wills v. Austin, 58 Cal. 153; Thomson v. Norris, 62 Ga. 538.

The fact that the collector's warrant is a lien on goods after it comes to his hands is not enough to make a payment to him compulsory. Chicago v. Fidelity Sav. Bank, 11 Ill. App. 163.

A mere agreement to pay, though made under duress, will not render the subsequent payment involuntary if no legal steps be taken to resist, and the payment is voluntary. Savannah v. Feeley, 66 Ga. 31.

Payment under protest; when deemed voluntary.

A protest cannot alone change what would otherwise be a voluntary payment into an involuntary payment or change the rights of the parties. Sonoma Co. Tax Case, 13 Fed. Rep. 731.

Payment before the tax becomes delinquent is voluntary, although accompanied by a protest. Merrill v. Austin, 53 Cal. 579.

The payment of an assessment which is illegal and void will be regarded as voluntary, and not recoverable back, even if paid under protest after a threatened sale. De Baker v. Carillo, 52 Cal. 473; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 593.

Where the owner tendered the treasurer all the taxes legally due, except a certain assessment on a city lot, which tender the treasurer refused to accept, and to prevent a sale, and under protest he paid the assessment and also the taxes, it was held the payment was voluntary. Stephan v. Daniels, 27 Ohio St. 527.

Where a town offers a discount to those who make payment promptly, a payment made to obtain this discount has been held to be voluntary, though made under protest (Lee v. Templeton, 13 Gray, 478; Cooley, Taxn. 812); so where on the day fixed for the sale of his property for the illegal tax, he proposed to make payment on the next day if the sale should be postponed. Gachet v. McCall, 50 Ala. 307.

But if the payment is caused on the one part by an illegal demand and made on the other part reluctantly and in consequence of that illegality, and without being able to regain or retain possession of the property except by submitting to the payment, it is not voluntary. Sowles v. Soule, 8 New Eng. Rep. 522, 59 Vt. 131; Maxwell v. Griswold, 51 U. S. 10 How. 242 (13 L. ed. 405); Harmony v. Birmingham, 12 N. Y. 99; Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 915.

ize the commissioner of public works to do the work without contract.

"Assuming that the power intended to be given to the commissioner by this clause related to the manner of employing the persons to do the work, and to the purchase of the supplies necessary therefor, and not merely to the mode in which the work should be performed, we think that it was ineffectual to dispense with the provisions of the charter requiring advertisement for sealed proposals, and a contract with the lowest bidder. The law confers upon the common council the power and duty of deciding in each particular case whether those provisions shall be dispensed with, and requires a vote of three fourths of all the members elected, to accomplish that purpose. This is eminently a discretionary power, which cannot be delegated. It is their judgment which the law requires, and not that of any officer they may designate. There is no provision in the law itself authorizing them to delegate this power, and the case falls within the settled principle that powers of this description, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, cannot be delegated—a principle which applies to public bodies and officers as well as to private individuals."

The reasoning of the learned Judge is conclusive. In his opinion, what was there left to the commissioner's discretion was the mode in which the work should be performed, and not merely the manner of employing persons to do the work, or of the purchase of necessary supplies.

We think that the Legislature in conferring the exercise of a power sovereign in its attributes, as is the power to tax or assess, upon the common council, must be held to have confined its exercise exclusively to that body as such. The common council is a representative body of the taxpayers, and it would not do to hold that the power to take or to burden the property of citizens might be exercised by others than by those to whom the power was given. In this case the mode of performance of an important and expensive work was, by the language of the ordinance, left to the sole discretion of the commissioner of public works, where it was the imperative duty of the common council to provide specifically as to how it should be done. They might direct the work to be done otherwise than by contract; but the exercise of that discretion was carefully provided for in a certain manner. The law intended that the expense of doing work for the corporation, where it would exceed $1,000, should only be incurred after public competition for the contract. It intended that the common council should determine whether the expense should be incurred through a contract or otherwise, and it never intended that the determination, which it indeed commanded they should make, should be left to an officer. This they had no power to do.

This court has in the past, as recently, considered the question of what is a delegation of power, and a consequent violation of the law by the common council.

In Thompson v. Schermerhorn, 6 N. Y. 92, their ordinance provided for the work in pitching and flagging a street, to be done "in such manner as the city superintendent, under the direction of the committee on roads of the common council, shall direct and require." It was held that it was contrary to law, for failing to specify the manner in which the improvement was to be made; and this court affirmed the judgment against the city.

In Re Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, which we have quoted from, the assessment was avoided, and Thompson v. Schermerhorn, is cited, as is the case of Birdsall v. Clark, 78 N. Y. 73, where the question was whether a general resolution, directing the superintendent of streets, where the owner neglected to do the work by the time limited, "to cause the same to be done," was a proper exercise of the power conferred upon the common council. It was held not to be, for the reason that the power conferred by the charter to cause work to be done by contract or otherwise involved the exercise of a discretion as to the manner of its performance, which was vested solely in the common council.

Then, in Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183—an action to vacate an assessment on lands, and to restrain collection—this court affirmed a judgment for the defendants, on the ground that the Acts under which the assessment was laid were unconstitutional and void; and hence no assessment laid under them could be a cloud upon title to land.

In Wells v. Buffalo, 80 N. Y. 253—a similar action to the last—it was held that the complaint was properly dismissed, Rapallo, J., saying: "If the Act is unconstitutional, no assessment imposed under it could be a cloud upon the plaintiff's title. It is void upon its face."

It should be a logical conclusion from the authorities and from the reasoning upon the case, that where the ordinance directing an assessment is essentially illegal, as violating in its provisions the statutory power conferred upon the common council, the payment of an assessment imposed for the expense incurred under its authority is a mistake of law, and in such a case relief cannot be granted. Nothing in the argument advanced by the appellant militates against this view. She was under no compulsion to pay the assessment, for there was concededly no duress of person or goods, and the payment was not forced by warrant or seizure. We do not understand that the rule goes further in its authority to permit of a recovery back of moneys paid under a tax or assessment than in a case where its payment, being compelled by an actual or threatened seizure of his person or deprivation of his goods, he asserts by action, and successfully maintains its illegality. If the tax or assessment is patently illegal, and its payment is coerced, an action, on the equity side of the court, to have it declared void, and the moneys paid returned, would be a proper form of remedy; but, lacking the element of coercion in the form of a duress of person or property, payment must be held to be voluntary.

The court below thought the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations. We have had occasion to review the question raised by the defense of the statute in such cases, in the case decided in November Term of Friend v. New York, 111 N. Y. 331, and it is unnecessary to discuss it in this case.

The order of the General Term reversing the judgment of the Special Term should be affirmed on the grounds stated in this opinion, and judgment absolute ordered for the defendants on the stipulation, with costs.
All concur.

Turner, McClure & Rolston, for appellants.

Messrs. Robert D. Benedict and Enos N. Taft for respondent.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1877, upon the termination of a lease, given originally in 1834 by the plaintiffs' ancestors to the defendant's assignors, of lands lying on the East River in the City of New York, upon which was a wharf and a bulkhead, the assignees of the original lease surrendered to the plaintiffs the demised premises, with the exception of an easement of access over the water of the harbor pertaining to the wharf. The property thus surrendered was then found by the plaintiffs to be substantially excluded from communication with the harbor by a pier attached to the wharf, thirty-five feet in breadth and upwards of 800 feet in length, extending into the river, and together with the space occupied by vessels and water crafts lying at the pier for commercial and traffic purposes, effectually obstructing access to and egress from the water side, and substantially destroying its value as a wharf.

This action was brought after the expiration of the lease, against its assignees to recover possession of said pier and the waterways appurtenant to the wharf, and to obtain an accounting of rents, income and profits arising from the use of said pier subsequent to the expiration of the lease. The defendant resists the action upon the alleged ground that it is the lawful owner of the pier.

The case presents the question whether the lessees of wharf rights upon navigable waters in New York Harbor can as against their lessors during the existence of a lease acquire absolute right to occupy by a permanent structure the waters in front of said wharf to the destruction of their value and usefulness, without the consent and in defiance of the will of their lessors, and, if they can, whether they have done so in this case.

The questions involved, although treated generally by the trial court as questions of fact, depend mainly, if not altogether, upon the effect of statutes and ordinances relating to the subject, and the construction of certain conveyances and leases, and the rights, duties and disabilities of the respective parties thereunder. We have been unable to discover any question of fact depending upon conflicting evidence in the case, and, indeed, the testimony is quite undisputed and leaves the questions therein to be determined mainly by the court as those of law and not of fact.

Exceptions to alleged findings of fact, when they are supported by evidence, and to the refusals to find, when they are established by undisputed proof, present questions of law reviewable in this court. There are several of such exceptions which will appear from the views we shall have occasion to express in the case, and they need not be more particularly referred to here.

The undisputed evidence, both documentary and oral, shows that Henry Rutgers and his ancestors had for upwards of three quarters of a century, previous to 1806, owned and occupied a parcel of land in said city lying upon tide water in the East River, between Clinton and Montgomery Streets, bounded on the south by high-water mark in the East River. Rutgers had, before 1806, succeeded to the ownership of this land, and, in that year obtained from the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of New York, under chapter 80 of the Laws of 1798, authorizing the granting of land on and in the East River for the purpose of building a street and bulkhead which should constitute an extension line on the harbor, a conveyance in the following language: "A certain lot, piece or parcel of ground between high and low-water mark, situate, lying and being between Clinton Street and Montgomery Street in the seventh ward of the City of New York opposite to that part of the ground belonging to the said Henry Rutgers, distinguished by lot number 653, containing in depth on the west side ninety-four feet, and on the east side sixty-eight feet, and in front, on the East River or harbor of the said city, ninety-two feet and six inches; bounded southerly in front by the East River or harbor of the said city; northerly in the rear by the said lot of ground No. 653, belonging to the said Henry Rutgers, together with all and singular the easements, profits, commodities, advantages, emoluments, hereditaments and appurtenances to the said lots, pieces or parcels of ground, and premises above mentioned, belonging or in any wise appertaining unto the said Henry Rutgers, his heirs and assigns, to the only proper use, benefit and behoof of them, the said Henry Rutgers, his heirs and assigns forever."

In consideration of this conveyance Rutgers covenanted to build, erect and make, at his own cost and expense, "a good, sufficient and firm wharf, pier or street of seventy feet, English measure, in breadth on the south side of the first described lot of ground, number 653, hereby granted, contiguous to the East River or harbor of the said city, and distinguished in the map or plan hereto annexed by Front Street," and that he would forever thereafter keep and maintain said wharves, piers and streets in good repair and condition, and for the free and common passage of the inhabitants of said city. The city covenanted that it had full power and lawful authority to convey said premises and warranted the peaceable and quiet possession in the said Rutgers, his heirs and assigns forever thereafter.

It further appeared that at some time thereafter, but at what precise time is not clearly shown, the said street, wharf and bulkhead were constructed, and the said Rutgers was in possession thereof, collecting the wharfage accruing thereat.

It further appeared that the wharf and bulkhead connected with said street, as built, extended some sixteen feet into the harbor beyond the southerly line of a seventy foot street. The actual location of the line seems to have been acquiesced in by all parties, and has for a period of over fifty years constituted the southerly extension line of the city at the place indicated, under the name of Front Street—it having been changed from South Street at an early period.

Henry Rutgers having died, his executors, in 1834, under power contained in his will, executed and delivered to Jonathan D. Stevenson 2 L. R. A.

and Nathaniel Pearce a lease of the said premises, "together with all and singular the easements, profits, commodities, emoluments, rights and appurtenances whatsoever to the premises above described, and every part thereof belonging or in any wise appertaining, and particularly the wharf and water privileges to the extent of the rights of said parties of the first part" for the term of twenty-one years, with a covenant for the renewal thereof for the further term of twenty-one years, upon terms which were to be fixed by a certain rate of interest to be computed upon a valuation by appraisers of the demised premises, exclusive of the erections thereon, and which renewal was duly executed by the assignees of said lessors in 1857. The said lessees immediately thereafter entered into possession of said demised premises, and either themselves or by their assignees have ever since continued to occupy and enjoy them under said lease until the termination thereof.

On November 30, 1838, at the request of the said lessees, the mayor and common council authorized by resolution a pier to be built, under the direction of the street commissioner, in the slip between Clinton and Montgomery Streets at the expense of the owners on the said slip, to be thirty feet wide and to extend from South Street into the East River 243 feet, distant 140 feet from the pier at Clinton Street, and required the said street commissioner to give due publication of said resolution in the daily newspapers. This resolution located the proposed pier wholly upon and near the center of the bulkhead constituting the southerly boundary of lot number 653 as extended by the grant hereinbefore referred to. Notice of the resolution was published in the city daily newspapers for a period of six weeks successively.

Within two weeks after the commencement of said publication, said lessees addressed and delivered a communication to the street commissioner to the following effect, viz.:

The undersigned lessees, having the same rights and privileges as the owners of the soil to the bulkhead between Clinton and Montgomery Streets, adjoining the contemplated pier ordered to be built between the said streets, do hereby signify their willingness to build said pier at their own expense, according to the ordinance of the common council.

J. D. Stevenson,
N. Pearce.

New York, December 12, 1838.

No other application was presented for the building of said pier, and on the 23d day of January, 1839, the street commissioner gave to said Stevenson and Pearce an instrument reading as follows:

"Permission is hereby given to Jonathan D. Stevenson and Nathaniel Pearce to build a pier in the slip between Clinton and Montgomery Streets, said pier to be thirty feet wide, and to extend from South Street 243 feet into East River, distant 140 feet from the pier at Clinton Street, the pier to be built at their expense and for their benefit."

The said Pearce soon thereafter, having acquired by assignment the rights of his co-lessee, Stevenson, constructed said pier of the width of thirty-five feet, at an expense of about $12.-

000. In November, 1840, Pearce, to satisfy the doubts of certain persons as to the power of the street commissioner under the statute to give the permission referred to, requested the mayor and common council to confirm the same, and thereupon a resolution was adopted, which was approved by the mayor April 10, 1841, to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the permission given by the street commissioner to J. D. Stevenson and N. Pearce to build a pier into the East River between Clinton and Montgomery Streets be confirmed subject to such authority and directions in relation to the said pier as the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the City of New York may exercise according to the laws of this State and the ordinances of the said corporation, and subject also to any and all such rights, if any, which the owners of the fee may at any time have in or to the same."

In May, 1844, further permission was given by said city authorities to Pearce to extend said pier seventy feet further into the river, at his own expense, and an extension of eighty-seven feet was soon afterwards made thereto by Pearce. Prior to 1848, and during his occupation of said pier, Pearce twice mortgaged it as security for loans made by him, and in 1846 conveyed to Algernon S. Jarvis, by assignment, an undivided half of all of the property held by him under the lease from Rutgers' executors.

In 1848 Pearce and Jarvis executed and delivered to the defendant herein a conveyance of the interest in the bulkhead and water privileges in front of the premises acquired under the lease from Rutgers' executors; and also by a separate conveyance, at the same time, granted, bargained and sold to the said defendant by warranty deed the said pier with its appurtenances.

Upon the trial before the court, without a jury, the complaint was dismissed, and the judgment entered thereon for the defendant was, upon appeal, affirmed by the general term.

The rights of the city in the lands under water around the Island of Manhattan from high-water mark to 400 feet beyond low-water mark were acquired, at an early period through the Dongan and Montgomery Charters, from the Crown of England, and the grants therein contained have been ratified and confirmed by numerous conveyances from the State and Acts of the Legislature since the separation of the Colonies from the English Crown. These grants were obviously made to extend municipal control over said lands and enable the city to regulate the erection of necessary structures upon the land under water around the island with a view of promoting the facilities for the accommodation of the growing commerce and trade of the Port of New York, and to regulate and preserve the rights of riparian owners in such lands and the navigable waters covering them.

The extent of the interest and authority of the city over such lands has been the subject of much controversy, and divers views have been expressed thereon by various judges from the earliest times. It has been sometimes said that the ownership of the fee in such lands gave the city, as matter of legal right, authority to erect and build such structures thereon as they saw fit to make.

3 L. R. A.

We are inclined to think that this proposition to its full extent cannot be maintained. The right of control over the navigable waters of the State is a legislative power and cannot be destroyed by any authority whatever. The right of the people to use the natural public highways of the State is jus publica, and cannot be taken away or seriously impaired by any legislation whatever. Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 477; Ledyard v. Ten Eyck, 36 Barb. 102.

The power of regulating, controlling and improving such waters in the interest of commerce undoubtedly exists. The right, therefore, of the city to erect structures in the navigable waters of the State must necessarily remain subject to the sovereign authority over such highways.

These propositions are quite apparent from the course of legislation on the subject. One of the earliest, if not the first, Act on the subject, is chapter 88, Laws of 1787, which provided, among other things, that the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of New York should have authority to make by-laws, rules and ordinances for the better regulating and altering the streets, wharfs and slips in such manner as shall be most commodious for shipping and transportation.

A clear view, however, of the general condition of the law with reference to these rights and the difficulties and controversies which have arisen over them, may be obtained by a brief synopsis of the provisions of the Act of 1798, one of the earliest statutes on the subject, and the petition of the city upon which it was founded. That petition states in substance that "as well for the ornament and improvement of the city as for the encouragement of the trade and commerce of the State, and the safety of the shipping at the wharfs of the city, your petitioners have lately directed a permanent street of seventy feet wide to be laid out and completed at and on the extremity of the grants already made and hereafter to be made to individuals on the East River, called South Street, and on the North or Hudson River called West Street, south and west of which streets no buildings of any description are to be permitted to be erected, so that vessels lying at the wharves may be secured from fires." That by reason of the curving and otherwise irregular state of the shore at low-water mark in the East and North Rivers, at the time of the making of the grants by the predecessors of your petitioners, a general map of which, if ever made, cannot now be found, the grants heretofore made are deemed to extend to unequal distances into both rivers, which occasions difficulties in making the permanent streets aforesaid regular, and that in many instances, although your petitioners are willing gratuitously to give the soil under water, on which those streets of seventy feet wide are to be made, yet doubts are entertained whether your petitioners can compel any of the proprietors of lots fronting thereon, and who may be unwilling, to make those streets for public use in any given reasonable time to be appointed by the common council.

And your petitioners further show that part of their plan aforesaid was to extend piers at right angles from the said permanent streets into the rivers at proper distance from each other to be determined by the corporation, with suitable bridges, for the accommodation of sea vessels, and so constructed as to admit the currents at both ebb and flood in both rivers, to wash away all dirt and filth from the wharfs and thereby render the health of the inhabitants of the city more safe and secure; but doubts have also arisen whether your petitioners can compel the individual proprietors of the wharfs to sink and lay out those piers; or if they shall refuse, whether your petitioners will be authorized to sink and build those piers at the expense of the city and receive the wharfage, without incurring a breach of the conditions and covenants contained in their grants to individuals.

The petition thereupon invoked the aid of the Legislature to provide by appropriate legislation for the difficulties suggested.

The preamble in the Act substantially recited the contents of the petition and for the purpose of obviating the difficulty referred to, enacted, by section 1, in substance, that the city should have authority to lay out the streets and wharfs mentioned in the preamble and to extend the same along the sides of said rivers as the growth of the city should require.

Section 2 provided that said streets and wharfs should be made and completed according to the said plan by and at the expense of the proprietors of land adjoining in proportion to the breadth of their several lots on the river, by certain days to be appointed, and that the respective proprietors of such of said lots as may not adjoin said streets or wharfs, shall also fill up and level at their own expense the spaces lying between their said several lots and the said streets and wharfs, and shall upon so filling up and leveling the same be respectively entitled to and become the owners of the intermediate spaces of ground in fee simple.

Section 3 provided that the mayor, aldermen and commonalty should be authorized, in case of the neglect or refusal of the proprietors to level and fill up such places, to do the same for them and charge to and collect from such owners the cost of such filling.

Section 4 provided that the sums expended by the city should be assessed upon said owners and occupants and be a lien and incumbrance, superior to any other incumbrance, upon the houses and lots in respect to which said assessment shall have been made.

Section 5 provided that it should be lawful for the city authorities to direct piers to be sunk and completed, in front of such streets and wharves, and at such distances from each other, as they should think proper, at the expense of the proprietors of lots lying opposite to such piers; and if such proprietors should neglect or refuse to sink or make said piers by the time appointed, then it should be lawful for the mayor, aldermen and commonalty to sink and make said piers and bridges at their own expense, and to receive for their own use the wharfage accruing thereat. Section 6 preserved the validity of the clauses, covenants and conditions of previous grants made by the city to individuals; and section 7 enacted "that no building of any kind or description whatsoever (other than the said piers and bridges) shall at any time hereafter be erected upon the said streets or wharfs, or between them respectively and the rivers to which they respectively shall front and adjoin."

These are all of the provisions of that Act which it is material to notice.

Subsequently, and prior to 1807, other Acts were passed to the same general effect as that of 1798 (sections 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7), viz.: chapter 129 of the Laws of 1801, and sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 of chapter 126 of the Laws of 1806. The Act of 1806, for the first time, so far as we have discovered, provided that in the case of piers ordered to be sunk by the corporation, if the adjoining owners should neglect or refuse to sink or build the same, the privilege of so doing might be granted by the city to other individuals.

Other Acts bearing upon this subject were subsequently passed by the Legislature, the most complete and comprehensive of which is undoubtedly that of chapter 86, called the Revised Act of 1813, and consisting principally of a re-enactment of the provisions of previous statutes. Sections 220 to 227 refer to the subject.

It is unnecessary, for the purposes of this discussion, to refer particularly to the provisions of this Act, or the other Acts referred to, as they all aim to preserve the pre-emptive rights of the littoral owners to grants of rights and privileges in land under water, which should thereafter be made by the city, and make the authority of the city to confer such rights upon others, depend upon the neglect and refusal of the riparian owners, after due notice, to comply with the terms lawfully prescribed by the city as the conditions of the grants.

The provision forbidding the erection of any structure or building between the wharves and the rivers, except piers and bridges, is carefully repealed in each successive statute.

It seems very clear, from the provisions referred to, that the authority given to the city to grant rights under water in the harbor to others than the littoral owners, on certain conditions, by necessary implication inhibits the granting of such rights to others, except upon compliance with the conditions annexed to the exercise of such authority.

Neither do we entertain any doubt as to the power of the authorities of New York to grant the privilege of constructing piers in front of the wharves and bulkheads thereafter made, to others than the owners of such structures, provided they comply with the conditions prescribed by the Act. All conveyances made after that Act by the city must be deemed to have been taken subject to its provisions, among which was the right in the city to construct such piers on conditions. It is therefore quite unnecessary to inquire what the common-law rights of littoral owners in waters adjoining their lands may be, as in this case those rights are carefully defined and protected by the statutes.

These statutes and many subsequently passed (1 Rev. Stat. 7th ed. 572-574), show a uniform policy on the part of the State to secure to the owners of lands on the harbor a pre-emptive right to the advantages and emoluments to be derived from the ownership and possession of lands having a water front, however much the shore line of such harbor may be varied or changed by the needs of the city, or from other causes. In obedience to the requirements of these provisions when the city, previous to 1806, determined to establish an extension line on the East River between Clinton and Montgomery Streets and to fill up the intervening space to high-water mark, it proposed to the littoral owners not only to grant the land under water for a street and wharf, but also the intervening land necessary to connect their existing possessions with the water fronts to be constructed by them.

Some question has been made over the quantity of land covered by the description in the deed from the city to Rutgers; but we are of the opinion that, reasonably interpreted, it gave to the grantee all of the land between low and high-water mark necessary to establish a street and wharf in the harbor and was not necessarily restricted by the distances mentioned therein. The rule that courses and distances in the description of a deed must yield to natural or artificial monuments if necessary to cover the lands plainly intended to be conveyed, is elementary and needs no citation to support it.

The terms of the grant expressly conveyed land lying between high and low-water mark extending from the grantee's land on the north to the harbor on the south. The plain purpose of the grant was, among other things, to enable the grantee to construct a wharf on the land granted accessible at all times from such harbor, and which should form the extreme southerly line of the city at that place. The deed provided that the wharf, pier or street to be built should be seventy feet wide on the south side of the granted lands, and should be contiguous to the harbor, and precluded by necessary implication the idea that any land was to be reserved by the city whose use could be made to interfere with the enjoyment of the wharf to be constructed by the grantee. Not only this, but it was the uniform expression of the statutes referred to that after the construction of the streets and wharves therein provided for, "that no building of any kind (other than the said piers and bridges) should at any time thereafter be erected between said streets or wharves, and the rivers to which they respectively shall adjoin."

The wharf and street in question were built by Henry Rutgers in pursuance of such grant and under the direction and supervision of the city authorities and presumably according to their instruction; and there is nothing in the description of the deed which restricted the location of the wharf, except that it should be on the southerly side of the grant, contiguous to the harbor, and connected with the street in such manner that the free and common passage of all persons thereon should be assured as upon other public streets of such city. Henry Rutgers and his heirs and devisees have now been in the possession of the wharf, as originally built, either personally or through their tenants, for upwards of half a century; and its ownership has never been questioned by the city or by anyone having the right to challenge the title acquired by them. It is too late, therefore, for anyone to dispute their title to the bulkhead and wharf, and least of all those who have occupied it as tenants under them.

It becomes material, therefore, to consider what rights the executors of Henry Rutgers had in the premises in question at the time of the demise, and what property the lessees received and enjoyed under such lease. The title of the lessors and their grantees to the upland, and the fee of the street, is not questioned. They also had, as we have seen, the title to all lands lying between their original possession and the wharf, with such water rights as pertained to its ownership, together with a pre-emptive right to any further grant of privileges by the city in the lands under water, lying in front of such premises. As the grantees of a wharf from the city they acquired, not only the right to collect wharfage thereat, but also the right of unobstructed access thereto, over the waters of the harbor, as well as the pre-emptive right to acquire the ownership of all piers or bridges thereafter required by the city to be built in front of such premises. Verplanck v. New York, 2 Edw. Ch. 220.

These questions we conceive to have been decided in the case of Langdon v. New York, 98 N. Y. 129. That case determined, among other things, that "A grant of the right of wharfage, at a wharf adjoining land under water belonging to the grantor, carries with it, as a necessary incident and appurtenance, and as a part of the grant, a right of way or access to the wharf for vessels over such adjacent lands." And it was further said in the same case that "A grant of the right to build and forever maintain a wharf upon the land of the city, would upon the same principle carry with it the right to take the wharfage and have access to the wharf." It was also held that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action to recover damages from the city, for filling up and making land upon its own property in front of the plaintiff's wharf.

The principle involved was confirmed in the subsequent cases of Williams v. New York, 7 Cent. Rep. 801, 105 N. Y. 420, 7 N. Y. S. R. 529, and Kingsland v. New York, 110 N. Y. 569, 18 N. Y. S. R. 701, and would seem to be too well settled in this court to admit of further controversy.

The beneficial use and enjoyment of all the rights and privileges possessed by the heirs and devisees of Henry Rutgers, in the demised premises for the term provided for, passed to the lessees under the lease from his executors. They thereby acquired the right, not only to the use and enjoyment of the premises demised, and of all easements connected therewith, but also the right to make all such erections and improvements thereon and additions thereto, as should contribute to their profitable employment, which were not prohibited by the terms of the lease, and did not constitute waste. Taylor, Landlord & Tenant, § 178.

They could lawfully make new erections upon the lands demised or additions to those already there; they could extend and improve the wharf so as to increase its facilities, or build a pier attached thereto (provided they obtained consent of the city therefor), and occupy and enjoy its use during the term of their tenancy, and if it was a fixture for trade purposes, and did not constitute waste, could tear it down and remove it at any time before the expiration of their term, provided they surrendered the premises in as good condition as they were when originally leased. Johnson v. Brownson, 7 Johns. 227; Bradstreet v. Pratt, 17 Wend. 44; Livingston v. Reynolds, 2 Hill, 157.

The covenants of quiet enjoyment in the lease precluded the lessors from entering upon the demised premises during the term for the purpose of making erections or alterations thereon which should impair or interfere with the full enjoyment thereof by the lessees, and they equally precluded them from disturbing or preventing the tenants from erecting any structures thereon which would conduce to their more profitable employment during the existence of the tenancy, provided such tenants should deem it desirable to build, and acquired authority from the city to do so. Heermance v. Vernoy, 6 Johns. 5; Blake v. Jerome, 14 Johns. 406; Dixon v. Clair, 24 Wend. 188; Agate v. Lovenbein, 57 N. Y. 604.

It would seem, therefore, that no act was done by the tenants during the term of the lease which gave the landlord a right of re-entry as for a forfeiture, or that constituted a breach of the lease giving a cause of action to the lessors. The tenant could lawfully adapt the premises to the purpose of securing the most profitable use of them not inconsistent with the terms of the lease, and the landlord had no right or power of interference therewith. Austin v. Hudson River R. Co. 25 N. Y. 334.

It cannot be questioned but that the erection of a pier thirty-five feet wide, occupying over a third of the wharf extending from it over the water for upwards of 300 feet, would constitute a very serious interference with the estate demised, if not occupied by the tenants, or but that, on the other hand, it would create an important extension of wharf rights, and a valuable addition thereto if possessed by those who had the right of using the wharf. The landlord had no right to build it, and was under no legal obligation to do so during the term of the tenancy; and the tenants did have that right, and could occupy it during their terms as the owners pro hac vice and the wharf adjacent thereto.

The general rule of law is that whatever is fixed by the tenant to the freehold becomes a part of it and is subjected to the same rights of property as the land (Taylor, Landlord & Tenant, § 525); but it is unnecessary, perhaps, to determine whether this pier, when erected and attached to the demised premises, became a fixture and was irremovable, or was simply a structure built for trade purposes and therefore movable during the term, inasmuch as it was upon the demised premises and was not so removed upon surrender, and therefore reverted to the landlord as part of the premises. The surrender of the leased premises by the assignors by operation of law vested the landlord with the title of any structures remaining thereon. Agate v. Lovenbein, 57 N. Y. 607.

The application of the rule expressed in the maxim, Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit (Wharton, Maxims, 78), to this pier if located upon the land demised, would seem to be unquestionable; and we can see no distinction between that case and one where it is immovably annexed to such land and occupies the place of an easement appurtenant thereto.

It is said in Wood's Landlord and Tenant

(§ 179) that if the tenant "incloses land, whether adjacent to or in the vicinity of the demised premises, and whether the land be part of the waste or of the highway or belongs to the landlord or some third person, the presumption at the end of the term is that the inclosure is part of the holding and was made for the benefit of the landlord."

This rule was applied in the case of Dempsey v. Kipp, 61 N. Y. 470, to a private way procured by one Leddick, a tenant, for the benefit of a farm occupied by him as such tenant. It was said by Dwight, Commissioner, "As soon as Leddick acquired the right, it inured to the landlord's benefit. It is settled law that all that the tenant thus acquires from third persons appertains to the landlord. The rule is applied even to encroachments made by him upon the lands of others; a fortiori would it be applicable where the acquisition is made by consent or through contract with the owner of adjoining lands."

After referring to some English cases on the subject, he continues: "These cases establish the doctrine that a tenant, even from year to year, has a capacity to acquire a permanent interest in adjacent lands belonging to third persons for the use of the leased property, which shall inure to his own benefit while the tenancy continues and on its expiration shall appertain to his landlord. There appears to be no difference in principle whether the acquisition is made by prescription or by contract. The tenant's intent is the main subject of inquiry. In the case at bar the intent of both parties, as has already been shown, is plain."

Speaking of the rule that a tenant shall not dispute the title of his landlord to demised premises, Washburn on Real Property (p. 438) says: "Cases have arisen where the doctrine above stated has been applied to lands in possession of a tenant in favor of a landlord, although the same were not embraced in the terms of his lease."

We have no doubt but that the rule referred to, so far as it applies to this case, is founded upon correct principles, and when applied to property acquired by a tenant for the more profitable employment of the demised premises, physically connected therewith and essential to their enjoyment, is fully justified by the reason of the rule and the justice of the case.

We could not conceive of a case calling more strongly for the enforcement of the rule than the one under consideration. Here the inclosure was simply an extension of the water front originally demised, and cannot be used except in connection with the wharf and bulkhead to which it was attached. It cannot even be maintained separately except by the substantial destruction for commercial purposes of the demised property. The statute requires such piers to be attached to bulkheads, and they could not have been lawfully constructed but for this connection, and cannot be maintained as a pier without it. It is impossible that any interest in regard to its use could be entertained by anyone, except as an appurtenance to the property in the mainland; and the finding to a contrary effect was unwarranted by the evidence and the plain implication of the law authorizing the construction of the pier.

The opinion expressed in some of the cases that the intent of the tenant in making an inclosure or acquisition must govern, was used in cases where the acquisition was made of lands lying outside the demised premises. It can have no application to an erection or inclosure made upon the demised premises, or on an appurtenance thereof. In such a case the intent is a question of law. Moreover, such intent, we think, is conclusively shown by the proceedings through which permission to build the pier was acquired.

In the consideration of this question we must look at the proposal of the lessees as well as the resolution of the mayor and common council accepting the same, as they together constitute the contract made between the parties. Under the Act the mayor and common council alone had authority to grant privileges to build piers in the harbor, and the previous permission of the street commission had no validity except as it was confirmed by the city authorities.

The right of Stevenson and Pearce to acquire permission to build the pier was based wholly upon the claim that they were "lessees, having the same rights and privileges as the owners of the soil, to the bulkhead between Clinton and Montgomery, adjoining the contemplated pier," and not upon any claim that the owners had lost their preemptive right by neglect or refusal to build; and the confirmation by the mayor and common council of the permission previously given by the street commissioner was made expressly subject to the rights of the owners of the fee. The tenants clearly attempted to clothe themselves with the statutory rights of their landlords, and recognized them by irresistible implication; and the city limited the right granted to them to that pertaining to their character as representatives of the littoral owners. Having obtained the right in such character, they would clearly be estopped from ascertaining any other right as against the party they assumed to represent.

It cannot, we think, be maintained that Stevenson and Pearce, at this time had any idea of obtaining any rights in the pier, except such as should belong to them as tenants. Their lease then had nearly forty years to run, and they were assured of the use of the pier for a long period without any increase in rent; and they might well suppose that its occupation for so long a period would be sufficient compensation for the cost of the structure. The meaning of the language used in the street commissioner's permission that it was to be built "at their expense and for their benefit," is abundantly satisfied by the right which they actually acquired to use it during the term of their tenancy; and the reservation of the rights of the landlord shows that they were not intended to have a more extended signification.

We therefore think the right to build the pier was acquired by the tenants after they had clothed themselves with the equities of their landlord, and was built as appurtenant to and for the more profitable employment of the demised premises, and could not be retained by them after the expiration of their term. We are therefore of the opinion that the defendant came clearly within the operation of the rule that tenants who have been put into possession of premises and permitted to occupy them by a lessor, are precluded from questioning his title in an action to recover possession of such premises or any part thereof. Washburn, Real Property, 482.

We are further of the opinion that the landlord acquired the right to this pier under the rule laid down in Steers v. Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 57, 1 Cent. Rep. 798. If the effect of this pier separately maintained was, as it unquestionably is, to destroy the substantial and profitable use of plaintiff's wharf and bulkhead, its erection and retention by the tenants, after the expiration of the tenancy was a breach of the contract to surrender them in good condition. It was therefore wrongful, and became an accretion to such wharf, belonging to its owners.

It cannot, in justice, be maintained that a tenant can rightfully build a structure during his tenancy over an easement appurtenant to demised premises which should substantially destroy the easement and the use and value of the demised premises without being answerable therefor to his landlord. When such structures are wrongfully built as an appurtenance of a wharf or bulkhead over the water, the law treats them as an accretion to the land of the littoral owner and awards their ownership to such owners. Ledyard v. Ten Eyck, supra; Mulry v. Norton, 1 Cent. Rep. 748, 100 N. Y. 424.

It is further claimed by the defendant that it has acquired title to the pier by adverse possession under deed from Pearce and Jarvis. This deed was given to it simultaneously with the delivery of a conveyance by the same parties of the rights they possessed in the bulkhead and wharf under the lease from Rutgers' executors.

It is not explained why Jarvis, who held only under the lease, should have joined in this deed; but it appears therefrom that the defendant endeavored to protect its rights in the pier both under the lease and the deed.

We are of the opinion that an adverse possession could not be initiated under either of these conveyances; it evidently could not under the lease, and it is equally clear that the deed was impotent for such a purpose. The grantors in that deed had an interest in the pier which was to continue to the end of their term, then nearly thirty years distant, and this they had a right to convey even against the dissent of their lessors. The lessors could bring no action to recover possession of the pier or the water under it until the expiration of the term, for their lease had conferred this possession upon their lessees. There is no evidence in the case that the landlord ever had notice that the lessees, or their grantees or assigns, claimed any greater rights in the waters of the harbor than those acquired under their lease. The only pretense in the evidence of any such knowledge is that given by Jarvis that Crosby, one of Rutgers' executors, was about the pier frequently after it was built, and the inference therefrom that he must have known of its existence and use. Crosby, however, in execution of his powers under the will, conveyed this property to Beecher in trust in 1837 and wholly ceased to have any interest in them before the pier was built.

Beecher, the trustee, lived at Batavia when the pier was built and Denio, who succeeded

Beecher as trustee, resided at Utica—both at a distance of several hundred miles from the location of the pier. There is not the least evidence that either of the trustees, or any of the beneficiaries, had any knowledge of a claim to an adverse possession by anyone. Even if they had had such notice, it is not perceived what effect it could have upon their rights. It is quite certain that the present defendant occupied, and had the right to occupy, the pier under its lease from 1848 to its termination in 1877; and it is not pretended that it ever attempted to surrender such rights during the existence of the term, or committed any act which authorized a re-entry thereunder.

We are unable to find any steps taken by the original tenants, or their assignees, which can be made the foundation of a claim of adverse possession.

What was said by Judge Finch in the case of Whiting v. Edmunds, 94 N. Y. 814, contains a sufficient answer to the claim. He says: "The tenant cannot, by a disclaimer or by mere words denying the landlord's title and asserting one of his own, work a forfeiture of his tenancy, or set running an adverse possession. DeLancey v. Ganong, 9 N. Y. 1.

Where the relation of landlord and tenant has been once established, the possession of the latter, and that of his grantees and assignees, is the possession of the landlord and not hostile or adverse (Jackson v. Davis, 5 Cow. 129; Sands v. Hughes, 58 N. Y. 298); and this is true even where the grantee has taken a deed of the fee in ignorance of the fact that his grantor stood in the relation of a tenant, the latter denying any such relation. Jackson v. Scissam, 8 Johns. 499.

The possession of the tenant in subordination to the title of the landlord continues not only during the running of the term, but is presumed to be such and to remain unchanged until twenty years after the end of the term, and notwithstanding any claim by the tenant or his successors of a hostile title. Code, § 86; Code Civ. Proc. § 878.

This presumption may be rebutted; but to do so effectually and initiate an adverse holding, the tenant must surrender the possession to the landlord, or do something equivalent to that, and bring home to him knowledge of the adverse claim. And so it was said in the late case of Bradt v. Church, 110 N. Y. 543, 18 N. Y. S. R. 551: "That lease being perpetual, under well settled rules of law, everyone entering into possession of the demised premises is presumed to have entered under the lease; and that presumption can only be rebutted successfully by sufficient proof of an adverse possession at some time in hostility to the landlord's title. Where the relation of landlord and tenant is once established . . . it attaches to all who may succeed to the possession under the tenant, however remotely."

Some question has also been made as to the legal succession by the plaintiffs to the rights of the original lessors; but we are of the opinion that no material defect exists in the proof relating thereto.

The judgments of the General and Special Terms should therefore be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

APPPEAL by plaintiff, from an order of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York, reversing an order of Special Term denying defendant's motion to vacate the summons and dismiss the complaint in an action to recover damages for negligence resulting in death. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Thomas P. Wickes and James Hillhouse for appellant.

Messrs. Everett P. Wheeler and Lawrence Godkin for respondent.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as administrator of Jane Lingard Robinson, deceased, commenced this action in the New York Superior Court to recover damages against the defendant, a foreign corporation, for wrongfully and negligently causing the death of his intestate. In the complaint the death is alleged to have been caused upon the ocean within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland by a collision between two of the defendant's vessels, upon one of which the deceased was a passenger.

This action is based upon the English Statute, called Lord Campbell's Act, passed in 1846, which has been substantially re-enacted in this State.

The defendant appeared in the action, interposed an answer to the complaint and noticed the cause for trial. Afterward it made a motion that the summons be vacated and the complaint dismissed, on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction of the action. That motion was denied at the special term; and from the order there made the defendant appealed to the general term, where the order was reversed and the motion granted, and the plaintiff then appealed to this court.

It appeared upon the motion, and it is an undisputed fact, that the residence of the intestate at the time of her death was at Fall River, in the State of Massachusetts, and that the plaintiff was and is a resident of the same place, and that he was appointed administrator by the Surrogate of the County of New York. The claim of the defendant is that as the plaintiff was a nonresident and the defendant was a foreign corporation, and the cause of action did not arise within this State, the court had no jurisdiction of the action under section 1780 of the Code.

The plaintiff contends that although he personally resided in the State of Massachusetts, within the meaning of the section referred to he was a resident of this State because he was here appointed administrator. But he was nevertheless personally a nonresident. Such a person may, under the statutes, be appointed an administrator, but he does not thereby become in any sense a resident of the State. Wyoming Valley R. & Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 172 [20 L. ed. 179]; Re Page, 107 N. Y. 266, 9 Cent. Rep. 723, 11 N. Y. S. R. 777.

The case of Leonard v. Columbia Steam Nav. Co. 84 N. Y. 48, is not an authority upon this point for the plaintiff, as in that case the defendant was a domestic corporation.

It is true that the plaintiff's cause of action is transitory, and that a plaintiff may bring a suit upon such a cause of action wherever he may be, provided he can find a court which has jurisdiction of the action and can obtain jurisdiction of the defendant. But a cause of action, even if transitory, must always arise somewhere; and this cause of action arose where the tort was committed which caused the death of the plaintiff's intestate. That this is a cause of action for a tort is too clear for reasonable dispute. It exists only by virtue of the statute referred to, and is based entirely upon the negligence and tortious conduct attributable to the defendant. We therefore have a case where the plaintiff is a nonresident, the defendant a foreign corporation, and the cause of action did not arise within this State; and therefore no court within this State has jurisdiction of the action.

Under the Revised Statutes, so far as we are able to discover, there was no provision for an action in the courts of this State by a nonresident against a foreign corporation, and the only provision for suits against foreign corporations was that found in 2 Revised Statutes, 459, section 15, where it is provided that suits brought in the supreme court by a resident of this State against any corporation created by or under the laws of any other State, government or country, for the recovery of any debt, claim or demand may be commenced by attachment. That provision remained until 1849, when by section 107 of the Laws of that year, it was amended so as to read as follows:

"Suits may be brought in the supreme court, in the Superior Court of the City of New York and in the Court of Common Pleas in and for the City and County of New York, against any corporation created by or under the laws of any other State, government or country, for the recovery of any debt or damages, whether liquidated or not, arising upon contract made, executed or delivered within this State, or upon any cause of action arising therein. Such suits may be commenced by complaint and summons together with an attachment as provided by law, and such complaint and summons may be served as provided by sections 118 and 114 of the Code of Procedure."

Under the section as thus amended, any plaintiff could commence an action against a foreign corporation upon any cause of action arising within this State. In the same year section 427 was added to the Code of Procedure.

ure, providing as follows: "An action against a corporation, created by or under the laws of any other State, government or country, may be brought in the supreme court, the Superior Court of the City of New York, or the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York, in the following cases:

"First. By a resident of this State for any cause of action.

"Second. By a plaintiff not a resident of this State, when the cause of action shall have arisen, or the subject of the action shall be situated, within the State."

This section did not assume to define all the cases in which actions could be brought against foreign corporations, and did not absolutely limit the power and jurisdiction of the courts mentioned. It specified the cases in which foreign corporations could compulsorily by service of process in the mode prescribed by law be subjected to the jurisdiction of the courts. It did not deprive the courts of any of this general jurisdiction.

The supreme court being a court of general jurisdiction, could, independently of any statute, entertain actions against foreign corporations. Such corporations could, by the common law, always be sued in this State by any plaintiff for any cause of action, provided jurisdiction could be obtained of their persons (Morawetz, Corp. § 977, and cases cited in note); and so it was held, construing this section of the Code, in McCormick v. Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company, 49 N. Y. 803.

There the action was brought by a nonresident plaintiff against a foreign corporation, for a cause of action which arose without the State; and it was held that the court could entertain the action because the defendant had appeared generally in the action and submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court, the cause of action being one of a class coming within its jurisdiction. Thus the law remained until the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted, section 1780 of which provides as follows:

"An action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by a resident of the State, or by a domestic corporation, for any cause of action. An action against a foreign corporation may be maintained by another foreign corporation or by a nonresident in one of the following cases only:

"First. Where the action is brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract made within the State, or relating to property situated within the State, at the time of the making thereof.

"Second. Where it is brought to recover real property situated within the State, or a chattel which is replevied within the State.

"Third. Where the cause of action arose within the State, except where the object of the action is to affect the title to real property situated without the State."

Under this section a resident of this State or a domestic corporation can maintain an action against a foreign corporation for any cause of action, no matter where it arose. But an action by a nonresident plaintiff against a foreign corporation can be maintained only in the cases specified, and in no case for a cause of action which arose outside of the state limits. The jurisdiction of the courts is defined and limited and absolutely confined to the cases specified; and the word "only" may have been and probably was inserted after the words, "following cases," to change the rule as announced in McCormick v. Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company.

The discrimination between resident and non-resident plaintiffs is probably based upon reasons of public policy, that our courts should not be vexed with litigations between nonresident parties over causes of action which arose outside of our territorial limits. Every rule of comity and of natural justice and of convenience is satisfied by giving redress in our courts to nonresident litigants when the cause of action arose or the subject matter of the litigation is situated within this State.

It is not sufficient that a nonresident plaintiff should by any service of process, or in any other way, obtain jurisdiction of a foreign corporation, but before the action can be maintained in any court of this State there must also be jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action. Jurisdiction of the action cannot be conferred upon the court by any consent or stipulation of the parties. The objection to the jurisdiction in such a case may be taken at any stage of the action, and the court may ex mero motu, at any time when its attention is called to the facts, refuse to proceed further and dismiss the action. Cooley, Const. Lim. 398; Davidburgh v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 526.

In the case cited, Danforth, J., said: "There are no doubt many cases where the court having jurisdiction over the subject matter may proceed against a defendant who voluntarily submits to its decision; but where the State prescribed conditions under which a court may act, those conditions cannot be dispensed with by litigants, for in such a case the particular condition or status of the defendant is made a jurisdictional fact."

It is claimed, however, that section 1780 of the Code, so far as it discriminates between resident and nonresident plaintiffs, is repugnant to section 2 of article 4 of the Federal Constitution, wherein it is provided that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This section makes no discrimination between citizens, but between residents and nonresidents.

Without attempting to define the full scope of that constitutional provision, it is sufficient to say that it has no application to a case like this; and there are numerous decisions to that effect. Adams v. Penn Bank, 85 Hun, 898; Frost v. Brislin, 19 Wend. 11; Lemmon v. People, 20 N. Y. 562; Haney v. Marshall, 9 Md. 194; Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harr. & McH. 535; Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, 98 U. S. 72 [23 L. ed. 806]; McCreedy v. Va. 94 U. S. 396 [24 L. ed. 249]; Mo. v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22 [25 L. ed. 969].

A construction of the constitutional limitation which would apply it to such a case as this would strike down a large body of laws which have existed in all the States from the foundation of the Government, making some discrimination between residents and nonresidents in legal proceedings and other matters.

1. An order for service of summons by publication should not be made by a court in New York against nonresident defendants, in an action by a judgment creditor to reach property in copyrights and royalties thereon which, for the purpose of defrauding creditors, have been assigned to one of the other defendants by the judgment debtor in another State, to which the debtor has gone, after execution had been issued on the judgment in the State of New York, where it was rendered. The property being intangible, the defendants nonresidents, and the transfer having been made out of the State, there is no jurisdiction over the subject of the action or its cause.

2. Where an order for publication of summons has been made in an action over the subject or cause of which the courts of the State have no jurisdiction, defendant is entitled to make a motion to set it aside, rather than submit to the hardship of coming in to defend the action.

(February 8, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendant, Martha W. Wilkinson from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of the Kings Special Term denying her motion to vacate an order for service of summons by publication. Reversed.

The facts fully appear in the opinion of the court and in the dissenting opinion.

Mr. Payson Merrill for appellant.

Mr. Samuel R. Taylor for respondent.

Danforth, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is by a judgment creditor of Mrs. Richardson, against her as debtor, and other defendants, one of whom is Mrs. Wilkinson; and the order of publication recites that the action relates to personal property within the State, in which the then defendants "have or claim the entire property or income, and that the relief demanded by the plaintiff consists partly in excluding the defendants from any lien upon or interest in it until the plaintiff's judgment is satisfied."

This statement may bring the case in terms, but not in spirit, within subdivision 5 of section 438, Code Civ. Proc.; but that is not necessary to consider, for neither the complaint nor the affidavits on which the order was founded, contain any warrant for such assumption, and the order was sustained against the motion to vacate it upon the sole ground that the defendant was a nonresident of the State.

The proceeding was a statutory one, and to give the judge jurisdiction to entertain it, something more than the nonresidence of the defendant must appear.

A summons is issued as the first step towards the commencement of an action, and this signifies in the Code (§ 3333) an ordinary prosecution by one party against another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, or the redress or prevention of a wrong. The service of the summons is the commencement of the action. It can be made, as of course, upon a defendant within the State. It can be served upon a nonresident within the State, or by publication, only by direction of a judge; but his order must be founded, not only upon an affidavit showing the nonresidence, but also upon a verified complaint, showing a sufficient cause of action against the defendant to be served. Code Civ. Proc. § 439.

Under the former Code (§ 135), it was enough to present the judge with an affidavit disclosing to him a cause of action against the defendant, and he was then authorized to make the order for publication in certain specified cases, and among others (1) "when the defendant is a foreign corporation and has property within the State, or the cause of action arose therein; (2) where the defendant is not a resident of the State, but has property therein, and the court has jurisdiction of the subject of the action."

These qualifying words are omitted in the Code of Civil Procedure, but that Act, as is above stated, requires the complaint to show "a sufficient cause of action." That condition stands in the place of the special cases enumerated in the former Code, and can require nothing less; for unless a cause of action arises within the State, or the defendant has property therein and the court has jurisdiction over the subject of the action, neither the person nor property of a defendant could be affected by any judgment the court might render. She could neither be punished for contempt in failing to obey its order, nor her estate be sold by reason of it. The jurisdiction of the court is limited to the boundaries of the State, and its process could not go beyond them.

The facts, therefore, constituting a valid claim against the defendant must be stated, and it must also appear that the case is one of which the court can take cognizance. Here nothing appears to be within its jurisdiction. So far as the appellant is concerned the subject of the action is in Massachusetts. She is alleged to be the assignee of certain copyrights, an intangible species of property, as the name implies—Sterens v. Gladding, 58 U. S. 17 How. 450 [15 L. ed. 156],—acquired by compliance with conditions imposed by statute (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4956, 4962), to be performed at the office of the librarian of Congress, and consisting merely of the exclusive privilege of printing, publishing and selling books or other compositions, a privilege abiding with the person by whom it was originally secured, or her assignee. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4952, 4955, 4971.

She resides in Massachusetts, and, for aught that appears, always has resided there. Nothing has taken place in this State, and no one is here to be affected by any judgment the courts of the State can make.

If the court directs the assignment to be canceled, how is its order to be made effective?—

or appoints a receiver, what power will he possess over the defendant appellant?—or requires her to account for money received?—neither order could be enforced. Moreover, the complaint, while it shows the issuing of an execution against the debtor while a resident of this State, also shows that at some time thereafter, and before the issuing of the other execution alleged in the complaint, she left the State and became with her husband "resident of the State of Massachusetts, with the intent of defrauding and delaying the plaintiff in the collection of the said indebtedness," and still resides there. It then alleges the assignment of the copyright to Mrs. Wilkinson with intent to defraud the plaintiff, and the collection of royalties by her, and payment of them to Mrs. Richardson, with like intent.

The action is to reach the copyright and have an accounting for those royalties as the property of Mrs. Richardson, and is within the Code which gives to the creditor an action against his debtor and any other person to compel the discovery of anything in action, or other property belonging to the judgment debtor, or held in trust for him. Code Civ. Proc. § 1871.

As the transaction sought to be undone is illegal, the action is founded on a wrong by Mrs. Wilkinson in receiving the property for an unlawful purpose and to the plaintiff's injury; and for this she seeks a remedy. Her right as a creditor to that property is the right she desires to enforce.

It is plain that the right accrued, and therefore the cause of action arose, when and where the defendant was guilty of the wrong charged upon her; and that is when and where she stands as a shelter to the debtor and claims and exercises rights of ownership under an instrument executed and received in fraud of the rights of a creditor. If the allegation in the complaint is true, that is the position and that is the wrong practiced by the defendant. It is her duty to give up the property to be applied upon the debt, and the enforcement of that duty gives the cause of action. But these things did not happen in this State, nor are the interests or property here. The court can give no relief, and the impropriety of issuing an order which, if it leads to a judgment, "would operate on nothing in the State and be regarded by nobody out of it," becomes apparent. It offends every principle by which the jurisdiction of a court can be vindicated, and should not be allowed to stand.

Clarke v. Boreel, 21 Hun, 594, is cited by the respondent as opposed to these views. It seems to have no application. The action was for the recovery of damages for injuries to the person of a citizen, caused within this State by the negligence of the defendant. The court held that the cause of action arose in the State; that it had jurisdiction over it; that the defendant might, perhaps, appear, and thus jurisdiction of the person of the defendant be added to jurisdiction of the subject matter; and in the then condition of the proceedings, they regarded the motion as premature, and gave the plaintiff the benefit of the experiment. In the complaint before us no case is made giving jurisdiction to the courts of this State over the subject of the action or its cause.

and the defendant is entitled to make the motion rather than submit to the hardship of coming into them to defend the action.

The orders of the General and Special Terms are therefore reversed, and the motion to vacate the order of publication granted, with costs in all courts, and $10 costs of motion.

Andrews, Peckham and Gray, JJ., concur.

Earl, J., dissenting:

Under the Code of Procedure service of a summons by publication could be made upon a nonresident defendant: "Where he is not a resident of this State, but has property therein, and the court has jurisdiction of the subject of the action."

"Where the subject of the action is real or personal property in this State, and the defendant has or claims a lien or interest—actual or contingent—therein, or the relief demanded consists wholly or partly in excluding the defendant from any interest or lien therein."

"Where the action is for divorce, in the cases prescribed by law."

There was no provision of the Code expressly providing that the property of the defendant should in any case be attached as a condition precedent either to the granting of the order of publication or judgment by default after service of the summons by publication; and the practice was not uniform. It was held in some cases that a valid judgment upon a money demand could not be obtained unless property of the defendant had been attached, and that the judgment could then be enforced against the property attached and operate upon it only. Finally, in 1858, the practice was regulated by Rule 25 of the supreme court, which provided that "In actions for the recovery of money only, when the summons has been served by publication, under section 185 of the Code, no judgment shall be entered, unless the plaintiff at the time of making the application for judgment shall show by affidavit that an attachment has been issued in the action and levied upon property belonging to the defendant." The rule required the prerequisite of an attachment in actions for the recovery of money only, because an attachment could be issued only in such cases. Code Proc. § 227.

It did not require that the property should be attached at or before the order for publication was obtained, but it was complied with if property was attached at any time before application for judgment was made. As the Code prescribed that a summons could be served by publication against a nonresident defendant only in case he had property within the State, it was finally held that a valid judgment could be obtained against such a defendant for a money demand only in case an attachment was served on such property; and the statutes received final construction in the case of McKinney v. Collins, 88 N. Y. 216.

The Code of Civil Procedure introduced some change in the previous practice. It is provided in section 438 as follows:

"Section 438. An order directing the service of a summons upon a defendant, without the State, or by publication, may be made in either of the following cases:

"1. Where the defendant to be served is a foreign corporation, or, being a natural person, is not a resident of the State; or where, after diligent inquiry, the defendant remains unknown to the plaintiff, or the plaintiff is unable to ascertain whether the defendant is or is not a resident of the State.

"2. Where the defendant, being a resident of the State, has departed therefrom with intent to defraud his creditors, or to avoid the service of a summons, or keeps himself concealed therein, with like intent.

"3. Where the defendant, being an adult and a resident of the State, has been continuously without the United States more than six months next before the granting of the order, and has not made a designation of a person upon whom to serve a summons in his behalf as prescribed in section 430 of this Act; or a designation so made no longer remains in force; or service upon the person so designated cannot be made within the State, after diligent effort.

"4. Where the complaint demands judgment annulling a marriage, or for a divorce, or a separation.

"5. Where the complaint demands judgment, that the defendants be excluded from a vested or contingent interest in, or lien upon, specific real or personal property within the State; or that such an interest or lien in favor of either party be enforced, regulated, defined or limited; or otherwise affecting the title to such property.

"6. Where the defendant is a resident of the State, or a domestic corporation; and an attempt was made to commence the action against the defendant, as required in chapter 4 of this Act, before the expiration of the limitation applicable thereto as fixed in that chapter and the limitation would have expired within sixty days next preceding the application, if the time had not been extended by the attempt to commence the action.

"7. Where the action is against the stockholders of a corporation, or joint stock company, and is authorized by a law of the State, and the defendant is a stockholder thereof."

And section 439 provides that the order must be founded upon a verified complaint showing "a sufficient cause of action" against the defendant to be served, and proof by affidavit of the additional facts required by the previous section. Section 1217 was adopted in the place of what was previously substantially embodied in the rule of the supreme court, as follows: "A judgment shall not be rendered for a sum of money only upon an application made pursuant to the last section, except in an action specified in section 635 of this Act. Where the defendant is a nonresident, or a foreign corporation, and has not appeared, the plaintiff, upon the application for judgment in such an action, must produce and file the following papers:

"1. Proof by affidavit that a warrant of attachment granted in the action has been levied upon property of the defendant.

"2. A description of the property so attached, verified by affidavit; with a statement of the value thereof, according to the inventory.

"3. The undertaking mentioned in section 1216, if one has been required."

It is seen that the requirement that the non-resident defendant should have property within the State is omitted, and that fact is not essential to give jurisdiction to grant the order for publication. In an action to recover a money demand it may be granted although the defendant has no property within the State; but at some time before application for judgment can be successfully made, property of the nonresident defendant must be found within the State and attached, and then the judgment can be enforced only against the property so attached. Sec. 707.

I am inclined to think (although it is not now important to determine it) that it is the true construction of the various sections of the Code, that a valid judgment cannot be obtained against a nonresident served by publication, unless some of his property has been attached within the State before judgment, or the case is one mentioned in subdivisions 4, 5 or 7 of section 438. And this construction makes clear what is meant by the requirement in section 439, that there shall be a verified complaint showing "a sufficient cause of action;" that is, there must be a verified complaint showing a cause of action for a sum of money only as provided in section 635 of the Code, or showing a cause of action specified in subdivisions 4, 5 or 7, and unless the complaint shows such a cause of action, an order for publication of the summons is not warranted.

This is what is commonly called a creditor's action, brought against the University Publishing Company of New York, Charles B. Richardson, Charlotte H. Richardson and Martha W. Wilkinson. The complaint alleges the recovery of a judgment against Mrs. Richardson for about $14,000, the issuing of an execution and the return thereof unsatisfied; that before the commencement of the action in which the judgment was obtained Mrs. Richardson and one Heath were engaged in the publishing business in the City of New York; that the stock in trade of the firm consisted of copyrights and the stereotype plates from which the copyrighted works were to be printed, and that they were the exclusive property of Mrs. Richardson; that the business was subsequently transferred to the University Publishing Company, and has since been conducted under that name; that subsequently to the commencement of that action Mrs. Richardson assigned and transferred to the defendant, Martha W. Wilkinson, the copyrights of several works specified for the nominal consideration of $12,100, but without any real consideration, and solely with intent to defraud the plaintiff; and the stereotype plates from which the copyrighted works were printed were the property of Mrs. Richardson, although nominally transferred to the University Publishing Company with intent to defraud the plaintiff; that Mrs. Richardson was paid from $3,000 to $5,000 annually by the University Publishing Company, for royalties in the use of such stereotype and copyright plates by the company, the money being first paid to Mrs. Wilkinson and then by her turned over to Mrs. Richardson, for the use of the latter; that the University Publishing Company is a New York Corporation, engaged in business in the City of New York.

And the complaint demands judgment that the assignment made by Mrs. Richardson to Mrs. Wilkinson and the assignment made by the University Publishing Company to Mrs. Wilkinson and the transfer to the University Publishing Company of the stereotype plates used in connection with the copyrights mentioned, be set aside and declared void; that an injunction be allowed restraining the defendants or either of them from disposing of or interfering with such copyrights and stereotype plates, and that a receiver be appointed to whom should be assigned all the property and estate of the defendant Mrs. Richardson, and who should be authorized to sell the same and satisfy the judgment of the plaintiff. The complaint is verified. In addition thereto, there was presented to the judge, upon the application for the order of publication, the affidavit of the plaintiff, setting forth substantially the same facts alleged in the complaint.

The order of publication was granted on the ground that the defendants, Martha W. Wilkinson, Charles B. Richardson and Charlotte H. Richardson, were nonresidents of the State; that the defendant Charlotte H. Richardson departed from this State with intent to defraud her creditor, the plaintiff, and the three defendants are proper parties "to this action which relates to personal property within this State, in which property the defendants, Martha W. Wilkinson, Charles B. Richardson and Charlotte H. Richardson, have or claim the entire property and income, and that the relief demanded by the plaintiff consists partly in excluding the said three defendants from any lien upon or interest in said property until the plaintiff's judgment against said Charlotte H. Richardson, amounting to more than $17,000, shall be fully satisfied." The defendant, Mrs. Wilkinson, moved to set aside the order of publication on the ground that it was granted without jurisdiction.

It is clear that this complaint sets forth a sufficient cause of action within subdivision 5 of section 438 of the Code. It shows a valid cause of action to reach certain property transferred by a judgment debtor for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff by hindering and delaying him in the collection of his judgment. It appears that some of that property at least is within this State. It is difficult to perceive what element of a sufficient cause of action is wanting. It cannot be doubted that if a proper service of a summons can be obtained upon the defendants, and the allegations of the complaint can be proved, a good cause of action will be established under subdivision 5, and that the court will be able to grant the relief demanded.

Whether the summons can be effectually served upon all the defendants, and thus a valid judgment be obtained against them, is another matter. That question may arise when application for judgment is made, or when any effort may be made in the future to enforce a judgment rendered in the action. But as the basis for an order of publication, everything appears in the complaint which is necessary to give the court jurisdiction. The plaintiff has the right to make an effort to bring the defendants into court by the service of his summons. It may be that they will appear, or that before judgment is obtained all the property will be brought within this State; and there is no warrant in the law or in any rule of practice for depriving the plaintiff of these chances. Courts are not in the habit of refusing process to a suitor because he may not be able to make it effectual. It appears from the complaint that the entire business of the University Publishing Company is conducted for the benefit of Mrs. Wilkinson, and that she has a large and valuable interest therein, and she is a proper party to the action at least for the purpose of barring and cutting off any interest she may have in its property.

It is alleged in the affidavit used upon the application for the order of publication that some of the stereotype plates and all of the copyrights were possessed and controlled within the State of New York. It may be as matter of law that that is not true as to the copyrights. They are peculiar in their nature, intangible personal property or incorporeal rights, and have their status either at the domicile of the owner or anywhere in the United States where they may be used.

It may be true, as stated by Judge Curtis, in Stevens v. Gladding, 58 U. S. 17 How. 450 [15 L. ed. 156], that "These incorporeal rights do not exist in any particular State or district; they are coextensive with the United States. There is nothing in any Act of Congress, or in the nature of the rights themselves to give them locality anywhere, so as to subject them to the process of courts having jurisdiction limited by the lines of States and districts." But these copyrights are used in the City of New York. They do not appear to be used anywhere else. The books are printed and published in the City of New York.

The stereotype plates are tangible property and may be seized and sold under an execution and the property in the copyrights may be reached by a creditor's bill—Stephens v. Cady, 55 U. S. 14 How. 528 [14 L. ed. 528]—and it may be that the plaintiff can get some relief as to that property under the circumstances appearing in this case. Whether he can or not ought not to be determined upon a motion to set aside the order of publication. It should be left to be determined after he has obtained judgment, as when he seeks to enforce it against such property.

We are therefore of opinion that this motion was at least premature, and that it was properly denied.

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

The question presented sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Emmet R. Olcott and William Q. Judge for respondent.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 3268 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a defendant in an action brought in a court of record may require security for costs in cases among others where the plaintiff was, when the action was commenced, either: first, "a person residing without the State;" or second, "a foreign corporation." The plaintiff claims to be a foreign independent sovereign State.

It is urged by the plaintiff that it is neither a person nor foreign corporation within the meaning of the Code. It is not disputed that the plaintiff is an independent government recognized as such by the United States and capable of entering into contract and acquiring property, as well as competent, through the rule of comity, of bringing and maintaining actions in the courts of this country; but it is claimed that it does not come within the description of legal entities authorized to require security for costs. That it is within the spirit of the enactment, we think cannot be disputed, and we are also of the opinion that it is within its letter as well.

Vattel defines Nations or States to be "bodies politic, societies of men united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by the joint effort of their combined strength." Such a society has her affairs and her interests. She deliberates and takes resolutions in common, thus becoming a moral person, who possesses an understanding and a will peculiar to herself, and is susceptible of obligations and rights. Law of Nations, 1; Wheaton, Internat. Law, chap. 1, §§ 1, 2; Bouvier, Institutes, title Nation.

That such a being constitutes a legal entity capable of acquiring and enjoying property and protecting itself from injuries thereto in the courts of foreign countries has long been recognized and established in the tribunals of civilized nations. Republic of Mexico v. De Arangoz, 5 Duer, 636; Hul'et v. King of Spain, 1 Dow. & Cl. 169; Cherokee Nation v. Ga. 30 U. S. 5 Pet. 52 [8 L. ed. 25].

There can, we think, be no doubt but under title 2, chapter 10, part 8, of the Revised Statutes, providing for security for costs in an action brought by any plaintiff, not residing within the jurisdiction of the court, that foreign States and Nations were required to give such security; and we do not think that the provisions of the Code were intended to change the law in that respect.

Section 3268 of the Code is stated to be a re-enactment of the previous statute; and it cannot, we think, have been intended thereby to defeat the right of a resident defendant to require security for costs as a protection from loss through unfounded prosecutions by foreign states which had therefore been extended. No reason is seen for such a change and we do not think any was intended to be made.

The word "person" was, we think, used in its enlarged sense as comprising all legal entities except foreign corporations, which were authorized to bring actions in this State. In that sense it embraces moral persons having legal rights capable of entering into contracts and incurring obligations, as well as natural persons. The statute must be construed with reference to the objects it had in view, the evils intended to be remedied, and the benefits expected to be derived from it; and, as thus construed, we can see no reason why the plaintiff is not included within the description of persons intended to be subjected to the obligations of the statute.

A more difficult question, however, arises over the power of the court to require additional security where a deposit of money has once been made under an order by a nonresident plaintiff.

The right to require such security is purely a creation of the statute, and authority therefor must be found in the statute or it does not exist. Under the provisions of the Revised Statutes, hereinbefore referred to, no authority was conferred upon the court to require or permit a deposit of money; but the security authorized to be required was a bond in a penalty of not less than $250, and no power to increase the amount of the original security was given. But by chapter 305, Laws of 1875, it was provided in case the bond given should be insufficient or the sureties thereon should die or become insolvent, the court might order an additional bond to be executed and filed by the plaintiff as security for costs already accrued and those expected to be thereafter incurred.

Section 8272 of the Code for the first time authorized a deposit of money in place of a bond. That section provides that when a case is made for security, the court must make an order requiring the plaintiff to deposit in court the sum of $250, as security for costs, or, at his election, to give an undertaking and obtain an allowance of the same by the judge granting the order. Sections 8273, 8274 and 8275 provide the requisites of the undertaking; the mode of exception to sureties; their justification and the method of allowance of the bond by the judge or otherwise.

The only statutory authority for the requirement of additional security is contained in section 8276, which, so far as it is material, reads as follows: "At any time after the allowance of an undertaking, given pursuant to such an order, the court, or judge thereof, upon satisfactory proof, by affidavit, that the sum specified in the undertaking is insufficient, or that one or more of the sureties have died, or become insolvent, or that his or their circumstances have become so precarious that there is reason to apprehend that the undertaking is insufficient for the security of the defendant, must make an order requiring the plaintiff to give an additional undertaking. The last four sections apply to such an order, and to the undertaking given pursuant thereto."

3 L. R. A.

We are of the opinion that when a deposit of money has once been made, the court have no authority to require an undertaking; and whether the plaintiff shall give an undertaking in the first instance depends solely upon his election. If he then makes a deposit the court cannot afterwards require any further undertaking to be given. The statute is explicit and unambiguous, and there is no room or occasion for interpretation. Re Middletown, 82 N. Y. 196.

To require a plaintiff, under this statute, to file an undertaking after he has made a deposit would be an exercise of the power of legislation and not within the limits of judicial authority. The grounds upon which additional security may be required relate solely to the incidents of an undertaking, and not at all to those of a deposit. They are: first, that the amount of the undertaking should be insufficient; second, that the sureties have died or become insolvent; third, that their circumstances have become precarious.

All of these reasons, except the first, in their nature, apply exclusively to undertakings; and the first is, by the language of the statute, referable only to an undertaking. By the express language of the section, therefore, the power of the court to require additional security arises only after the allowance of an undertaking, and the authority to require further security is in imperative terms confined to an additional undertaking, and cannot be extended to the requirement of a further deposit without adding material language to the section. There is a manifest distinction between a deposit and an undertaking in respect to the causes which may impair the one and leave the other unaffected, and we are not able to say but that those differences controlled the Legislature in making the discrimination referred to.

The last clause in the section does not purport to enlarge the power of the court thereunder, but simply provides that the regulations of the previous four sections, so far as they are applicable, shall be applied to the order and undertaking authorized by section 8276.

The argument that the case is within the spirit of the provisions authorizing additional security to be required is without force when there is not only an absence of language providing for it, but the presence of language which by clear implication excludes it.

It was said in People v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 364: "It is always competent for the Legislature to speak clearly and without equivocation, and it is safer for the judicial department to follow the plain intent and obvious meaning of an Act, rather than to speculate upon what might have been the views of the Legislature in the emergency which may have arisen. It is wiser and safer to leave to the legislative department to supply a supposed or actual casus omissus than attempt to do it by judicial construction."

We are therefore of the opinion that the orders of the General and Special Terms should be reversed, and the motion denied, with costs in both Courts.

All concur.

1. The sureties of an administratrix who has obtained a decree discharging her and her sureties from their bond are not entitled to notice of a proceeding to vacate such decree for fraud. They are privies of the administratrix, and precluded from questioning any lawful order made by the surrogate in a proceeding wherein she is a party, if obtained without collusion between her and the next of kin or creditors of the estate.

2. Sureties to whom money of an estate has been loaned by an administratrix as a condition of their becoming sureties for her, to be retained until they are discharged from liability on the bond, are not relieved from such liability by repaying the money after examining a decree of the surrogate discharging her and them from their liability on the bond, when such decree is subsequently vacated on the ground of fraud.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff as executor of the estate of his mother, Maria Deobold, to recover from the defendants as sureties upon the bond of Louisa Deobold, given upon her appointment as administratrix of the estate of her husband, Henry Deobold, a sum of money ordered by the surrogate to be paid to Maria Deobold as mother and next of kin to the intestate, but which the administratrix refused or neglected to pay. The trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the judgment entered thereon was affirmed upon appeal. The supreme court having granted leave to appeal to this court, the matter comes here for review. The record presents the following facts, the evidence being practically undisputed:

Prior to January 16, 1880, Henry Deobold, a resident of the City of New York, died possessed of personal property of about the value of $3,800, and leaving him surviving his widow Louisa Deobold, his mother Maria Deobold, and brother Philip Deobold, next of kin. On that day the Surrogate of New York issued letters of administration upon the estate to the widow, Louisa Deobold, and the defendants became sureties upon her bond for the faithful performance of her duties as such. On December 9, 1882, upon a general accounting before the surrogate by the administratrix, he made a decree finally adjusting her accounts, and discharging the administratrix and her sureties from their bond. This decree purported to have been based upon a written waiver of notice of the settlement of the estate, signed by Maria and Philip Deobold, and a written assignment by them to the administratrix of all their right, title and interest in the estate of the deceased.

Proceedings were thereafter begun by Maria and Philip, in the surrogate's court, on January 9, 1883, to set aside the decree rendered on final accounting, upon the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, and that the assignment and waiver of citation were procured from them by the administratrix through fraud and misrepresentation. Such proceedings were thereupon had that the surrogate, on February 20, 1883, made an order vacating, and in all respects setting aside, the decree, and the defendants were immediately thereafter served with a copy of such order. Subsequently, upon a further accounting, the surrogate made an order directing the administratrix to pay to Maria Deobold the sum of $300, and she refusing to pay the same, the surrogate made a further order directing the prosecution of the defendant's bond for the recovery of the amount so ordered to be paid. This suit was brought in pursuance of the latter order.

It further appeared that, before consenting to act as sureties upon the bond of Louisa Deobold, the defendants required her to deposit with them the entire proceeds of the estate, to be retained until they were discharged from liability upon the bond, and an agreement to that effect was made between her and the defendants. No security was given to the administratrix for the repayment of these moneys by the defendants, and by the understanding of the parties they were to pay interest thereon, and were authorized to use them in their business as brewers. Under this arrangement the administratrix, at the time of the execution of the bond, deposited with the defendants the sum of $8,800, the funds of the estate, which they employed in their business until January 16, 1883, when it was repaid by them, together with a loan of $2,900, and interest, to Louisa Deobold. This payment was made by the defendants after an examination of the decree of the surrogate of December 9, 1882, discharging them from liability on the bond, and after an inspection of the papers upon which such decree was founded.

It did not appear that the defendants had actual notice of the proceedings previously instituted by Philip and Maria Deobold to set aside such decree for fraud, or that they were made parties thereto. It further appeared that, in actions instituted on behalf of Philip and Maria Deobold against the administratrix in the Court of Common Pleas of New York, judgments had been obtained by the plaintiffs, respectively, vacating and setting aside the assignments before referred to as fraudulent and void.

Two questions are presented by the appellants as grounds for the reversal of the judgment below, which may be briefly stated as follows: (1) that the surrogate could not reinstate the defendants in their liability as sureties upon their bond in proceedings to which they were not parties; and (2) that the agreement by which they were made the custodians of the funds of the estate was binding and lawful, and authorized them to retain them until after the discharge of such bond. As the corollary of the latter proposition, it is urged that, having the right to retain them, and having paid them out relying upon the assignment, and decree of the surrogate based thereon, the defendants were relieved from the obligation of repaying the same moneys in this action.
